always run in the Christian name had its origin, apart from Christ, and after him, in the disciples who reported his life and teaching, with very marked alterations and very great additions of their own. Mr. Froude intimated long ago, in "The Nemesis of Faith" (pp. 18, 86-7), the conception which thoughtful minds, escaping into freedom, have had of this want. Thus he said:—

I believe that we may find in the Bible the highest and purest religion, . . . most of all in the history of him in whose name we are called. His religion—not the Christian religion, but the religion of Christ. . . . In Christianity [after Christ], as in everything else which men have thrown out of themselves, there is the strangest mixture of what is most noble with what is most. . . . I shrink from the only word. A man is born into the world—a real man—such a one as it has never seen; he lives a life consistently the very highest; his wisdom is the calm earnest voice of humanity. . . . The noble image of the man is effaced, is destroyed. Instead of a man to love and to follow, we have a man-God to worship. From being the example of devotion he is its object. The religion of Christ ended with his life, and left us instead but the Christian religion.

The same intimation was made by Dr. Rowland Williams, in a passage which also points very clearly to Pure Humanitarian and Moral Theism as the true faith of Christ. Dr. Williams said:—

There was one faith of Christ, and another of the Apostles, and men after the Apostles, and yet another of the monks after Athanasius. The God-head of the FATHER of Jesus was all one, but Wisdom its eternal offspring, and Life its eternal breathing. We know God by reason, for he made us; and by faith, for he teaches us, though we see him not with the eye. He whose reason is strongest will believe most firmly, and he whose love is deepest will understand most truly. The Infinite is not Man, that we should measure his thought, nor the Son of Man, that we should ascribe to him weakness. Mankind is the only-begotten of God in the flesh; and by breathing the divine love we become one spirit with the Father. I believe in the Eternal Spirit, whose scripture is the world, and whose son is Mankind. I believe in the living God, the Father who loves, the Almighty who saves, the Creator who forecasts the world; who in mankind makes himself known by his Word, binding men by his breath into one, and giving us sonship as sons, though we owe to him as Lord the faithfulness of servants.

But in a statement made in the preface to Dr. Martineau's "Ten Services of Public Prayer" there will be found a still more significant form of this intimation that to hear Christ is to hear him alone, separate from apostles and Evangelists, from epistles and gospels. The statement in question is as follows:—

The uniform theology once supposed to pervade the New Testament, and to carry the seal of divine authority, breaks up, on more accurate research, into several distinct types, belonging to different stages of the early Christianity, and blending the pure essence of Christ's personal religion with theories about him often conflicting and always fallible. Not only have the Petrine, the Pauline, and the Johannine conceptions of the Gospel their separate characteristic phraseology, to which no common measure can be applied; but in all of them the permanent divine element has to be discriminated from the temporary vehicle of thought which conveyed it to the passing age. No one who has once become familiar with the definite images and ideas of the Messianic Christianity in any of its forms can ever again give to its language the loose and large interpretation which alone renders it available for the voice of living piety. He knows that it really means what he cannot mean. . . . If it be true that the supreme and distinctive end of Christ's religion was to bring the human spirit face to face with the Divine and to leave man alone with God, i.e., not to establish but to destroy all mediation, then is it contradicted rather than expressed by the traditional modes of piety; and no process of mere verbal excision and "broad" interpretation will be adequate to invert the look and attitude of the ancient prayer, and give it the eye and voice of immediate vision. It is one thing to make mention, in our direct communion with God, of Christ as the unique realisation of that spiritual life of filial surrender to which, in brotherhood with him, we also aspire. It is quite another, so to hang upon his name as to imply, by its frequency and the functions attached to it, that without him we have no divine communion, and with him only one which is indirect. In the former act there [may be a pervading and intense presence of the sacred ideal which he has given us, though but rarely coming to the surface by express reference to its source; in the latter the reiteration of praises and acknowledgments, however accordant with external mediatorial relations, not only outruns the truth of fact, but hurts all natural reverence and affection. It is no wonder, therefore, that the piety of the younger generation, where it is not reactionary, finds something uncongenial in its historical inheritance of prayers, and feels that mere dogmatic correction has no adequate healing effect; the very doctrines that are removed being often the moulding power of the whole structure from which they are erased.

This account of the matter leaves it profoundly necessary to thoroughly trace out the Biblical origin of orthodox error in faith and worship; and to recover distinctly and fully the pure Christianity taught by Christ himself, separate from those more or less corrupted and contrary Christianities which originated with Peter, John, and Paul, and their companions and successors; who so largely left Christ's service of man and worship of God for a service and worship directed to Christ himself. It was the method of Christ himself to trace the Biblical origin of orthodox error, and to correct Biblical authority as human and erring. "Ye have heard that it was said—but I say unto you," was a formula which he did not hesitate to apply to Scriptures held most absolutely sacred. It appears now that we must use the same method. And the law of our use of it evidently is, to find amid the varying conceptions which meet us in the New Testament or in Christian use of the Old Testament, what those are which reflect the ideally perfect grace and truth of the mind of Christ, and what those are which served even in the original gospels and the earliest histories and epistles as seeds and roots of the vast system of error which came to be accepted as orthodoxy, and which in long ages of the faith have so manifestly wrought "things of men," utterly contrary to Christ's "things of God," as the chief original apostle, Peter, was contrary, when Christ said unto him:—"Thou art my stumbling-block; for thou mindest not the things of God, but the things of men."

To trace the Creed of Christ, and to show the Biblical Origin of Orthodox Error, is above all the task for the wise student and reformer in the present crisis of advanced liberty and learning, when the old is failing so fast, and of the new so many are doubtful.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXV.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

143. REV. JOHN LANE (1812-19).—Educated for the ministry at the Northampton Academy under the Rev. John Horsey. Having been for six or seven years minister to the Presbyterian congregations at Hinckley and Kidderminster successively, he removed to London about 1809, and was minister at Hanover-street Chapel for ten or eleven years, and for some time a member of the Presbyterian Board. Sudden illness in 1819 compelled his retirement from the pulpit, and he devoted the rest of his life to teaching at Bristol and afterwards at Hackney. He was brought up among the Independents, and towards the end of his life returned to that communion. He died at Hackney, 13th April, 1831.

144. JAMES GIBSON, ESQ. (1812-43).—A member of the Presbyterian Board as a representative of Carter-lane Congregation (1810-43). A member of the New England Company, at whose office there is a portrait of him. He died in 1843.

145. JAMES ESDAILE, ESQ. (1812-64).—Son of James Esdaile, Esq. (No. 137), whom he succeeded both in this Trust and as treasurer of the Presbyterian Fund, which office he held until his death, which occurred in 1864.

146. REV. ALEXANDER CROMBIE, LL.D. (1813-35).—Minister of the Presbyterian Congregation at Highgate and a learned schoolmaster. Author of an "Essay on Philosophical Necessity," 1793, "A Treatise on the Etymology and Syntax of the English Language," 1809, "Natural Theology," two vols., 1829, and other works. He died at his residence in York-terrace, Regent's Park, June 11, 1840, in his seventy-ninth year.

147. REV. JOHN POTTICARY (1814-20).—Educated at St. Paul's School; studied for the ministry among the Independents at Homerton Academy; many years pastor of the Independent congregation at Newport in the Isle of Wight, until the increasing duties of a large school compelled his retirement. He afterwards adopted Unitarian opinions. About the year 1806 he removed to Blackheath, where he acquired great reputation as a schoolmaster. Amongst his pupils there during the years 1813-17 was the late Lord Beaconsfield, from the age of nine to thirteen, when he was removed to Mr. Cogan's school at Walthamstow. (See Letter by "Senex" in Daily News for May 11, 1881.) It is remarkable that this eminent personage should have received all his classical education and apparently all his schooling, from two of Dr. Williams's Trustees. Mr. Potticary died March 3, 1827, aged fifty-seven years.

148. SAMUEL NICHOLSON, ESQ. (1815-27).—Of Finsbury-square. A member of Jewin-street Chapel. He died in 1827, leaving a legacy of £100 to the Presbyterian Board, of which he had been a member.

A hundred years had now elapsed since the foundation of the Trust, and it was resolved to celebrate the event in some signal way. This was done by an "oration" delivered at the Library in February, 1816, by Dr. James Lindsay, followed by a dinner which was presided over by Dr. Abraham Rees and attended by all the Trustees and a numerous company of visitors, including Matthew Wood, Esq., the Lord Mayor, afterwards M.P. for London (the father of the late Lord Chancellor Hatherley), William Smith, Esq., M.P. for Norwich, William Lister, M.D., Samuel Pett, M.D., and other distinguished Non-conformists. Dr. Lindsay's eloquent oration must have delighted those who heard it, and may still be read with pleasure. Its main object was to show the grounds of their veneration for the character and memory of Dr. Daniel Williams. In referring to the various objects of the Trust, Dr. Lindsay gave the foremost place to its educational branches. Numerous schools had been constantly at work giving daily instruction to about two hundred children; a long line of students had received university or collegiate education; books in English and Welsh had been annually distributed; material assistance and encouragement had been extended to schoolmasters and preachers, especially in the Principality of Wales; and pecuniary assistance had been yearly granted to widows and ministers in broken health or straitened circumstances; whilst the Library in Redcross-street had been highly useful in a way which had never been contemplated or dreamt of by the founder. Ever since its erection it had been, to use the words of Dr. Lindsay, "the place of public business to the collective body of the Dissenters in this great city; a place in which noble stands have often been made against ecclesiastical usurpation; in which generous efforts have originated to promote the extension of religious privileges to men of all persuasions; a central point, round which the friends of religious freedom in every part of Britain rally."

"Having thus laid before you," continued Dr. Lindsay, "a short account of the objects which Dr. Williams contemplated, in a scheme so wisely planned, so nobly endowed—permit me to say (and from the small share of merit that I can claim in the management, I trust I may be exempted from the imputation of vanity when I do say confidently that no trust was ever discharged with more care, or applied with more disinterested fidelity to fulfil the intentions of the founder."

149. REV. ARCHIBALD BARCLAY, LL.D. (1816-56).—A learned and useful member of the Trust, taking special interest in the Glasgow and Divinity Scholarships, son-in-law of Dr. James Lindsay (No. 114 supra). Relinquishing the ministry he accepted an appointment in the office of the Hudson Bay Company. He died in 1856.

150. REV. WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX (1819-35).—Minister of Parliament-Court Chapel from

* It is much to be regretted that the disruption of the united body of the Three Denominations about fifty years ago, resulting in the separation of the Presbyterians from the Independents and Baptists, greatly narrowed the usefulness of the Library both as a Club and as a Reading-room; but this defect was compensated for by increased attention to the Scholarships and Schools, which were much improved by the efforts of the Trustees, and especially by the great and unflinching interest taken in them by the late learned JAMES YATES and DAVID DAVISON.

1817 to 1824, and thenceforth until 1852 of South-place Chapel, Finsbury, which was built for him. Member of Parliament for Oldham from 1847 to 1863. Equally eminent as a writer and orator. Born at Uggheshall, Suffolk, March 1, 1786. Educated for the Ministry at Homerton College (1806-9). First settled at Fareham, Hants, with an Orthodox congregation; but after twelve months his theological opinions having undergone a change he withdrew, and formed another society there. In 1812 he became minister of the Unitarian congregation at Chichester, and removed thence in 1817 to London, where his eloquence soon attracted a brilliant and overflowing congregation. Hazlitt described him as "a speaker as fluent as Irving, with a sweeter voice, and with a more animated beneficent countenance." In 1832 he commenced writing for the Press, through which he exercised great influence ever after. The letters of "Publicola" in the Weekly Dispatch, and of "A Norwich Weaver Boy" in The League, were from his powerful pen. He took an active part in establishing The London and Westminster Review, and was for some time proprietor of the Monthly Repository. In theological opinions he was in advance of the English Unitarians of his day, and was to them very much what Theodore Parker was to the Unitarians of the United States, and for that pre-eminence he paid a similar penalty. He was the idol of his own congregation, who, after being instructed and delighted by his ministry for a quarter of a century, said to him in an address, "When juster views shall prevail of the duty of man to God, and of man to man; when wiser estimates shall be formed of life and of death; when in public, the welfare of the human family shall take precedence of class legislation; and in religion, bigotry and intolerance shall give place to charity and love—then will be found foremost in the records of the wise and great, by whom these blessings have been wrought, the name of William Johnson Fox." He resigned Dr. Williams's Trust in 1836. He died on June 3, 1864, aged seventy-eight years. His principal works have since been published in a Memorial Edition in twelve vols., except his "Lectures to the Working Classes," which were intended to form four additional volumes. There is a portrait of him in chalk taken in 1845 by his only daughter, Mrs. Bridell Fox, a fine engraving of a facsimile of which has been contributed by her to the collection made by the writer of these notes. A portrait in oils was painted by the same artist about twelve years later, her father being then upwards of seventy years of age.

SUNDAY AT THE GROSVENOR GALLERY. — Sunday last was the Sunday Society's public day at this gallery, and the usual large attendance on these occasions was this time greater than the building could accommodate at one time, but by dint of careful management 3,320 persons passed through the gallery between six and half-past eight. Many went away without getting in, but the gallery was kept open until all who waited had an opportunity of passing through. In spite of the crowding the greatest good humour and order prevailed, and Mr. Mark H. Judge, the hon. sec., was loudly cheered when he appealed to the people to pass out quickly on account of the block in Bond-street, and referred to the opening of the gallery as an imposing demonstration in favour of opening the British Museum and similar institutions on Sunday rather than a visit to see the pictures. It was evident from the names obtained to the special petition placed in the gallery for signature that the majority of the visitors (who had obtained their tickets by written application) belonged to the artisan class. Many public men, however, were present, including the President of the Society, Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., Mr. L. S. Courtney, M.P., Mr. J. F. Cheetham, M.P., Mr. F. W. Buxton, M.P., Mr. T. B. Potter, M.P., Professor John Marshall, F.R.S., Professor Corfield, Mr. Mark H. Judge, and Mr. H. Rutherford. Several members of Parliament who had been specially invited to witness the result of the Sunday opening had conclusive evidence that the privilege was appreciated, as not caring to wait in Bond-street for an hour, as many members did, they were unable to get into the gallery.

THE Metropolitan Board of Works has granted permission to erect a statue to the memory of the late Thomas Carlyle on the Chelsea Embankment, on a site immediately opposite to Cheyne-row.

PRIESTCRAFT.

[A Paper read by the Rev. JOHN WRIGHT, B.A. at the meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, held on March 14, 1882.]

What is the true position of the minister of religion? What are the essential characteristics that distinguish him from other men? What is his relation to the people to whom he ministers? What are his rights and privileges, what his duties and the demands justly made upon him? Such are the questions that meet us when we approach the consideration of my present subject.

The answers practically given to these questions, by the usages of various Christian Churches, disclose the existence of two theories on the subject, entirely different and mutually antagonistic. The one theory says:—"The minister of religion is a man set apart from his brethren by a mystical operation which makes him the especial channel of communication between God and man; in his official capacity he is raised above human weakness, and invested with superhuman power and authority." The other theory says:—"He is a man who devotes himself to religious study and work, and who thus becomes peculiarly capable of leading the people's devotion, and of speaking to them, in public and private, words of religious counsel and admonition." The one calls him a priest; the other calls him a minister. The one regards him as a master; the other treats him as a brother. The one demands from him a life of asceticism; the other encourages him to do all that may become a man. The one bows in reverence to his office; the other pays him respect, only so far as his individual character and accomplished work earn it for him. The one gives rise to a priestly order, separated from the rest of mankind; the other reduces to its lowest point the distinction between clergy and laity. The one leads on to Priestcraft with all its connected evils; the other fosters individualism and the broadest liberty.

The Roman Catholic Church (in this as in other matters boldly making its practice consistent with its theory) shows the working of the former view. In it the priest in right of his office becomes more than an ordinary man. He has the power of working a constantly repeated miracle, as often as he celebrates the Mass. He alone can perform the solemn rites of religion. He has authority to receive confession, allot penance and grant absolution, and by his ministrations to give the dying an entrance to heaven, and by his prayers for the dead to procure for them release from purgatory. In order that he may hold this exalted position, there is demanded from him an entire separation from the world. No secular occupations or earthly pleasures are permitted to him; no family ties give him sympathy with his fellows; no wife cheers his home; no children gather round his knees. His order is supposed to be raised above the rest of humanity, by its sanctity, with duties, interests, and powers none outside of it can share. Hence this priestly order naturally devotes itself, in its corporate capacity, to the exaltation of the Church, sees an enemy in every one who interferes with this object, and uses every means to consolidate its power and extend its influence. Where there are priests there must be priestcraft.

The opposite theory is professed by English Nonconformists. No ordination is needed to set apart their ministers; no special education even is an essential condition to them; any man who shows that he can fulfil the duties of the position is welcomed to it. The only consecration needed is that of the Spirit of God. The minister may even unite with his ministry attention to some secular employment, if he can successfully fill both spheres of activity. His utterances on questions of theology carry no weight with them, except so far as he can prove to the understanding of his hearers their accordance with a recognised standard of doctrine. His words and actions alike are freely criticised. Appointed by the people, he has to work with and for the people, and his success depends entirely on the extent to which he can command the respect and meet the felt wants of his fellow worshippers. They care for the man, not for the office.

I need not dwell on the manner in which the Established Church of England, in accordance with its general spirit of compromise, attempts to combine the two theories; the High Churchman trying to reproduce the Roman Catholic system, and the Low Churchman inclining to that of the Nonconformist, while there are many noble examples, in all sections of the Church, of clergymen who show by their conduct that they conceive all human interests have a claim on them, and that all human occupations and amusements (if in themselves innocent) are permitted to them. Nor can I pause to remark on the close connection between sacramental forms of religion and priestcraft, the one leading inevitably to the other. I must hasten on to the practical part of my subject—our own position and duties in reference to priestly claims and pretensions.

In England the spirit of Priestcraft can hardly raise its head, at least plainly and avowedly. If ever it does so, in any of the great centres of population, it is sure to meet with rebuke and protest. But in rural districts, and where no strong, healthy public opinion is powerful as a check, instances frequently occur that show that even in this free country priests cannot exist without seeking to lord it over their brethren, and that they inevitably cherish a spirit of intolerance. The fact that it is now proposed to establish a direct religious test for members of the houses of Parliament shows that the friends of religious liberty cannot yet afford to become negligent, as though the battle was over. Could that proposal be carried, there would be perfect consistency in extending it to corporations, magistracies and in fact to all public offices. And there is no doubt that the same men who now demand a declaration of belief in God as a condition of admission to office, would, if they had the power, equally demand a declaration of belief in the Trinity, or of conformity to the Church, and the tide of progress would at once be driven back half a century. I think then we may easily underestimate the danger to which even we are exposed in reference to the terrible evils of Priestcraft and Intolerance. But we see comparatively little of them in this country. Go to France or Italy, especially go to Rome and the South of Italy, and you will find, in spite of all the reforms and improvements of late years, a blind bigotry, a fierce fanaticism, a domineering dictation, a perpetual domestic interference on the part of the priests, combined with stupid ignorance and silly superstition among their followers, such as make it difficult to understand how any true religion can coexist with these things. I know that many liberals here think the words and deeds of the anti-clericals in France and Italy exaggerated and violent; that is because here we do not see and feel the evils. I found my strong feeling on this question not on vague impressions, but on what I have seen and heard among the people who are experiencing the wrongs which priestcraft can still inflict after all the checks it has received. The father of a family, for instance, wishes to send his boys to a secular school, in preference to a priests' school. But he finds himself thwarted by their mother, who, frightened by her confessor into the belief that her own and her children's salvation depends on the decision, makes herself miserable till he yields; thus the man finds there is a power outside the home, against which he cannot contend without a vast amount of domestic misery, and he has to submit his children to instruction which tends to alienate them from himself. A man holds himself aloof from the Church; as a consequence, he is subject to every kind of petty persecution; his domestic servants are induced to leave him, or else act as spies on him; his business transactions are interfered with; if it is in a small town or country district he is virtually "Boycotted," till he makes peace with the Church by a liberal annual subsidy to the priests. A man is known to be a freethinker, and throughout life to refuse all priestly ministrations, but when he comes to die, if his female relatives are devotees; his sick room is filled with priests; when he is too weak too resist, and his last moments are disturbed by what are to him offensive ceremonies. Many similar individual experiences might be mentioned; and when from individuals we turn to the community, we find the priesthood the opponent of all reform. Whenever any advance is proposed, social, intellectual, or political, they are its determined enemies. A French writer, comparing the amounts of crime and of priestly influence in the several departments, relative to the population of each, draws this conclusion:—"The departments the most criminal are those the most devout, so that the maximum of crime coexists with the maximum of faith; the most criminal departments are those in which the people spend most on masses and tapers, also where they spend least on books, on paper, and on soap."

In saying all this, I do not desire to speak against the priests as men. Very many of them are virtuous, pious, and charitable, and deserve our sincere respect. But I have been speaking of the system, and that system is, I am convinced, from all I have heard and seen, the greatest evil under which a country can groan, worse even than a despotic government, for that only enslaves men's bodies, while priestcraft also tyrannises over their minds and souls.

The injury to the priests themselves is scarcely less. They are in danger of becoming either hypocrites or ascetics. If the lower nature is so strong that the priest cannot succeed in being all that the Church demands of him, he contents himself with seeming. If he is too noble to assume a virtue when he has it not, he crushes the body by means of austerities which carry with them dire penalties, alike to body and mind. Rare are the instances in which all the priestly duties can be performed, all the priestly observances can be attended to, year after year, with the mind entirely occupied, the soul deeply touched, throughout the ceremonies. Hence the formality with which the rites are celebrated, the irreverent manner in which the most solemn acts of worship are gone through, showing that they have become to the priest a mere meaningless routine. The people meanwhile are led to believe they cannot by themselves draw nigh to God, to be content to possess a lower degree of purity and sanctity than that they ascribe to the priest, to imagine that what is necessary to him is not even required of them, and thus to rest satisfied with their poor achievements and not be ashamed of their shortcomings. On every side does priestcraft work evil.

It may at first sight appear that this subject is of little practical importance to us, that since our principles lead us to a system directly opposed to priestcraft, in relation to our ministers, we need no warning against it, and that any injurious manifestation of its spirit among other religious bodies in this country is sure to meet with an immediate rebuke from the free spirit of Englishmen. But even here a perpetual watchfulness and a frequent protest are required; it is only by a fixed determination not to yield one inch to any attempted usurpation, and by a systematic effort to tear up the roots of the evil among ourselves, that we can guard against a tendency which sometimes shows itself where we should least expect it. There was a time when this whole nation was bowed down beneath the yoke of priestly domination; all free thought was punished as a deadly sin; all individual opinion was a heresy, doomed both in this world and the next, and spiritual slavery was universal. As a nation we have freed ourselves; but most of us must know of individuals at the present moment, members of the Church of England, who never think for themselves, who crush down their intellects, naturally strong and quick, to obey the priest, who dare not enter a Dissenting place of worship or read a freethought book, and whose only answer to any question as to why they act or believe as they do, is because "the Father" tells them it is right. They have entirely lost their freedom, sunk their individuality, and are content to be blind puppets in the hands of their spiritual tyrants. Let me, then, suggest the means by which the members of a Free Church, such as Unitarians boast that they possess, may get rid of any relics of its spirit which priestcraft may have bequeathed to them, and may secure themselves against the dangers which human weakness and indolence and cowardice make ever recurring in the history of religion.

I. All words and phrases, all usages and forms, which encourage the notion of a distinction of class between the ministers of religion and other men tend to priestcraft. To call the minister "reverend," to see him in a peculiar dress, to think it necessary he should put on a gown before he enters a pulpit, and other such things, are said to be but trifles, as to which it is folly to raise a question. But such trifles, going on constantly, must produce an effect on the mind, and those who are accustomed to them from youth to manhood cannot but feel their influence. The fact that special priestly claims, in the Church of England, go hand in hand with special attention to ceremonial costume is an instructive warning. The costly vestments, and the frequent robing and unrobing, in an Italian cathedral, which excite a smile of contempt from an English spectator, are known by the astute priests who practice them to be an instrument for riveting the chains wherein they hold the souls of ignorant devotees. In the English Church again, the clergyman, who is called "Father," will be found to be one who exacts a slavish obedience from his followers. Who, then, can say that words and usages have no effect? Who can deny that we ought to inquire whether we are sufficiently on our guard, in reference to these things? If a minister of religion, dressed like other men, living like other men, called like other men, with all this can hold fast to himself the respect and even the reverence of a congregation, by the weight of his character, the purity of his life, the warmth of his piety, the worth of his work, he will have nothing of the priest about him, but he will produce a greater, wider and more lasting spiritual good than a multitude of priests can effect.

II. Every religious community that values freedom should encourage their ministers (not only permit but encourage them) to do everything that other men do, so far as there is no sin in it. Too often the minister is still treated as though he were something more or less than man. Actions, pursuits, amusements, freely permitted to the layman are forbidden to the minister. The phrase is still sometimes used in reference to an action—"there is no harm in it, but it is not exactly the thing for a minister." The authority of a priest is denied to him, but something of the asceticism of a priest is demanded from him. In opposition to all such tendencies we must maintain and practically enforce the truth, that all is right to the minister that is not wrong to the man. The limit, of course, is that other things must not take up so much of his time and attention as to interfere with his peculiar work. But this same limit exists to all men. The blacksmith at his forge, or the merchant in his counting-house, or the judge on the bench, is not justified in giving so much time to any pursuit outside his particular vocation as will interfere with its proper and successful performance. And the minister must see to it that his one great duty is not neglected for the sake of other work or of any form of recreation. But this is the only limit, and when this is attended to the most useful minister will be the one who lives and acts most like other men, taking his part in politics, social work and amusements, free from the evil of the world without trying to take himself out of the world.

III. In order to maintain the conviction that a minister is not a member of a separate class, but simply a layman, habitually doing religious work, other laymen must sometimes share this work with him. Many striking examples, in all Christian churches, prove what a mighty power for good is a truly religious man who, while doing well his part in the busy scenes of everyday life, yet finds time and power to give some of his efforts to spiritual work. Lay preachers, Sunday-school teachers, visitors of the poor, and moral reformers are a main element of strength in all our denominations. The ministers welcome them as fellow-workers. The priests even are glad of their help, within certain limits. But why should any limit be set? Why should not a thoughtful and pious layman read the Scriptures and offer up prayer in the congregation of his brethren? Why should he not sometimes preach, if he can do so to the edification of those who hear him? The Church of England allows the lessons to be read by laymen—why should not the Bible reading in all our chapels be undertaken by one or other of the congregation? Many can be found who can read at least as well as the minister. Where a liturgy is used, why should the minister always read prayers, to the exclusion of all the other worshippers? I know that many difficulties are suggested as to systematic lay preaching, but I believe they may all be overcome. There are instances in which they have been overcome, and whenever I hear of such useful lay preaching I rejoice in it, not only on account of the direct good that is done, but even more on account of its indirect effect in striking a blow at the notion that the minister is in any sense a priest. We acknowledge no consecration as necessary for our preachers but that of the Spirit of God. We believe that the true ordination is that of aspiration, faith and love. Let us consistently act up to our principles.

The natural and rightful tendency of the views I have now endeavoured to set forth is not to bring down the minister to a lower level, but to raise up the whole body of the people to the highest standard of piety and excellence—that each may be his own priest and lay on God's altar his own spiritual sacrifices—that there may be fulfilled to us the prayer of the prophet of old, "Would to God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his spirit upon them!"

BEDFORD CHAPEL, BLOOMSBURY.—The following are the chief paragraphs of a circular recently issued to his congregation by the Rev. S. A. Brooke:—

"I wish to draw the attention of the Members of the Congregation to the following matters, for which I ask their kind consideration:—

"1. I accepted last year the office of Principal of the Men and Women's College, at 29, Queen's-square. I undertook this business, not only because of my own interest in the welfare of the College, but also because I hoped to awaken the interest of my congregation in a good work. We have, owing to many circumstances, no organisations as other chapels have for performing useful, social, and charitable labour, and I have felt that this was a pity. The College supplied a means of employing, and to excellent purpose, the wealth or the leisure time of many persons who attend our services. Already much has been done by the congregation, but, in order that the work may be carried on with the certainty necessary for full usefulness, we need subscriptions; and I should be very grateful if those who care for the higher education of working-men and women would subscribe a yearly sum to the College. I have examined into the way the educational and social work is conducted, and I do not think that money can be better employed.

"2. I have been asked to undertake a class of young persons which should be analogous to that held before confirmation in the Church of England, in which direct teaching may be given with regard to Christian doctrine and practice. During the months of June and July, on Wednesday mornings and for eight weeks, I purpose to hold such a class at Bedford Chapel.

"3. I wish to establish, for men of all classes, an evening meeting once a fortnight for the discussion of various subjects of present interest, at which a paper shall be read on the chosen subject, and a conversation follow. Should a sufficient number of names be sent in to form a basis for beginning such a society, I will meet those who offer themselves as members and lay before them the plan on which I propose to conduct it. At present I intend that the meeting should take place every fortnight, on Tuesday evening, at half-past eight, and should be continued steadily during the winter months, and if possible through the spring and summer. Letters may be sent to Mr. R. A. Potts, 26, South Audley-street, or to Mr. C. Light, 122, Gower-street."

[The fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs refer to the expenditure of the Communion offertory; the improvement of the musical service; and the erection of a new east window at the cost of £200 in place of the present extremely ugly and insecure window.]

THE BURIALS ACT.—On Monday a case, the Queen v. the Rev. J. Hall, was decided before Baron Huddleston and Justice Bowen. The case arose out of proceedings taken under the Burials Act (43 and 44 Vict., cap. 41, sec. 10). An action was brought to compel the defendant to enter the burial of a Dissenter, named Louisa Drateford, upon the parish register of Shirdale, in Derbyshire, of which the defendant was rector. After a demurrer had been dismissed, the action was tried before Justice Stephen, and a mandamus issued upon the defendant to make the entry. Subsequently a peremptory mandamus was issued upon the defendant for the same purpose, and an answer was given that the entry had been made by the Rev. James Malby, officiating minister at Stonebroom Iron Church, in the defendant's parish. The plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for the attachment of the defendant upon the ground that such a return was not a compliance with the mandamus.—Mr. Bingham showed cause against, and Mr. Morley supported the rule.—Baron Huddleston considered that the defendant sought to evade the law in a manner which was not respectful to the Court, and directed that if a proper return were not made in a week attachment should issue.

MR. MILLAIS, R.A., has been elected a foreign Associate of the Paris Academy of Fine Arts.

Occasional Notes.

We are informed that the Rev. C. C. Coe has consented to relieve the Rev. H. W. Crosskey of his duty of reading a paper at the Conference on Wednesday morning on "The Development of the Religious Life within our Churches," in order that Mr. Crosskey may be at liberty to speak on the objects of the Conference at the Soirée to be held in the evening. The communion service, to be conducted by the Rev. W. Gaskell, will be held in Hope-street Church, at six o'clock on the evening of Tuesday, April 18.

A SPIRITED patriotic song has been written by Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the first verse only of which we were able to give a fortnight ago. The following is the whole song, which has been slightly modified from the original, in subservience to vocal purposes:—

First pledge our Queen, my friends, and then,
A health to England every guest;
He best will serve the race of men
Who loves his native country best!
May freedom's oak for ever last,
With larger life from day to day:
He loves the present and the past
Who lops the moulder'd branch away.
Hands all round! God the traitor's hope confound!
To the great cause of Freedom drink, my friends,
And the great name of England round and round.

To all the loyal hearts who long
To keep our English Empire whole!
To all our noble sons, the strong
New England of the Southern Pole!
To England under Indian skies,
To those dark millions of her realm!
To Canada whom we love and prize,
Whatever statesman hold the helm.
Hands all round! God the traitor's hope confound!
To the great cause of Freedom drink, my friends,
And the great name of England round and round.

To all our statesmen so they be True leaders of the land's desire!
To both our Houses, may they see
Beyond the borough and the shire!
We sailed wherever ship could sail,
We founded many a mighty State,
Pray God our greatness may not fail
Through craven fears of being great!
Hands all round! God the traitor's hope confound!
To the great cause of Freedom drink, my friends,
And the great name of England round and round.

PROFESSOR DAVID SWING, the popular preacher of Chicago, who has lately come over from dogmatic Orthodoxy to religious Liberalism, in an article in the Alliance of that city, reminds us that the system attempted by the Quakers, and we may add by Puritans generally, was too unkind to human nature to be what the world needed. "It forgot that man was by nature a lover of the beautiful, and must have beautiful music and beautiful sanctuaries, and an attractive sermon, and, in forgetting so much, Quakerism failed to be the practical form of religion which was demanded. It was a religion of honesty, but of nothing besides; and in this it was defective, for an honest man loves a beautiful house and fine clothes and good music. Unitarianism was a more symmetrical philosophy. It reacted against mere metaphysics without making a prosaic machine. It left man poetic and made him more moral—a religion of character and of taste." But Unitarianism, also, we may add, is defective in that element which appeals to man's taste and imagination, and we want a large accession of Broad Churchmen like Mr. Stopford Brooke to introduce more of that æsthetic element in which our services are sadly wanting. With few exceptions our chapels are cold and unattractive in the interior, however handsome in the exterior, and with only one or two exceptions are manifold liturgical services, correct and impressive as they are, seem to us to be wanting in richness, fulness, variety, and, above all, in perfect simplicity of tone. Among all our London Churches there are only two where the services at all approach our ideal of a tasteful and impressive ritual, and of one of these the building, both in the exterior and interior, is almost repulsive in its ugliness. Many of our country churches, in the North more especially, are stately structures, but the congregations seem to be afraid of warmth and colour and interior decorations, and the general effect is often chilling in the extreme.

And thus in some of the largest towns we retain that dreadful Dissenting service which is only attractive to those who have long been accustomed to "the one man system," and is mainly responsible, we verily believe, for the growing alienation of our young people and their secession to the Established Church, often without any real change of conviction. If we were thoroughly honest and outspoken at the coming Conference we should have very little "and all talk" about the progress of liberal ideas and the grandeur of our free position, but should have much serious discussion on the unsatisfactory position of our ministry—financial and otherwise; the declining state of too many of our congregations, and its causes and remedies; the apathy and indifference of a large number of our laity; the unattractiveness of our public worship; the slight hold we seem to have over our own young people. There might be much "searching of heart," and many protests against "self-criticism" and unpalatable facts, but the result would be more beneficial and lasting than could be attained by any conceivable amount of self-glorification.

M. RENAN lectured at the Sorbonne on Saturday night to a crowded audience on the subject, "What is a Nation?" One or two passages in the lecture had a practical bearing on some of the political questions of the day. According to M. Renan, a grave misunderstanding exists. People are apt to make a confusion between races and nations. France has become a nation because the Kings of France, with brutal disregard of the feelings and aspirations of the various races which settled in the country, welded them all into one compact mass. But other countries were not so fortunate, and this was particularly the case with Austria. He says:—

Under the crown of St. Stephen, the Magyars and the Slavs have remained as distinct as they were eight hundred years ago. Far from blending together the various elements of its dominions, the House of Hapsburg has kept separate and often opposed them to each other. In Bohemia the Tehek and the German elements are superposed, like oil and water in the same vessel. The Turkish policy of the separation of nationalities according to their religious faith has had far graver consequences. It has brought about the ruin of the East. Take any town like Salonica and Smyrna; you will find there five or six communities who hardly have anything in common, and all of whom have traditions and recollections of their own. Now, the essence of a nation is that all its individual members should have many points in common, and that all should have forgotten a good deal. No French citizen can tell whether he is a Burgundian, a Visigoth, or one of the Alani. Every French citizen should have cast into oblivion the St. Bartholomew and the massacres of the sixteenth century in the south.

Pursuing the development of his theory M. Renan proceeded to show that it was in virtue of its natural working that the unity of Italy had been helped by her successive defeats, and that Turkey had been demolished by her victories. Ethnographical considerations have, M. Renan contends, nothing to do with nationality, and he instances as a proof of this England, which he described as a mixture of Celtic and Germanic blood, the proportions of which are singularly difficult to define; Germany, where the Teutonic is largely blended with the Celtic and the Slav element; and Italy, where Greeks, Gauls, Etruscans, Pelasgians, and numberless other races have all lost their characteristic race affinities. Affinity of language, he contended, was no proof of common nationality, and he protested against the theory of German politicians, that German-speaking races were ipso facto part and parcel of the German nation.

We learn from the Boston Christian Register that on Sunday, Feb. 19, Mr. Robert Collyer preached in the pulpit of All Souls (Dr. Bellows's Church). His subject was "Remembrance;" and there were many tender and touching allusions to the dead pastor, who it now seems has gone away for a little while, but must surely return. Mr. Collyer strove to show how he would return and abide with us through the benignant influences of memory. On Tuesday evening a large Church meeting was held at All Souls, to consider the present situation and take action for the future. Mr. Eaton ably pointed out some of the lions in the path. Dr. Bellows's great name and fame, his personal attraction which drew strangers to hear him, his commanding position in the denomination makes it the less easy to perpetuate and strengthen his life-work. Some excellent resolutions were offered by Mr. Sedgwick, and approved by the society. Two separate sets of resolutions, from the Church of the Messiah, and the Church of the Saviour, Brooklyn, were also passed. It was finally resolved to pay the late pastor's salary up to April, 1882, and all funeral expenses, and also to give the congregation an opportunity to express its preference as to the settling of a minister. It is understood that the Rev. Brooke Herford has been invited to fill the pulpit of All Souls for three months, or until some one is obtained permanently. This gives pleasure to Mr. Herford's friends and admirers, who are numerous.

THE Christian World states that a novel church entertainment is reported from America as having been introduced by the young people of the Harlem Congregational Church, in Association Hall. This unique feature was a "broom drill" by seventeen young women, dressed in suits of white unbleached muslin, trimmed with Turkey-red and in Zouave hats. Under the lead of their captain, who was armed with an elongated feather duster, this band of Amazons went through the complete manual of arms, showing marked efficiency in the use of their special implements. They were especially formidable when they formed a hollow square and "charged brooms," their appearance suggesting that they would be dangerous assailants if provoked to the use of the broomstick. The novelty of the entertainment, says the reporter, made it peculiarly enjoyable to everybody present. The "broom drill" is likely to become the special attraction of church fairs, taking the place of the spelling-bee and other worn-out features of these entertainments. As to the novelty of the performance there can be little doubt; as to its being "peculiarly enjoyable," we can only imagine that everybody present had been let out from whatever corresponds to Earlwood Asylum in Harlem. If this kind of thing is to be the "special attraction" of church fairs, Heaven preserve us from such attractions.

HERE are two more passages, in addition to those we published last week, from Bishop Thirlwall's "Letters Literary and Theological." The first relates to the Establishment question, in reference to which the far-seeing Bishop, in a letter to Bishop Ewing, dated April 27, 1868, writes:—"I believe with you that 'the stream of tendency' is against the Established Churches, and will, sooner or later, sweep them all away. Whether the Church of England will gain or lose by that event must depend mainly on the constitution of the Disestablished Church. But the more immediately pressing question seems to me to be whether, before it is touched from without, the Church must not fall to pieces, rent by internal divisions. This would be the worst catastrophe of all, and our 'unions' and 'associations' seem to be doing all they can to bring it about."

IN a letter written in the last year of his life, addressed to the Rev. Professor Plumtre, Bishop Thirlwall remarks:—"I never was less satisfied with the present condition of Anglican theology; never, as it appeared to me, had our divines more need of a larger measure of modesty and reverence to prevent them from believing that they had mastered the whole counsel of God, or as much of it as is still accessible to human investigation, while they aimed at nothing more than vamping up an orthodox phraseology so as to give it an air of novelty. But it also seems to me that the present state of parties among us is peculiarly unfavourable to any attempt in this direction, not only because public attention is absorbed by the 'infinitely little,' without even studying that, but because all parties alike are afraid of incurring the reproach of doctrinal innovation, and, above all, of scepticism and rationalism, which they would gladly cast on one another."

WE are old-fashioned enough to dislike mixing up very secular festivities—which are well enough in their way—with serious congregational affairs, and we have more than once protested against the growing tendency to introduce amateur theatricals and dances in connection with meetings convened chiefly for religious purposes. We read this week a full and glowing report of speeches from several earnest ministers and laymen at one of our country meetings, and while we exalted almost to the seventh-heaven at the pleasing accounts of the prosperity and prospects of "the cause," we confess that it "gave us a turn," as the phrase is, to come upon the striking contrast in the two closing sentences:—

The meeting concluded with the audience singing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

The room was afterwards cleared for dancing, which was kept up for some time to the strains of Mr. T. Ford's band.

Here was indeed a fall from heaven to earth! The young people no doubt enjoyed the dance, but surely they might have had it on a more appropriate occasion. "O reform it altogether."

VARIOUS devices have been adopted to induce children to attend Sunday-schools with a fair degree of regularity, we mean, of course, children who do not care to go, and who cannot join heartily in singing

"The Sunday-school, the Sunday-school, Oh, 'tis the place I love."

It has been reserved to one Columbus Tyler, a recently-deceased millionaire of Boston, U.S.A., to devise a novel method. He has left a sum of £30,000, out of which twelve shillings is to be placed annually to the credit of every boy who, between the ages of five and twenty shall attend Sunday-school regularly, the money to be paid them when they reach the age of twenty-five. Girls who attend regularly between the ages of five and eighteen receive a like sum, to be paid when twenty-one years old. We are afraid that some of the irreverent will hardly think it "good enough," still the object that Columbus had in view was a good one. At the same time we do not feel inclined to advise a repetition of this kind of promoting Sunday-school education; there is too much of a flavour of bribery about it.

MRS. CLARA M. BISBEE, who pursued for three years at Harvard Divinity School the regular course of study, and would have received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity if Harvard were as just to women as it is to men, has asked for ordination to the Christian ministry. The services took place at Lyceum Hall, Dorchester, near Boston, on Sunday, February 26. Mrs. Bisbee is the widow of the Rev. Herman Bisbee, who about eight or nine years ago was for a short time minister of the temporary chapel at Stepney, and at that period she occasionally occupied her husband's place in the pulpit, much to the gratification of her hearers. Why should not women preach, when duly qualified? We know of no profession for which they are so well adapted as for the ministry, and are inclined to think that if about one-third of our ministers would retire in their favour it might be a real gain to our cause.

AT the banquet which the Lord Mayor gave on Saturday to commemorate the Smoke Abatement Exhibition, Sir Frederick Leighton brought a special indictment against London smoke on the score of "the interminable hours, days, and weeks of enforced idleness which he and many a brother painter spent in the continuous contemplation of the ubiquitous yellow fog." Mr. Lowell, however, pointed out that this fog produces some very fine atmospheric effects, and Turner must often have studied the darkened skies of London. So, too, it was in the midst of London fogs and in the dreariest of London back streets that William Blake (who "looked through his eye, not with it") saw some of his brightest visions. Even Mr. Ruskin has discovered poetry in smoke, and there is a striking passage in "Fors Clavigera," where the smoke is described as "looking as if it were made of dead men's souls." Mr. Ruskin has made another valuable discovery. He happened to be at Cannon-street Station a few years ago very early in the morning, and to his astonishment he found that "it is still possible to see blue sky entirely pure in London." But all this is no great comfort to us when the smoke blinds us and chokes us, and with its mixture of dust and fog brings on serious pulmonary complaints, which compel some of us to flee to a warmer clime.

Reviews.

Onesimus: Memoirs of a Disciple of St. Paul.
By the Author of "Philochristus." London: Macmillan and Co. 1882.

This is the work of a rich and accomplished mind, of one capable of close reasoning, logical argument, clear statement; and yet at the same time not quite free from a tendency to substitute feeling for thought in a few instances where the latter light burns dim. The spirit of the volume is good and its moral tendency is pure; for it inculcates a Christianity in which its native and original elements of sympathy, love, and charity are brought into prominence and the secondary things of dogmas, forms, and creeds are made subordinate. In the opening chapters it has interesting descriptions of Greek scenery and Greek life; and though many of these are borrowed from authors long after the time of Onesimus, yet they harmonise with the ideas of the preceding period and throw light upon it. They are borrowings honestly avowed and judiciously used. The memoirs are of course fanciful. Of Onesimus no one knows anything, except from a brief mention of his mere name in the Epistle to the Colossians and a little more at large in Paul's letter to Philemon. He had been a slave to Philemon; and having committed some fault or other and incurred the anger of his master, he had run away. After many wanderings and sufferings he came in contact with Paul, and under his influence embraced Christianity. By the instrumentality of the same apostle he was ultimately reconciled to Philemon, his old master, and sent back to his former home in Colossæ. In these memoirs it is assumed that he was of gentle though of unknown birth, that his elementary education in the house of his foster-mother had been very good, and that afterwards in the service of Philemon he had enjoyed opportunities of cultivating and refining his mind to a high degree, and of attaining to a considerable amount of learning. This being the intellectual character of Onesimus, the author of this volume has, in our judgment, committed a great mistake and inconsistency in making this poor escaped slave, but most gentle and refined man, to fall in the course of his runaway, homeless wanderings into the very coarsest, grossest, vulgar forms of sin. This is against natural probability and metaphysical law. Men of intellectual refinement may possibly fall into grievous evils of character and conduct; but when they do there is always some degree of outward decency and respectability, some trace of the former refinements characterising even the evil which they do. But strange to say, this Onesimus, the man of taste, the clear reasoner, the elegant scholar, is represented in his wanderings as attaching himself as a fife-player to an itinerant, begging Priest of Cybele and his troop of dancing girls, mingling in their wild and sensual orgies, and subsequently, on his arrival at Rome, hiring himself out by the hour as a professional jester and buffoon at banquets and symposia. To our thinking there is something absurd in this. An Oxford professor, an M.A., an LL.D., a man of intellectual eminence might possibly under some very dire temptation fall for a while into some grievous sin, and so lose a large measure of self-respect; but imagine him going about as clown in a travelling circus, as a mountebank in the streets, or as a fiddler in the drinking booths of a country fair! He might possibly do much worse things than any of these, but these things he would not do.

This volume in its theological aspects has a critical, rationalistic, sceptical part on the one hand, and a constructive and conservative part on the other. The critical and rationalistic argument is conducted by Onesimus in his "Letters to Artemidorus on the Doctrine of the Jews and Christians" in the third book. Nothing can be sounder and more searching in argument, more clear in expression, and more dignified and calm in tone than these letters. They are admirable. They overturn a great deal hitherto regarded as historical in Christianity; they cut away large fragments of the merely marvellous, but they leave uninjured the natural and the true.

But when Onesimus meets with Paul and sees in him the beautiful side of Christianity he changes his mental attitude and mental tone. He leaves off reasoning and rationalistic inquiry and becomes emotional, and seems to endeavour to reconstruct by feeling a large portion of the very edifice he had previously demolished by argument. He becomes Christian under the influence of Paul, and builds up a religion on the basis of the teaching of that great apostle. The model was a good one in respect to the fine qualities of sincerity and earnestness; it was good also in catholicity and breadth; it was good in practical application of high principles to the daily conduct of life; it was good inasmuch as Paul, personally, was one of the purest, noblest, most generous and magnanimous of men; but it was not altogether good, in our humble opinion, inasmuch as there was in the mind of Paul (judging only from what are supposed to be his writings) a certain tendency to over subtlety, a not very extensive knowledge of the history of humanity generally, of the development of religious ideas, and the influence of nation upon nation—a looseness and want of connection in his style (the words being often tied together when the ideas were not), and a sort of involuntary cropping out now and then of doubtful dogmas even in teaching which, as a whole, eloquently declared the superiority of simple faith in God and purity of life above any formulated dogmas whatever.

Even then the noble Paul, much as we honour him, is not to be followed in all things. For our own parts, we would not engage to follow precisely in the track of any guide whatever, either in past or present time. Even Jesus himself, highly as we revere him, must be followed with judgment and discrimination. All the great and beautiful souls in the past were as liable to receive, from national and local influences, some slight push or bias out of the line of the exactly true, as we are in our day to be deflected more or less by the environments in which we live. It is always safest, we think, to go humbly and prayerfully to the Great Supreme Himself. He who vouchsafed some measure of His light to the sages of old will also give some guiding beam to the children of to-day, provided they humbly open their spirits to receive it. Not that we are unthankful for human help; we greatly need it; but then it must be offered as help, and not forced upon us as authority. We like to see "lights set upon a hill," a little brighter than the lights below; but when we look at them we think of the light that is higher than the hill. We reverence the Divine when it appears in humanity, chiefly because it tells of something more Divine which is above humanity. For ourselves, we avow that we do not like the idea of Mediatorship which seems to pervade the public prayer of all sects. We do not like the words "by" and "in"—"in the name of,"—"through," and "as the disciples of," &c.—all implying the necessity of some intermediate Power. Has God withdrawn from the survey of the worlds, and delegated the management of them to a Mediator? Must a prayer, like a State document, go through the hands of a minister before it can reach the throne? We think not. If there be forms and ceremonies in Heaven they are somewhat different, we hope, from those in the world.

Onesimus, in this volume, even after his zealous adoption of Christianity, is still haunted now and then by one or two rationalistic notions as to what is reliable in Gospel tradition, and what is doubtful supplement; but religious feeling having gained in him an ascendancy over religious thought, he stops the process of critical inquiry into theological matters. He devotes himself to practical Christianity; he becomes in time Bishop of Berea, and finally meets the doom of martyrdom at Smyrna.

The writer has gone a little out of his way to introduce some of the sentiments of Epictetus. We wish he had said less or more, or nothing at all, of that great philosopher; for what is said does not by any means do him justice. It leaves the impression of a hard, stony being who had petrified himself into a state of unnatural indifference to suffering, and banished all emotion from his heart. Such a character is impossible. It seems to be the intention of Providence that we should have, in the course of our education in this world, a somewhat hard experience of difficulties and pains, and that we should acutely feel them. We may bear them with magnanimity, but it is vain to seek to rise entirely above them into insensibility or indifference. Epictetus was a true hero in strength of righteous will and calm endurance; but in his bosom, as in other bosoms, there was still the throbbing, yearning, human heart. Its emotions were controlled, but not destroyed.

The literary character of this volume is of a high order; its style is excellent, its intention and spirit noble. The theological opinions, never obtrusive, but peeping out now and then accidentally and unconsciously as it were, do not exactly correspond with our own. Nevertheless, we have a sincere admiration for the writer's great intellectual power, and a deep sympathy with his all-embracing charity. E. A.

Religion in the Heavens; or, Mythology Unveiled in a Series of Lectures. By Logan Mitchell, a Follower of Nature. London: Freethought Publishing Company. 1881.

The distinct purpose of this work, as abundantly shown in its treatment of the subject, is to pour contempt upon all religion, especially on the Jewish and Christian religions. These are denounced as nothing more than a farrago of astronomical myths and fables, which have been perverted from their original meaning by cunning priests, who have duped the people into the belief, as history, of fictions which have no element whatever of historical truth. The book is purely destructive of all religious faith, reverence, trust and hope. The vocabulary of denunciation is well nigh, if not completely, exhausted in its vituperative pages. All religions, as commonly accepted and understood, are but a medley of ignorance, fraud, folly, imposture and absurdity. None are such knaves as the "priests," by whom are meant all ministers of religion, and none so ignorant, weak-minded and silly as those who believe in them. The writer is as confident and dogmatical as any of the "priests" whom he so unsparringly condemns, and the tone of his book is offensive from its mingled arrogance and levity.

The work consists of six lectures, the subjects of which are Miracles, Christian Supernaturalism, The Christian Fathers, Pagan Allegories, Christian Superstition (two lectures). The lectures are followed by "A Dialogue, Physiological and Theological," and the work concludes with a copious index to the miscellaneous contents of the book.

The extravagance of this volume will be its sufficient condemnation with any thoughtful fair-minded reader. Those only will approve of the author's style who are accustomed to rail at all religion as folly and imposture. But those who seek to distinguish between what is true and what is false in religion—between what is hurtful to man and what is helpful to him as a tempted, struggling, aspiring moral being, will turn away dissatisfied and pained.

The question which this book and others like it suggests to us is this:—Granting that the religions of the world had their origin in the dim and distant past, thousands of years ago, in astronomical myths and fancies, and in adoration of the hidden powers of nature, supposed to be represented by certain objects, is that any reason why men should throw aside religion to-day as a mistaken, useless, worn out thing of the past? We cannot see that it is, because religion as it is understood by the thoughtful, cultured, devout, man to-day is something altogether different from the crude myth, the idle fancy of ancient barbarism. That myth, that fancy, was only the expression—childish, absurd, or whatever you like to call it—of an undying sentiment in man—the religious sentiment. The myth has faded away like a thousand other dreams of the past, but the sentiment which gave it birth lives still. The shell has been cast away, but the kernel remains. The old attire has been thrown aside for a dress more in accord with modern ideas. That is all. Religion as it is apprehended by the cultivated rational mind to-day is scarcely affected by any amount of learned disquisition as to the origin of certain beliefs in the remote past. They may have been all that has been alleged, but what of that? Because an ignorant age formed an ignorant conception of the universe, and allowed its reverence to express itself in irrational forms and barbarous rites, shall an educated age abandon its juster and more adequate apprehension of things, its purer faith, its higher aspiration, its diviner trust? Shall the higher development of religion in rational Theism be rejected to-day, because the beginnings of religious thought in the early ages of the world were of the lowest, crudest kind? Certainly not, we say. Yet that is the demand which this book practically makes. "See," the writer says in effect, "in what absurd fancies and cruel superstitions and low idolatry your Christian faith originated. Throw it aside then, and have done with it. It is bad and worthless altogether"? We do not see that the conclusion follows from the premiss, even granting the premiss to be true. What the book before us leads us to ponder—the idea which it brings prominently out—is the marvellous development of religious thought from the low idolatry, immoral rites, and mythic worship of ancient times to the spiritual religion of Channing, Parker, and Martineau. The stride is enormous, and it should make us thankful that we belong to the age of higher and purer thought. Even this book may render good service if it leads men's minds into this track of thought—if it induces them to consider how religious ideas have advanced with men's advancing knowledge and intelligence, as the ages and centuries have rolled by.

What specially offends us in this work is the low unworthy motives and aims which it attributes to all who have been concerned in the teaching and upholding of religion. They are all self-seeking knaves and impostors. They have made the people their dupes just for their own selfish ends. Now this broad sweeping condemnation we believe to be utterly unjust. It surprises us that any intelligent writer should be so completely oblivious of the devotion, heroism, philanthropy, and self-denying labours of thousands of religious teachers of every age. How they toiled for human good, even to the sacrifice of their lives, is utterly ignored by our author, as if no record of it existed. He sees nothing in the religious world but ignorance, selfishness, and fraud. Written in this spirit and taking this view, his book affords striking evidence that the bigots are not all on the side of religion, but are to be found, no less pronounced, on the opposite side as well. There is a prejudice anti-religious quite as partial, bigoted, and one-sided as that which is called religious, and of that fact the book before us affords the clearest proof.

One line more. The Freethought Publishing Company seem to have undertaken a great enterprise, the overthrow of all religion, by convincing the people that it is an utter delusion, a "cunningly devised fable," which priests invented for their own profit, and imposed on their deluded followers expressly to keep them in mental bondage. The said Company would have men believe that religion is a lie, and the religious teacher an impostor. We venture to think they have undertaken an impossible task. What we want is religious reform, not the destruction, root and branch, of religious faith and hope. The work of reform is making progress, and with the improving education and growing intelligence of the people it will surely advance in the future with accelerated speed. The old superstitions have died or are dying out, but we have no apprehensions for the future of religion itself. Human nature must be radically changed before reverence, faith, trust, hope, and aspiration; the essentials of the religious sentiment become foreign to it. Let the Christian religion be freed from the superstitions and absurdities that have been associated with it and the influence of the pure rational faith that would remain would be benign and ennobling, without any corrupt or debasing alloy. Such a faith is being taught at the present time by liberal religious thinkers under the form of Christian Theism. By Christian Theism we mean a belief in God imbued with the highest Christian spirit—in accord with the purest noblest thought of Christ. It is true this belief at present is held only by the few, but it is also true that it is finding acceptance with an increasing number of minds, many of whom have been led to it through the path of perplexing doubts, and after a temporary eclipse of faith. In fine, we hold that, notwithstanding the world's superstitious and religious follies and errors, there is such a thing as rational religion, and that it is quite possible to arrive at a reasonable religious faith. We also hold that such a faith is more helpful to the higher nature of man than any other influence or agency whatever. C. F. B.

Literary Notes.

MR. SERJEANT BALLANTINE'S "Reminiscences" are complete, and in the printer's hands. They will be published about Easter by Messrs. Bentley.

THE Academy says that Dr. C. Von Hoefler will publish shortly, with Herr Braumüller, of Vienna, a monograph, chiefly from hitherto unknown Spanish sources, on "The Luther of Spain," Don Antonio de Acuna.

Notes and Queries states that besides the recent transfer to the British Museum of the Bewick drawings, there is other good news for the collector. Mr. Robert Robinson, of Newcastle, is about to issue a volume containing upwards of one hundred Bewick cuts from the original blocks. None of the blocks are in the least worn, as but few impressions, comparatively speaking, have been taken from them.

The death is announced of Miss Elizabeth Hamilton, the daughter of the Scottish metaphysician, Sir William Hamilton, of whose life and philosophy she furnished an account in the new edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica." Miss Hamilton was one of the foremost promoters of the movement in Scotland for the University education of women. She went to Germany about a year ago, with a view to preparing a work on the philosophy of Hermann Lotze.

LORD RONALD GOWER is about to publish in a weekly journal, under the title "Vieux Salons," an autobiography, which will include accounts of many eminent persons now living.

PROFESSOR MOMMSEN has left Berlin for Italy. It is believed that he is going to re-collect his notes for the history of Rome under the Emperors—notes which were consumed by the fire two years ago.

The catalogue of the Digby manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, by the Rev. W. D. Macray, is now ready for press, and, it is expected, will be shortly published by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press.

MR. GARDNER, of Paisley, has received so many offers of support for the Scottish Review which he proposes to print as a vehicle for the expression of "the higher religious and theological thought of Scotland," that its establishment may be considered as certain.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT will contribute a preface to the English edition of the "Life of Frederick Douglass," which will shortly appear.

In the official "Victorian Year Book," lately published, it is noted that the total distance which a telegraph message travels between Melbourne and London is 12,695 miles, of which 2,704 miles, or about one-fifth, is represented by land lines on the Australian Continent. As a noteworthy example of speed the compiler cites the case of the special message from the Governor to Queen Victoria, on the 1st of October, 1881, announcing the opening of the Melbourne International Exhibition. This message, consisting of seventy-eight words, was sent from Melbourne to Balmoral in twenty-three minutes, including all stoppages.

BRIXTON RISE.—An influential and well-attended meeting was held at Dr. Channing-Pearce's Museum on Monday afternoon to promote the election of ladies as Poor-law Guardians. The Rev. J. Coxhead, M.A., of the London School Board, occupied the chair. Three ladies who are candidates for election on the Lambeth Board—Miss Eva Muller, Miss Lord and Miss Whitehead—addressed the meeting in a very interesting manner, stating their views and qualifications. Resolutions were moved and seconded by the Revs. J. Worthington, T. L. Marshall, Miss H. Muller, member of the London School Board, Mrs. Brookes, Mr. G. Washington Lyon and others. The whole proceedings were hearty and unanimous.

CANTERBURY.—At an influential meeting held at Canterbury on Tuesday—Dean Payne Smith presiding—Mr. T. Sidney Cooper, R.A., expressed his intention of presenting to the city in the course of a few days the Gallery of Art which he founded ten or twelve years ago, and in which he has ever since given his gratuitous instruction to students. The only condition made by the generous donor is that a mere nominal fee shall be charged to the artisan classes for tuition, the original object with which the gallery was built having been the teaching of the art of drawing to poor boys. The meeting determined to convert the gallery into a school of art, and to affiliate it to the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. Mr. Cooper announced that he had stipulated in his will that the last work on which he might be engaged at the time of his decease, together with his palette and brush, should be brought to the gallery and kept there.

A rich discovery of Lacustrine relics has just been made at Steckborn, on Lake Constance. They consist of flint and bone implements, pottery, bones of animals now extinct, and a quantity of wheat and oats. The relics have been placed in the Frauenfeld Museum.

ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.

At the recent meeting of the body of English Presbyterian ministers in and near the cities of London and Westminster, to which we referred last week, the following Address was adopted:—

"To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty."

"May it please your Majesty, we, the body of English Presbyterian Ministers residing in and near the cities of London and Westminster, would avail ourselves of our ancient privilege to express our heartfelt sympathy with your Majesty, and congratulations at your Majesty's deliverance from the terrible peril in which your Majesty has been placed.

"All your Majesty's subjects are filled with grief and abhorrence at an attempt on your Majesty's life should have been made, and with thankfulness and joy that it has left your Majesty and your royal daughter, the Princess Beatrice, unharmed.

"If it were possible wholly to guard one in your Majesty's exalted position from a danger to which your humblest subjects are not exposed, your Majesty's person and happiness would be secure in the affectionate loyalty by which your Majesty is at all times surrounded.

"Deeply grateful to Almighty God for sparing a beloved mother to her children, and a beloved Sovereign to her people, we fervently pray that the Divine blessing may still rest on your Majesty, and be to your Majesty and your Royal house a never-failing shield and support."

A copy of this Address having been forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, an answer was received, saying that Sir William Harcourt has received her Majesty's commands to express her regret that, in consequence of her intended journey abroad, she is unable at present to receive the proposed deputation, and to signify her gratification at the sentiments of loyalty contained in the Address.

We may here appropriately add the Queen's Letter to her People:—

"Windsor Castle, March 12, 1882.

"The Queen wishes, before she leaves England for a short while for some comparative rest and quiet, to express from her heart how very deeply touched she is by the outburst of enthusiastic loyalty, affection, and devotion which the painful event of the 2nd instant has called forth from all classes, and from all parts of her vast empire, as well as by the universal sympathy evinced by the Sovereigns and people of other nations. The Queen cannot sufficiently express how deeply gratified she is by these demonstrations, and would wish to convey to all, from the highest to the humblest, her warmest and most heartfelt thanks.

"It has ever been her greatest object to do all she can for her subjects and to uphold the honour and glory of her dear country as well as to promote the prosperity and happiness of those over whom she has reigned so long; and these efforts will be continued unceasingly to the last hour of her life. The Queen thanks God that He spared her beloved child, who is her constant and devoted companion, and those who were with her in the moment of danger as well as herself, and she prays that He will continue to protect her for her people's sake as He has hitherto so visibly done."

DOUGLAS, ISLE OF MAN.—All sympathisers with the movement here will be pleased to hear that the little Church has been maintained during its first winter in a very satisfactory manner. The services have been ably conducted by Mr. J. De Maine Brown, who has not only held together the little band that remained after the visiting season, but has added to their number, his discourses Sunday after Sunday being exceedingly interesting and instructive. During the past week new life has been infused into the efforts, by a visit from the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, of Liverpool, who gave a lecture on Friday evening week on the subject, "Is Jesus God?" The lecture, having been well advertised and discussion invited, attracted a good audience. The lecture was able, clear, and well received. Several questions were put, which did not make the least visible impression, while each answer was received with applause. At the close, the lecturer announced the services to be held on Sunday, which were also advertised. The discourses were real intellectual and spiritual treats, and gave great satisfaction to the goodly numbers present, all of whom were residents. The congregations far exceeded expectation.

Our Contemporaries.

THE LATE DR. BELLOWES.

There is a fine tribute to the memory of our departed friend in Harper's Weekly of New York, which is referred to the pen of the well-known literary man, George William Curtis:—

Throughout his long and eminent professional career Dr. Bellows was a conservative of the Liberal faith. There were two churches of his denomination in the city when he came to New York, and there is but one more now that he is dead, after an active ministry of more than forty years. But from the time when Dr. Channing found no place open for him in New York in which to preach but in the hall of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and when Dr. Mason, the chief clergyman in the city, felt it to be his duty to denounce Channing as an infidel, to the time when Dr. Bellows, who glorified the name of Channing Unitarian, died amid universal respect and regret and fraternal regard from ministers of every form of the common faith, there is an immense and significant change, and he would be a droll pessimist who should hold it to be a change for the worse. In this change the general progress of religious thought has a great part, and so have the personal character and ability of Dr. Bellows. He was less distinctively a scholar than a thoroughly well-read man upon every subject. His incessant activity and diversity of interests prevented that secluded concentration which makes the scholar; but few men were so eager for every kind of knowledge or had greater facility in acquiring information. His interest in leading public questions, in charitable movements, in social progress, in education, in purifying and strengthening the tone of the national character, were only subordinate to his zeal in the profession in which he delighted. But all of this would have been incomplete without his singular gifts as a public speaker. His oratory was fluent, earnest, impetuous, picturesque, humorous; and it rose often to a resistless fervour of eloquence. He was quickened by social intercourse into a delightful gaiety, and he was always the most animated of companions. His ardent and generous temperament, however, undoubtedly played him tricks. Emerson says that, to accomplish results, nature overloads the tendency. With Dr. Bellows there was sometimes a subsequent recoil from a vehement and unqualified statement, which gave an air of impulsiveness and uncertainty to his views and conduct. He was also distrustful of the liberalism which outran his own. But his feeling in such cases was largely due to the quick apprehension of a leader that what seemed to him excess, however sincere, imperilled the whole cause. He cherished the true conservative regard for forms as facts, and with all his hearty liberality he had a certain respect for priestliness and ecclesiasticism which led him to repel strongly the assertion that Unitarianism is essentially a spirit and an influence rather than a special faith or creed. But his hospitable heart and mind harboured no petty jealousies or suspicions. Frank and fair, he had all the courage of his opinions. His yea was yea; and his nay, nay. It is a beneficent life that has passed from our view, and a stimulating and fascinating personality. The city, as well as his church, suffers by his loss. The friendless and forlorn have lost a friend. Every worthy cause is bereaved of a strong councillor and an efficient labourer. He was not yet an old man, but he had done a long life's hard work, and, happily for our memory of him, without visible relaxation or decay, with all the sweet ardour of his nature untouched, he dies, and, as with all men who have lived for noble and humane ends, his works do follow him.

CRITICS ON THE BIBLE.

The Christian World, in an article under this heading, relating to the theological papers in the new volume of the Encyclopedia Britannica, writes:—

We expose ourselves to no just charge of obscurantism when we say that there are perils to be avoided by thinkers in every age, and that it is legitimate to treat with hesitation theories which derive an adventitious support from their countenance and assisting some dominant tendency of the day. For nearly a quarter of a century the ruling fashion in the intellectual world has been indicated by the word "evolution." It has been an enormous advantage to any theory that it represents some one thing as growing out of some other thing. Important results have, no doubt, been attained by applying the principle of evolution in the historical province; but the danger has, we think, been incurred of unduly overlooking those dynamic forces which present themselves as sharply rebutting the hypothesis of evolution, and which are most of all powerful in the province of history. Such dynamic forces are vaguely referred to as genius and inspiration; and nothing that pretends to call itself thought or speculation strikes us as so imbecile as the voluble confidence that refers them to evolution. No pedant is so useless as the man who undertakes to show you how a Luther, a Shakespeare, a Cromwell, was evolved. It is customary to speak of genius in the secular province, of inspiration in the religious province, but what is first of all evident respecting both is that they are mysteries. They are by no means the same thing, although they have often, as in the Hebrew prophets, been combined, and they cast light upon each other. Now it is a striking attribute both of genius and of inspiration that they beam out in full splendour, and that succeeding ages, instead of improving upon their illumination, obscure and deteriorate it. Homer's is the oldest and, to this day, the best epic poetry in the world. Shakespeare stands alone. People talk about the Elizabethans and the education which he derived from them; but the more we have studied the contemporaries of Shakespeare, the more we have been impressed with the colossal genius which enabled him to resist the unfavourable influences of his age, and tower in solitary grandeur above the Marlowes, and Greenes, and Jonsens, whom unwise critics rave about as his fellows. And with Shakespeare dramatic genius departed from England. "The sun fell and all the world was dark." There was no traceable evolution in the business, and all you can say is that God sent Shakespeare. Turn to the religious province. Max Müller tells us that the most ancient of the Vedas are the loftiest and the purest. Even the apostles were not able to comprehend the Divine simplicity, the pure heavenly light, of Christ's Gospel; for fifteen centuries and more, theologians kept overlaying it with their systems; and only in our own time have men dared to penetrate to the simple teaching of our Lord. We submit, therefore, that there is nothing beforehand improbable, but the reverse, in the idea that the inspiration of an Abraham or a Moses may have been exceedingly pure, that the inspiration of the Ten Commandments may at a very early period have visited the world, and that succeeding ages may have first obscured and then regained the early illumination. Abraham and Isaiah, Moses and Jeremiah, may have been peaks in one mighty mountain-range, bathed in the pure sunlight of immediate inspiration, with long stretches of lowland and morass between.

THE SUNDAY AFTERNOON MEETINGS IN LEICESTER.

A contributor of "Character Sketches" to the Leicester Free Press gave, last week, an article on "The Leicester Pulpit and the Pew," from which we take the following:—

Last Sunday afternoon I went to the Temperance Hall, to see the congregation of Mr. Page Hopps's poor friends. I was present when that gentleman first began these services in the autumn of 1880; and at that time I thought the success of the effort would not only be great but unique. That success has been maintained through two winter series, and the benefit bestowed during that time upon the poorer classes of Leicester must be incalculable. Those who have not attended the series have undoubtedly lost not merely in spiritual matters, but, to put it on a lower level, they have lost a very curious sight, and, still worse, they have lost a valuable opportunity of observing the spirit of the poorer classes. Whether the people assembled were attracted by the excellent brass band, the sweet flowers on the platform, or the simple, direct and stirring manner in which Mr. Hopps can talk to them, I know not; but there they were each Sunday in crowds, filling the spacious hall, a company of as devout and earnest worshippers as it was possible to see anywhere. There were aged couples, fathers and mothers, young men and women, most of them poorly clad, some of them exceedingly shabby. The numbers of old people were remarkable, and their presence gave a distinct character to each service. Many of their faces were sadly wrinkled, their eyes were dim, and their voices in the hymns feeble and quavering; yet they imparted a seriousness, thoroughness, and earnestness to everything that alone procured an unconscious response from younger and less reverent worshippers. Who could feel otherwise than devotional when an old gentleman to the right, would rise to join in the hymn with all his might, though with a faltering voice, and gaining but an unsteady glance at the words through an old-fashioned silver-rimmed eye-glass; or who would not feel reproved by the old lady next to him who would murmur to herself fervent, methodistical responses to the prayers? The humbleness and sincerity of this large congregation, which have been patent to the most superficial observer, seemed to me well expressed in this verse of a hymn they sung last Sunday:—

"Bless thou our purpose, consecrate our labours,
Keep us still faithful to the best and truest,
Guide us, protect us, make us not unworthy
Learners of Jesus."

The proceedings throughout were of the simplest and least sensational character, if one expects the stirring band; and with regard to this unusual feature I would say that no one with a spark of sympathy would care to deny these poor people the exceeding pleasure with which they listened to the very sweet and effective rendering of their favourite hymn tunes. On the platform-table were some cut primroses, azalias in flower, &c.—is there any sanctified curmudgeon who would grudge these?

There is one regret felt about these exceedingly useful services, however. It is that they were about to be discontinued for a season. Of course, one sees that Mr. Hopps cannot continue them unassisted all the year round; but is there no one else in Leicester ready to sink creed and opinion and come to help for the sake of these hundreds of earnest, though poor, worshippers? It is abundantly demonstrated that the people themselves are anxious to continue the services; the very best, simplest, and strongest tie—that of friendship—has bound pastor and people, but Mr. Hopps is not Hercules, and after two more Sundays the end will come—for a season, at least. It seems to many that this forced conclusion is a thousand pities. I noticed that there will be a "Social Gathering of these friends on Tuesday, March 21, perhaps the people themselves will then insist that old acquaintance of such happy and profitable kind shall not be forgot."

DR. JOSEPH COOK.

Our friends of the Brahma Somaj seem to be favourably impressed with this famous Boston lecturer, who is now on a visit to India. The Liberal of Calcutta writes:—

We saw Mr. Joseph Cook the other day, and his appearance exactly corresponded to the ideal picture we had formed of him while reading his lectures. Sturdy, strong and muscular, he is as imposing in person as he is in intellect. His large intellectual face betokened enthusiasm and a faith which life-long studies seem only to have heightened. It is a great pleasure to hear him talk, and he can speak on a variety of subjects. His opinions on men and things are strong and clearly defined, and especially his views on the materialism and agnosticism of the day. He maintains that Agnosticism is the vice of England, and that even there it is not to be found so much in Oxford and Cambridge as in London, whose University he characterised as the cockney school of theology. Mr. Cook views with disfavour the Unitarian School of Christianity, and asserted that the Brahma Somaj was more spiritual and devotional than the Unitarian Church as a whole. He said that there was more devotion in the leaders of Theism in India than in Martineau, Channing, and Parker. In the two hours' conversation we had with him he showed a great interest in what he heard of the New Dispensation. Mr. Cook seems to have read our journals and pamphlets, and he expressed his appreciation more than once of the Hom ceremony which was celebrated last year. We showed him the Sanctuary, and his attention was specially drawn to a piece of hollowed marble slab where the rice and money of the devotees are placed for consecration before they are used for family expenses and food. The Theists of the New Dispensation should lose no time in cultivating the acquaintance of this popular and powerful preacher. On parting from us the other day Mr. Cook said, "I sympathise with you for three reasons. You are anti-caste, anti-materialist, and anti-agnostic; and may God bless you!"

THE MORMON PROPAGANDA IN LONDON.

The description of a Sunday service in one of the six meeting-places which are regularly used for the "Mormonisation of London," which we published the other day,* has recalled the fact that England has long been one of the happy hunting-grounds of the Latter-Day Saints. It was in 1837 when the first two apostles landed in Liverpool, and the work then begun has never been abandoned. Four years later thirty converts sailed for America, and since that date it is computed that 85,000 Mormon converts have crossed the Atlantic. Of these more than one-half were of British birth. According to the last census, there are 27,451 persons who were born subjects of her Majesty in the territory of Utah. This number will soon be still further recruited by a detachment of 250 converts, who are to sail from Liverpool on the 15th instant. Thus the singular spectacle is presented of English men, and, what is far more saddening, English girls, leaving home and home and their native land in order to join a polygamous, if not a criminal, association which the Americans are labouring to suppress. The Latter-Day Saints are split up into two sects—the polygamous and the anti-polygamous—both of which have their missionaries in London. The polygamous Mormons of Utah rent the six meeting-places in which Mormon worship is carried on. The non-polygamous sect of Josephites, who have their headquarters in Illinois and the middle States, where they are said to be 20,000 strong, only meet in the open air. They are frequently stoned by the virtuous British rough, who confounds them with their polygamist rivals, against whose damnable heresies they continually protest.

One of the chief meeting-places of the older Mormon sect is the dancing academy in Penton-street, Islington. The chief preacher, John Cooper, called an apostle and "a seventy" at home and an elder in England, has recently been joined by John Q. Cannon, a stalwart, broad-shouldered, square-headed young man, whose father, George Q. Cannon, represents Utah in Congress, and recently defended Mormonism in one of the American reviews. John Q. Cannon is one of the editors of the Deseret News, but having been, as he phrases it, "ordained to the work," he has come to assist in building up "the Church and kingdom" in England, preparatory to relieving his brother, who is now engaged in similar work in Germany. Preaching for the Mormons, Elder Cooper explains, is wholly gratuitous labour. The elder has a farm of eighty acres at home, which is now being managed by his sons. He has been in England since June, 1880, travelling about the Nottingham and the Leeds districts, then labouring in London, without pay or reward. His only privilege is that of visiting his flock and "eating a meal's victuals with the saints." Elder Cooper would scarcely claim to be an educated man. He says that no Gentile can debate with him on the Bible; but he seems to have more acquaintance with "dictionary words" than with their meanings, while his method of dealing with the verbs is very revolutionary. His congregations are made up of persons belonging to the quieter but less prosperous portion of the working class, who seem to be kept together by the hope that some day they will be able to escape to that "land flowing with milk and honey" on the comforts and allurements of which Mormon preachers are so engagingly if ungrammatically eloquent.

The number of conversions to Mormonism is considerable in proportion to the machinery which it employs. About 2,400 new converts emigrated last year from England and Wales; while, says Elder Cooper, the mission remained stronger than ever. In London 171 persons went through the test of membership, which is baptism, and of these 111 emigrated to Salt Lake. "Emigration," says the elder, emphatically, "is not held out as an inducement to join the church, it is only expected that the people will gather." The elder is very anxious to guard against the impression that Mormonism is selfish. Their tithing, he says, goes partly towards the rates, which are low, partly towards the building of temples and public buildings, and partly to a fund which helps indigent emigrants and keeps the poor. There are seventeen elders or preachers of the polygamous Mormons in and about London, and they carry on a regular system of propaganda throughout the country, especially in Wales. About 160 elders leave Utah every year to preach their strange gospel, and on an average they remain little more than two years on foreign service. In 1880, eighty-nine were sent to the United Kingdom, and the number of missionaries at present at work within these islands is probably at this moment not much below two hundred.

The Josephites, the non-polygamous Mormons, whom it is proposed in America to encourage, for the purpose of ridding Utah of one of the "twin relics of barbarism," are to the Brighamites what the Protestants are to the Catholics. They abide by the written word of the Book of Mormon, and repudiate the authority of the pontiff of Salt Lake. The Book of Mormon expressly says: "That no man among you shall have save it be one wife, and concubines he shall have none." But in 1843 Brigham Young claimed to have a revelation in favour of polygamy, which, however, was not publicly proclaimed till ten years later. Its proclamation split the Church of the Latter-Day Saints in twain, and checked the Mormon propagandism, which was then attaining serious proportions. The Josephites, headed by a son of Joseph Smith, declared the revelation in favour of polygamy was "a fraud, an imposition, an apostasy, an exorcism," the original author of which could be no other than the devil himself. They are most active in keeping up the anti-polygamy agitation which is creating such a stir in the United States, and they have this year begun in earnest to counteract the propagandism of the Brighamites in the streets of London. So far they have not had much success, being stoned for the doctrine they denounce and treated as excommunicated heretics by the Mormons from Salt Lake.—Pall Mall Gazette.

* Reprinted in last week's Inquirer.

Obituary.

MR. WILLIAM MORTIMER, J.P., OF EXETER.—Exeter has lost a well-known useful citizen, and our friends at George's Meeting one of their most respected and attached members in the death, on the 8th inst., of Mr. William Mortimer, one of the magistrates of the borough, at the age of sixty. His body was interred on Monday last in the new Cemetery, by the Rev. T. W. Chignell, in the presence of a large gathering of members of the principal public bodies in the city and of private friends, with many from a distance, who attended to pay a final tribute of respect to the memory of one for whom the highest esteem was entertained by a very large circle. The town council, and most of the principal societies in Exeter were represented, including members of the Western Provident and Permanent Building Societies, the Literary Society, and the Board of Guardians.

SIR WYVILLE THOMSON, late Professor of Natural History in Edinburgh University, died at his residence near Linlithgow yesterday week from an attack of paralysis. In 1850 he was appointed Lecturer on Botany in King's College, Aberdeen, and the next year he became Lecturer on Botany in the Marischal College and University of Aberdeen. In 1863 he was appointed Professor of Natural History in Queen's College, Cork; but his stay at Cork was short, for the Professorship of Mineralogy and Geology in the Queen's College, Belfast, becoming vacant in 1854, Mr. Thomson was transferred from Cork to fill that chair. In 1868 and 1869 he went on scientific dredging expeditions in the Lightning and the Porcupine which vessels had been lent by the Admiralty for this purpose. In November, 1870, Mr. Thompson was elected Regius Professor of Natural History in the University of Edinburgh. He was afterwards placed at the head of the scientific department of the Challenger deep-sea exploring expedition, which was sent out under the auspices of the British Government. On his return Professor Thomson received the honour of knighthood.

EDINBURGH.—Mr. James Henry Macallan, of this city, who died on the 4th April, has left his whole property, amounting to about £5,000, after some personal bequests, to the Scottish Unitarian Association, to be applied for the purposes of the Association. The will provides that if no such Association exist at Mr. Macallan's death, the residue should be paid to the treasurer of St. Mark's Unitarian Chapel, Edinburgh, for the benefit thereof. A special legacy of £50 is left to the library fund of the chapel.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & CO., Homeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As the time fixed for the Conference is rapidly approaching, it would greatly facilitate the arrangements for the reception of visitors and distribution of tickets if ministers who intend to be present, and have not yet sent in their names to me, would as soon as possible inform me of their intention. I would also request congregations who have not yet reported the appointment of delegates to do so as early as possible. The number to be provided for is already very large, and delay might result in disappointment. I shall be glad to supply any information required.

Stourbridge, March 13. A. W. WORTHINGTON.

THE PULPIT AND THE PEW.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The late centenary celebration of the New Meeting congregation at Kidderminster, as reported in your paper last week, was in many respects very gratifying; testifying as it did to the religious vitality and prosperity of the church under the zealous ministry of the Rev. W. Carey Walters. Some of the speakers, however, seem to have indulged in the usual phrases about ministers not being "the mere echo of their hearers' thoughts," "the entire freedom of the pulpit," and "our Presbyterian ancestors." Such remarks, unless duly limited and qualified, are, I venture to think, apt to mislead, and they struck me as being rather out of place at Kidderminster.

It appears that the New Meeting congregation was founded, a hundred years ago, by seceders from the Old Meeting, who left because of objections to the doctrinal teaching of a minister then recently appointed. They were Arians or Unitarians, and the minister proved to be Orthodox. They were not men of such loose convictions as to conceive that they were bound, in the interests of freedom, to uphold a minister with whose ideas on leading religious questions they did not agree. To them truth and error were not convertible terms, but opposites. They had not lapsed into easy indifference about doctrines, so they started the New Meeting, in whose present flourishing condition we all rejoice. Those sturdy Presbyterians, whose names were mentioned with all honour, did in fact do what in these lax days is so much deprecated—they applied a doctrinal test to the pulpit. If their spirits hovered over the scene of the late gatherings they would not be without anxiety as to the outcome of the modern one-sided claim of ministers to teach what they like, going as it does perilously near to asserting a lordship over God's heritage.

Unless congregations have a voice in matters of doctrine they are as helpless in the hands of a minister with unrestricted freedom as they would be in the hands of a Romish or Anglican priest. The Protestant principle recognises the right of the people to judge. Recent proceedings at Unity Church, Chicago, are an illustration. Mr. Miln no doubt urged, along with his agnosticism, that it would be a very common-place thing for him "to echo his hearers' thoughts." Fortunately, the members of that Church have had sufficient earnestness for religious truth, and enough of common sense to cut short Mr. Miln's career of freedom in their pulpit.

My moral is that the laity have responsibilities in theological matters as well as ministers, and that this aspect of the relations between the two is in some danger of being disregarded by constantly insisting on the unrestrained liberty of one party only to the Church compact.

A UNITARIAN LAYMAN.

DETERMINISM AND FREE-WILL.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—With regard to this vexed question of "Determinism and Free-will," referred to in your notice of the current number of Mind, it seems to me that it can never find a solution till the advocates of each opinion can be persuaded to examine the matter from the standing point of his opponent, and thus learn to recognise how much truth there is in each view. Not till then will it be possible to reconcile these two apparently conflicting dogmas. That though apparently so they are not really conflicting there is in my mind no doubt. They are but the convex and concave sides of the same curve, which is pronounced to be convex or concave according to the point of view from which it is regarded by the spectator. It is really both. The difficulty in all such questions arises from the inability to keep constantly before the mind the difference that exists between absolute and relative truth, between that which is true in itself and that which is true to us.

A man struggling to raise a heavy body says, and says truly, that he feels the weight of the body. This is to him a fact of consciousness, the truth of which no discovery of science can invalidate.

It is an intuition, and rests upon experience, and experience is the basis on which all science is built, and the ultimate proof to which it appeals for verification. As a judgment, then, expressing the facts of experience this intuition is exact. But, if from this fact of conscious experience the man proceed to draw the not unnatural inference that weight is an absolute quality inherent in bodies, this is manifestly a false inference from a true intuition. Yet such is frequently the nature of the difference which occasions such bitter antagonism between theologians and scientific men. The former are examining the curve in its concave or subjective aspect, the latter in its convex or objective aspect.

Theologians and religious men are for the most part not satisfied to rest in these incontrovertible facts of conscious experience; they are not satisfied to say—we are as though we were free; for all practical purposes this is true, and must ever remain so, just as for all practical purposes of common life we always must think and speak and act as though bodies had weight.

Instead, however, of holding this impregnable position, "and how truly its central position is impregnable religion has never adequately realised," Theologians go to war with the advocates of Determinism, and contend that if their dogma be true it must result in the destruction of all sense of moral responsibility. As well might the practical man argue the necessary fallacy of the scientific idea which denies weight to be a quality inherent in bodies, on the grounds that if it were true he might with impunity let a bar of iron fall upon his neighbour's head, or that the scientific idea must be false, because if it were to be acted upon in common life it would result in the wholesale destruction of life and limb. Yet this is exactly the method of argument pursued by the theologian when he maintains that his doctrine of free-will is not merely a relative truth, but that it is also absolute truth, which to most scientific minds it is quite clear that it is not.

STANNINGTON.—The Rev. R. Cowley Smith, of South Shields, has received a hearty and unanimous invitation from Underbank Chapel, Stannington, and is expected to commence his duties there in the month of May.

FRAMLINGHAM.—The Rev. Wm. Fielding, ex-student of the Home Missionary Board, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit at Framlingham.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE DAWSON.—Some members of the congregation of the Church of the Saviour, and other friends of the late Mr. Dawson, have raised funds for a memorial to be placed in the above-named edifice. The memorial is to consist of a marble bust of Mr. Dawson, surmounting a tablet. Mr. F. J. Williamson, of Esher, was requested to submit a model of the proposed bust, and at a meeting of the subscribers on Tuesday night, the model was submitted, and highly approved, and the commission was by an unanimous vote entrusted to Mr. Williamson. The work was on view on Wednesday, at the Church of the Saviour. Mr. Williamson is already most favourably known in Birmingham as the sculptor of the Priestley statue, and of the bust of Mr. Samuel Timmins for the Free Libraries.

CAPLE-LE-FERNE, NEAR FOLKESTONE.—On Monday last the first interment under the new Burials Act took place in the parish churchyard, the impressive Burial Service being read by the Rev. T. B. W. Briggs. An old servant who had lived for thirty-three years in Mr. Briggs's family expressed a desire on the day of her death that she might lie near her old mistress, and be buried by her old master in Caple churchyard. In this quiet resting-place, in the calmness and beauty of a lovely day of sunshine and of spring's promise, her remains were consigned to the tomb, followed by her sorrowing relatives, and the son and sons-in-law of the Rev. T. Briggs, and several friends from Dover connected with the Unitarian General Baptist Church there, of which she had been a member for more than thirty years.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

DISCUSSION ON "PRIESTCRAFT."

The half-yearly soiree of this society was held on Wednesday, in the new schoolroom connected with the Free Christian Church, Kentish-town. There was a large attendance of members and friends of the society, and among those present, in addition to the names mentioned hereafter, were Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Wurtzburg, Mrs. Blake Odgers, Miss Preston Mrs. Pearce, Messrs. Wellings, Hind, Hazelwood, Tifford, Fabritius, J. T. Preston, H. S. Tayler, B.A., T. Robinson, E. S. Anthony, M.A., J. Philip, Woolner; and the Revs. P. W. Clayden, M. C. Gascoigne, T. Rix, Collins Odgers, J. E. Stead, W. C. Bowie, and G. Wooller.

After tea the chair was taken by DAVID AINSWORTH, M.P., who was received with much applause.

The CHAIRMAN in opening the proceedings expressed his satisfaction at presiding over so good and representative a meeting. We are always told that Unitarians are very cold-blooded, and many think there is very little unity among us, but he thought such meetings as these showed that there was a great deal of cohesion among us, and that they would have the same excellent effect as the late meeting of Liberal members convened by Mr. Gladstone, which astonished Conservatives by showing that the Liberal party was practically unanimous, and never allowed their individual ideas to interfere with the true principle of what was best for the country as a whole—(applause).

The Rev. J. WRIGHT, B.A., then read a valuable paper, which was much applauded, on "Priestcraft," which we give in full on another page.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL said he rose from the force of association to follow his old friend and fellow-student Mr. Wright, whose paper they had all listened to with great pleasure, even when they differed from some of its statements. He thought that the essayist might have traced the origin of priestcraft to certain tendencies and weaknesses in human nature which had existed in all ages. Many years ago he read Howitt's "History of Priestcraft," an extremely superficial work, which represented the priest as utterly bad and all his works as unmixed evil, instead of recognising the fact that the early civilisation and culture of the world were greatly indebted to the priesthoods of all religions, which like other institutions had their place in the Divine economy. A much wider and more philosophical view was given in Archbishop Whately's "Errors of Romanism Traced to their Origin in Human Nature"—a work which showed that priests and their pretensions were in reality the creation of the superstitious fears and the irrational demands of the laity. The prophet's saying, "Like people, like priest," went to the root of the matter and solved the whole question. For his own part he regarded the ministry as a profession—a sacred and dignified profession—but analogous with the legal and the medical professions, and he deprecated the tendency to undervalue it and lower its high standard. It was a mistake to confound æstheticism with Ritualism or Sacerdotalism. He stood up for an ornate and impressive Church service, which was not necessarily connected with any sacerdotal claims or pretensions.

Mr. D. MARTINEAU concurred in great measure with the previous speaker. The minister was set apart and trained for his work as no layman could be in the presence of the world's business, and he confessed that he thought there were many things not quite fitted for the minister, and in that respect was more conservative in feeling than the Essayist, who seemed to think there ought to be no distinction whatever between the minister and layman. He quite approved of an æsthetic service, and confessed to being favourably impressed with a High Church ceremonial when he occasionally attended a country church. But these were small matters compared with the claim to spiritual domination and authority over the conscience, against which he would protest quite as emphatically as the Essayist.

Mr. H. JEFFERY spoke of the growing danger of priestly pretensions on the part of the Roman Catholic Church, and its rapid progress during the last quarter of a century. It was remarkable that no denomination in the country had yielded so large a percentage to that Church as our own religious body. This arose partly from want of definite theological instruction, and partly from the coldness and unattractiveness of our Church services. If we banish æstheticism the reaction will inevitably come, and our young people will leave us for Churches which better gratify their spiritual cravings. The objection to all forms is flying in the face of human nature. With the opposition to what is really priestcraft he had the utmost sympathy, but he had no sympathy with some of the means proposed that evening to check it.

The Rev. R. SPEARS expressed his entire agreement with Mr. Wright's paper, and advocated extreme simplicity and plainness in our churches. This does not in itself ever lead necessarily to a reaction in favour of Romanism. Methodist services are extremely bald and simple, and he never heard of one Methodist going over to the Roman Catholic Church. No Church has contributed so largely to the strength of Romanism as the English Church. The losses we suffered were chiefly from the want of grounding our young people in the reason of the faith that is in them. We really need nothing more in religion than the devotion of the heart, and a pure spiritual service was more likely to be offered up in humble places where there was nothing to gratify the senses than amidst the ceremonial rites of an æsthetic ritual.

Mr. JEFFERY reminded Mr. Spears that some of the foremost Catholic divines of the day had been brought up in the Evangelical faith.

The Rev. H. INKSON quite agreed with Mr. Wright, and wished there were no need in religious matters for this marked distinction between one profession and another. He did not think that ministers, as a rule, looked upon the laity with any feeling of jealousy, but would rather be pleased if they could claim the assistance of friends in the congregation to relieve them of a portion of their duties. But when a layman becomes remarkably distinguished as a preacher he is apt to become an uncomfortable elder of the Church. He strongly upheld the idea that the ministry should be regarded, in the interests of the people themselves, as a distinct profession. Whatever rules are laid down ought to be determined by the object in view. He had known some congregations abstain from holding a communion service because they had no professional minister. This he thought a relic of old superstition. If a minister knew his work and was thoroughly in harmony with it, he had not much time for ordinary secular occupations. His profession is of so absorbing a kind that it would properly take up all his time and interest. He did not care for the small point as to what a minister is called, or what he wears, but was an advocate of decency and decorum in conducting public worship. He knew no set of men who less need to be put on their guard against priestcraft than Unitarians, who had been disposed to take too low a view of the ministry. He would say look upon it as a profession, and pay it as a profession. The influence of priestcraft upon our young people could not be solved merely by adopting this or that mode of worship. The thing he had been most struck with in some of his experiences of young people leaving us, was that they regarded the priest or clergyman as such a charming man, he seemed so thoroughly to enter into all their pursuits, and was so well acquainted with the art and poetry and science of the times. To have that culture combined with a beautiful æsthetic service, and to be put into the way of doing good and charitable work in connection with the Church—this was just the thing that most struck the youthful heart.

Mr. EDWARDS disagreed with the criticisms on Mr. Wright's paper. The larger portion of Methodist preachers are laymen, and the morality of Cornwall, where their influence is predominant, is better than that of any other county. As for æsthetic services, there was as much reverence among the Quakers as in any other denomination combined with perfect simplicity of worship.

Mr. WADE wished that "all the Lord's people were prophets," but even then there would be need of "schools of the prophets," and we should want to sit at the feet of some Gamaliels. He could not quite agree with levelling the ministry down in the way recommended by the Essayist. But if a minister ever assumed authority, and wished his congregation to give up their own independent judgment on entering the Church, that was essentially of the nature of priestcraft. He was in favour of reverence and outward decorum in the conduct of worship, and he would gladly see the ministry exalted in all spiritual matters.

Mr. A. BAKEWELL thought there was no real danger of priestcraft in such a body as ours. He wished our ministers to be pastors, and not merely to occupy the pulpit and deliver dialectical discourses. Our ministers were in fact not priests enough in the true sense of the word. We wanted more of the living Spirit; it was the heart and soul and not the intellect that required to be touched in our religious services.

The CHAIRMAN expressed his concurrence with much of Mr. Wright's paper, and thought it would be well for the laity to bring themselves into closer connection with their clergy. With regard to laymen occupying the pulpit it might be dangerous, for it might be found that they could do without ministers altogether—(laughter). He was reminded of an anecdote of the late Lord Westbury, who, on a certain occasion, when prayers had been read by the Lord Chancellor in the absence of any Bishop, remarked, "This shows that, first of all, we can do without Bishops, and, secondly, that we can do better without Bishops—(laughter)."

The Rev. J. WRIGHT, who was again received with much applause, briefly replied, congratulating the meeting on the interesting discussion which had taken place, and the extreme ingenuity which had been shown by some of the speakers in attributing to him sentiments he had never held or expressed. He did not object to an æsthetic ceremonial, but had great taste for it. But if we value æstheticism too much people will go where they have it best, first of all to the High Church, and then on to the Roman Catholic Church. He did not object to the ministry being a profession, but he objected to the exercise of authority and to all spiritual pretensions. That spirit of priestcraft we should be on our guard against in our own denomination, and wherever it is found—(applause).

Mr. S. W. PRESTON, one of the Secretaries of the Society, moved, and Mr. S. S. TAYLER seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was cordially adopted and acknowledged, and the proceedings then terminated.

THE NORTH-EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

The annual meeting of this Mission was held at Padiham on Thursday week. There were present the Revs. D. Walmesley, B.A., and W. C. Squier (secretaries), F. Haydn Williams, J. C. Street, C. J. Street, M.A., George Ride, R. Wilkinson, A. Lazenby, H. B. Smith, Joseph Harrison, H. V. Mills, Jas. Black, M.A.; Messrs. Frank Taylor, Thos. Harwood (treasurer), Alex. Mackie, Harry Spencer, John Ashworth, Thos. Holland, J. S. Mackie, and Councillor Blezard. Service was held in the afternoon. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. F. Haydn Williams, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. C. Street, on "Immortality," from 2 Samuel xii. 23.

THE EVENING MEETING.

This was held in the chapel, Mr. FRANK TAYLOR, of Bolton, presiding. The annual report was read by the Rev. D. WALMSLEY. It stated various particulars respecting the condition of the congregations and mission stations which have already from time to time appeared in these columns.

Mr. THOS. HARWOOD then read the financial statement, showing a balance on the revenue due to the treasurer of £27 12s. 1d. On the special fund account they commenced the year with an adverse balance of £87 3s. 8d., and at the end of the year it stood at £117 2s. 3d.

THE PRESENT-DAY MISSION OF UNITARIANISM.

The CHAIRMAN said:—It is, I am sure, as great a source of regret to you as to me that we are deprived of the presence of the distinguished President of the Association, Mr. John Grundy, of Summerseat, and that regret is intensified by the knowledge that his absence is caused by serious ill-health. His noble presence, and the earnest, eloquent, and beautiful language in which he always clothes his thoughts make him a welcome guest at any meeting, political or religious, but especially at any gatherings of the supporters of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, in whose success he has taken the deepest interest from its formation. I occupy the chair, therefore, neither by right nor by merit, but simply as a stop-gap, in obedience to the command of the Rev. D. Walmesley. It is scarcely necessary for me to dwell at any great length on the distinguishing principles and work of Unitarianism before a gathering composed of Padiham Unitarians and learned divines and representative laymen from the district. You, in Padiham, by the sacrifice you have made in the erection of this beautiful church, by your zeal and devotion have shown to the world the value you have placed upon those principles, and have set an example worthy of imitation by your co-religionists in other parts of the kingdom. Still, as we meet together in support of an Association which has a definite name and a definite work to do, I may be permitted to touch upon some aspects of those principles and that work as they present themselves to the mind of an ordinary layman. For a long time our specific work as a branch of the Christian Church was necessarily of a negative or destructive character. Our oldest congregations were established about 1662 by those noble men who were cast forth from the Established Church rather than conform to an Act of Uniformity in which they did not believe. They did not believe in ecclesiastical strait-jackets, and wanted to breathe the pure air of freedom. Their difference with the Church at that time was not so much one of doctrine as of liberty of thought and the right of private judgment, not being compelled to believe as the Church dictated. These congregations took the name of Presbyterian. But freedom once secured it brought other results in its train. Trinitarianism merged into Arianism, and this again into Unitarianism. The descendants of the noble Two Thousand became Dissenters, both ecclesiastically and doctrinally, and a purely doctrinal epoch succeeded the first stage when the congregations which were established called themselves Unitarian. Humble Meeting Houses were erected with open trusts for the simple worship of God, beyond which they did not bind their descendants, but handed down to them the same liberty they had claimed for themselves and at so great a sacrifice had secured. Just as an emigrant to a new land has on arrival to clear the ground, to fell the trees previous to erecting thereon even the rudest hut, and has to hedge and ditch, to level and drain and plough before he can sow his seed or gather his harvest, so when our fathers were cast forth into the wilderness they had to pull down and clear away what seemed to them false doctrines and ceremonies and superstitious ideas before they could erect a spiritual temple wherein they and their descendants could worship. But we feel the ground is now fairly cleared. The remaining bulwarks of orthodoxy are being swiftly undermined by more powerful weapons than we possess, or are crumbling away from internal weakness or eruptions. Against the combined forces of science, criticism and the widening conceptions of men they are struggling with but scant success, and if they retain their hold on men's affections it is by setting their sails to the wind and inhaling some of the newer spirit of the times. The time for destruction has now well nigh ceased. Our opportunity has come. We must put away the axe and sledge hammer, and with trowel and mallet begin the much pleasanter process of building up. Negation alone supplies not a sufficient bond of union. We are called upon now to do a more positive work. We have glorious affirmations to preach. Let others cast down as hard as they like. They only prepare the ground wherein we can put the precious seed God has entrusted to our keeping, whereon we can build a fairer, firmer temple. On this ground I can understand that most of the congregations in sympathy with us of recent formation have called themselves Free Christian, as being more in harmony with the widening spirit of the age. In this Association we have congregations calling themselves by each of the names, the Presbyterian reminding us of the struggles of our fathers for freedom two centuries ago, the Unitarian which are the offspring of the doctrinal epoch in our history, the Free Christian which remind us of the practical positive work the age demands from us disciples of Christ. I care little by which name you call yourselves, for in spirit they are all the same, and a rose smells as sweet by any name. We are all as brothers in the same family, in battalions in the same regiment. Each phase of our work has been a necessity, and under whatever name we answer to the roll-call we all rejoice the time has come when we can devote our noblest energies to the doing of a more positive work, the building up of a wider church, a more spiritual temple wherein shall abide faith, hope, and charity. The most precious heritage we received from our forefathers was that of freedom, but combined with it were a piety, devotion, and reverence for what seemed to them the truest and noblest, which it would be well for us to imitate. They valued their own conclusions as the nearest attainable truth and endeavoured to act up to them in their daily life, but they did not bind them upon their successors, but left to them the same freedom they had purchased at so great a cost. Accepting this heritage as a sacred legacy we are essentially seekers after truth. We value the conclusions of to-day as the nearest attainable glimpse of the truth yet revealed to us, but we are willing to follow wherever the spirit of truth may lead us to-morrow. Of course freedom alone is not a sufficient bond of union, for there must be a unity of spirit and aim to enable us to worship and work together. Fed upon freedom alone the spiritual nature of man would be stunted in its growth, and would droop and wither as the tender vegetation of early spring beneath the piercing east wind. We value freedom not for itself alone, but for what it leads to. It is a means to an end. It implies room for growth, development; scope to choose the right and true, and avoid the unreal and false. It tends inevitably to the higher truth, the nobler the more enduring reality. And what has freedom done for us? Has it cut us adrift from the past and left us as wanderers aimless and hopeless on the sea of life? No. It has invigorated our spiritual nature; it has purified our vision and enlarged our ideal and outlook. It has led us to certain glorious affirmations, which we believe will be the corner-stones of the religious temple of the future. Men's conceptions of them may vary from age to age with widening knowledge, but in some form or other they will remain unmoved, and around them the tendrils of the human heart will cling as the ivy around the oak. There is first and foremost the consciousness of a higher than human power. We regard God as so great and high and holy that no name mortal lips can frame can adequately describe Him, yet towards Him the human heart aspires as a child looks up with loving, trustful, wondering gaze to its Father. We feel that He has not once for all revealed Himself in a book or person, but that he is with us now as much as with the Israelites of old, revealing Himself in the wonders and beauties and laws of nature, and in the individual consciousness of man. And then it has brought us to recognise that in Christ beat the noblest heart that ever beat in human frame, that in him we have the highest, purest, brightest manifestation of that ideal life in the spirit of which we ought to live. And as we meet together from time to time to worship, it is that we may muse on his wondrous life, to catch some faint echo of his words through the whispering gallery of time, so that we may have something of his spirit kindled within, which shall help us to translate the professions of the Sunday into the realities of daily life, to make us feel we have a divine calling, and when in the world must not forget our Father's business. And then, too, there is the glorious hope of immortality. God, the consciousness of a Heavenly Father; Christ, the assurance of the sympathy and leadership of an elder brother, who by the spirit of his life can lead us into the nearer presence of the Infinite; immortality, the hope of a brighter future which shall reflect some radiance on the darkness and uncertainty of earth; these are indeed glorious affirmations, which it is our privilege to preach. What more can we want. For all else will fall into its rightful place in due course. Lecky has well said, "It was reserved for Christianity to present to the world an ideal character which through all the changes of eighteen centuries has inspired the hearts of men with an impassioned love, has shown itself capable of acting on all ages, nations, conditions and temperaments, has been not only the highest pattern of virtue, but the strongest incentive to its practice, and has exercised so deep an influence that it may be truly said the simple record of three years of active life has done more to regenerate and soften mankind than all the disquisitions of philosophers and exhortations of moralists." Some think that Christianity has only been a secondary influence for good in the history of the world, others that its day is over. I cannot agree with either of these. I remember the late Sir W. Fairbairn saying that he thought the steam engine had done more good than the Bible. Science, art, mechanism, may have opened out the resources of nature, quickened the life of men, brought nations nearer to each other, made human life richer and fuller, but above and beyond these, Christianity has been the mightiest motive power, making life sweeter, and tenderer and nobler, filling it with diviner hopes and possibilities. Its outward form may and will change, but its vital essence, the simple life of Christ, the spirit which he followed, the spirit of love and duty, of consecration and surrender to God will ever remain, unchanged amid the changed. But other churches may say that they preach the life of Christ. Yes, but they preach it plus certain accretions, plus miracles and marvels and mysteries, plus a miraculous birth, and incarnation, and atonement, which serve to dim its lustre and beauty and weaken its power. Exalt Christ into a God and he becomes an idol to be worshipped, not a leader to be followed, but make men feel he is an elder brother with like passions and desires, touched with our infirmities, yet through all faithful unto death, and then the struggling and aspiring soul looks up to him and in imagination tries to lay hold of his hand in order to be led onwards and upwards by his spirit. The world is well nigh sick of creeds and dogmas, and wants a simpler faith. It wants less ceremony, less solemnity, less doctrine, but more of honesty, more of purity, more of hope, more of trust, more of brotherly kindness and love. We do not trouble the soul with mysterious trinites and atonements. We do not make the future happiness of mankind dependent on the correctness of their belief, but on the spirit of their life. We do not ask our ministers to subscribe to a certain number of articles and creeds, or the people to accept certain propositions they cannot understand, without belief in which they must perish for ever. We do not place doctrinal restrictions upon our chapels which a few generations of growing light and widening knowledge may prove insecure and incomplete. We dedicate them to the simple worship of God, believing that in all time to come the human heart will still hunger and thirst for him, leaving to each succeeding age the privilege of formulating its own faith in accordance with the light and knowledge and truth revealed to it, and assured that with a strong tender childlike trust in God and a reverence for truth and duty the soul cannot wander far. It is because I am convinced we have a simple yet glorious faith to offer to the people which, if fully realised, will make the world brighter and better, and life sweeter and nobler, that I rejoice in the continued usefulness of this Association. It was my privilege to be at its birth more than twenty years ago, and as I look back at the past, I rejoice at the good it has done. It has knit together our older congregations more closely by the strong ties of a common sympathy and work, while it has been mainly instrumental in establishing congregations at Heywood, Burnley, Colne, Accrington, Astley, Darwen and Blackpool. We have been united together on the broad platform of a common faith, a common hope, a common work. No suspicion of old or new, of advanced or old-fashioned has crept in to interfere with our harmonious co-operation in carrying out a great and good work. I am sorry to think that in some parts of the country there still are those who would endeavour to fit us all with one strait-jacket of their own precise size and colour, who would slip us up into sections, who would keep alive old controversies in our midst and fan them into a flame of bitterness, who seem to take special delight in magnifying our differences, and minimising our agreements. Not a conference can be organised, not a new movement begun without a census being taken of its active spirits, how many are old school, how many new. For all this I have nothing but the sternest condemnation, and my most charitable wish is that these self constituted censors will keep far enough away from Lancashire, so as not to cast their apple of discord in our midst. In fact, in North and East Lancashire let it be known we will not have them. Our motto in the future as in the past must be, "In essentials unity, in non-essentials diversity, in all things charity." In the presence of the great and growing work waiting to be done, let us bind ourselves more closely together in order to be faithful to our responsibilities. Many there are hungering and thirsting for the bread and water of life it is within our power to give, and if we pass them by on the other side, bitter must be our portion to hear those sad words sounding in our ears, "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto the least of one of these, ye did it not unto me." We cannot prevent the coming of the kingdom of God, but by our faithlessness and perversity we may impede its progress. The longest human life, how short it is compared with the life of the world, and to the quickened conscience it is one of the bitterest sorrows, how little good can be accomplished within its longest span. Our consolation is that God secures a continuity of purpose and effort; from age to age, and as our fainting strength lets go the work we have in hand, others will in due time be raised up strengthened by His might and inspired by His spirit to carry on to still greater perfection than we dreamed of that which we left incomplete.

Mr. ISAAC BARROW seconded the resolution, which was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN next moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. F. Hadyn Williams for conducting the religious service, and to the Rev. J. C. Street for preaching the sermon.

The Rev. F. H. WILLIAMS, in acknowledging the vote, alluded to the encouraging signs of activity at Padiham, and paid a compliment to the people for their zeal in obtaining such a beautiful chapel.

THE REV. J. C. STREET ON UNITARIANISM IN LANCASHIRE.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, after acknowledging the vote and paying a tribute of admiration to the Chairman for his excellent address, said: The reference in the Chairman's address made towards the close touches a point to which I desire to direct your attention. We belong to a church that cannot be narrowed down to a sect, though efforts have been made to reduce us within the narrow limits of sectarianism, which have always failed. It seems as though of late a few restless spirits in our churches are anxious to revive some ancient controversies, and again to crystallise us into the dogmatic state. I think all such efforts will fail, for we have advanced too far in the history of this century and in the spirit of freedom to admit of dogmatic theology ever being made a condition of agreement and union among us. I notice that within the last few weeks a discourse has been delivered in London by a gentleman for whom I have a very profound respect with reference to the death of a very distinguished preacher—Dr. Bellows. The preacher then took occasion to "point a moral and adorn a tale," and to utter some grave words for the consideration of Unitarians. The preacher declared that our Unitarian or Free Christian churches seem to be in a state of decay, that life, energy, and unity are passing away from us, and that the reason is because we have no clear well-defined point of union, no recognition of the lordship of Jesus Christ. I listened to the report which the Secretary of this Association read with the most profound astonishment after having read that discourse. Either that discourse was a mistake and the statements in it not founded on facts, or else the report was imaginative and figurative. I never heard such a report from a Unitarian Association before as this one—yet it is from a Church that is fading away! It seems to me that either Mr. Pantan Ham is living in a world other than the free liberal churches of to-day, or that the year's history which we have heard to-night is a fable. The preacher, I think, was mistaken in describing us as a dying community, or that there were proofs of decay amongst us. It is twenty years since I used to preach in Lancashire—coming back at intervals to see how things were going on. There are no signs of decay. Why, the Lancashire of to-day, so far as free thought is concerned, is not the Lancashire of twenty years ago. I come back here and I hardly know the region in which I move about. Churches have sprung up all over, and so strong is the free religious life, and the spirit of self-help has grown so wonderfully that I feel as if I were living in apostolic times; and Lancashire is not an exception in this respect. But perhaps he has formed his opinion by looking too closely at the surroundings there are in the centre of London. Perhaps standing as he does as minister in a church where wonderful voices of power were heard of old, and where large congregations gathered to listen to those voices, he feels that a change has come over the spirit of the dream, and that the listeners were fewer than they used to be. Nevertheless, I believe him to be a man of power. It is true, however, that mere dogmatic Unitarianism is passing away. It is true that the aggressivists going out merely to fight the Trinity, the atonement, and the peculiar dogmas of orthodoxy—this form of Unitarianism is surely passing away, but it is certainly not true that liberal Christianity and liberal religion is passing away. It is not true that there is any want of unity among those who are free men—the men of to-day in Lancashire. But he has a remedy, and what is it? I mention this not because he is the only one who advocates it, but because it indicates a certain tendency among a number of our brethren. He believes there will be no union till there is disunion. He thinks that we shall have to separate in order to be united. He would have the old school go one way and the new school the other. Now, against that spirit I do most earnestly raise my solemn protest. If the men who are called advanced men have one distinction which separates them from other men who are not so advanced, it is that they want to be inclusive, to include all forms of faith that are honestly held. The glory of our churches has been to allow the fullest expression of thought to its individual members, and thus to add a richer and diviner life. Unfortunately the remedy prescribed by Mr. Pantan Ham has been tried, and has always proved itself to be a disastrous failure. Let us think of the glorious possibilities that open to us on the path of freedom. We have long passed that time when we used to think that certain opinions were necessary to salvation—neither the man of the old nor the man of the new school means any such nonsense as that. We have long put that behind, and having put it behind us we have put all dogmatic conclusions behind us too, as unnecessary to salvation. If only we are faithful to conscience, if only we are true to our own natures, we shall have a church as broad as humanity itself. In its breadth will be included all our divergencies, and its grand catholic spirit will bring it closer and closer to the life of God—(applause).

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by the Rev. JAS. BLACK, the officers for the next year were appointed.

The CHAIRMAN moved a resolution expressing the sense of the meeting as to the loss sustained by the removal of several ministers from the district, and cordially welcomed those who had settled in it during the year. This was seconded by the Rev. R. WILKINSON, and adopted.

On the motion of the Rev. T. LEYLAND, seconded by Mr. Councillor BLEZARD, thanks were voted to the Padiham friends for their hospitality, and to the Chairman for presiding, and the meeting terminated.

THE MANCHESTER DISTRICT UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

On Saturday, the 4th inst., the annual meeting of this Association was held at Swinton, near Manchester. There were present the Rev. Chas. T. Poynting, B.A., and John Dendy, junr. (secretaries), the Revs. J. T. Marriott, Jas. Harwood, B.A., John Moore, John McDowell, W. G. Cadman, Halliwell Thomas, S. A. Steinthal, J. G. Slater, W. Fielding (minister elect of Framlingham); Messrs. Smith Golland, H. A. Winsor, Robt. Fielding, George Mitchell, G. W. Rayner Wood (treasurer), John Mellor, Chas. Broadbent, John Heya, John Phillips, H. Pearson.

At half-past three p.m. service was held in the chapel. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. John Moore, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. T. Marriott, who took for his text Romans viii. 16 "The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirits that we are children of God," and referred at some length to "The Dissolving Views of Orthodoxy" as presented in the Rev. John Hunter's recent lectures.

was held at six o'clock in the chapel, Mr. SMITH GOLLAND in the chair.

The Rev. CHAS. T. POYNTING, the secretary, read the annual report, which stated that the main efforts of the Association during the past year have been in connection with the special committee appointed "to aid in the erection of churches with open trusts at Miles Platting and Ardwick, and for similar purposes." At the date of the last annual report it was stated that "donations to the amount of £4,000 had been already received, and that the ladies of the various congregations had undertaken to hold a bazaar in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, the first week in May." Local committees were formed by the ladies in connection with the congregations at Platt, Gorton, Altrincham and Hale, Cross-street, Oldham, Miles Platting, Strangeways, Monton, and Ardwick, each of which took charge of a separate stall or stalls for the bazaar. The ladies of Upper Brook-street sent their contributions to the Platt stall, those of Middleton to the Gorton stall, those of Swinton to the Monton stall, those of Blackley to the Miles Platting, and those of Pendleton to such of the stalls as most needed help. The large hall of the Free Trade Hall was hired for the occasion, and decorated as a street of an old English town. The "Grande Bazaar and Fantasia Fayre" was opened on the 3rd of May, by Mr. Robert Needham Philips, M.P., accompanied by Professor Roscoe, F.R.S., Messrs. H. J. Leppoe, P. Goldschmidt, R. Peacock, Harry Rawson, the Rev. G. H. Wells, the chairman of the Bazaar Committee, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and other gentlemen of the district. The gross receipts amounted to £4,299 2s., and the expenses to £773 18s., leaving a balance of £3,525 4s. The canvassing committee, meanwhile, was not idle. A more general appeal was made to our friends in the district, with the result of adding nearly another £1,000 to the fund. The total amount received from subscriptions is £5,022 19s., making, with bank interest, a grand total of £8,555 8s. 3d. With regard to the "similar purposes," the special committee has hitherto left the precise nature of the distribution of the funds under this head undefined; and no obligations have as yet been incurred beyond those imposed by the donors to the fund. There are congregations in the district sorely needing help from the fund. Some are anxious to pay off debts that have long hampered them; others need new Sunday-schools; and in one other case, at least, the present chapel is fast falling into an almost ruinous condition, and is far too small for the needs of the congregation. In addition to the statement in last report—the truth of which the committee feels more strongly every year—"there are in Manchester and its neighbourhood many thickly-populated districts, far removed from any of our older established churches or chapels, and demanding that we shall carry to them our message of a gospel that is in full accordance with the spiritual wants of the day." Of the several congregations assisted by grants from the Association the reports were generally favourable, and showed encouraging signs of progress. The report closed with expressing the Committee's deep sense of the valuable services of their late colleague, the Rev. G. Wells, M.A., of Gorton, who, in a ministry extending over forty-eight years in the district, has ever laboured faithfully on behalf of a free, unfettered Christianity. One of the founders of the Association, and a member of its committee from the first, his ripe wisdom, varied experiences, and great business-like capacities have always been freely placed at its disposal, and have contributed in no small degree to whatever measure of successful work it has accomplished in the district.

Mr. G. W. RAYNER WOOD, treasurer, read the financial statement. There was a balance in hand at the beginning of the year of £45 16s. 6d.; there had been received from mission sermons £72 7s. 8d.; subscriptions £141 1s. 6d.; sundries £45 12s. 10d.; total £304 18s. 6d. He had paid salaries £234 10s.; sundries £26 8s. 6d., leaving a balance in hand of £44 10s. for next year, which he expected would be insufficient, as new work to be undertaken would probably, unless the income was increased, land them at the close of next year with a deficit.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the reports read to the meeting, and congratulated the treasurer on having done what he failed to do, viz., to get the balance on the right side of the account.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, in seconding the motion, concurred with the Chairman in believing that the report was a more satisfactory one than they had had for a number of years. A good deal of work had been well done, and he liked the report because it said they had not yet done. To raise £8,000 in one year did seem a large sum, and as those knew who had to do it, it was no easy task. And fortunately the feeling created had done them all good—(applause). He trusted that among them there would grow a sense of the responsibility that rested upon them to make known the simple gospel they had to present to the people. Mr. Steinthal closed his remarks by expressing his satisfaction with the closing words of the report which acknowledged the labours, extending over forty years in the district, of the Rev. G. H. Wells, and especially did he wish to bear his testimony to the kindly and loving services which he had rendered to his brother ministers—(applause).

The CHAIRMAN next moved the appointment of officers for the ensuing year.

The Rev. JOHN McDOWELL, in seconding the motion, hoped they might have Mr. Gaskell at the head of the list for many years to come—(applause).

The usual votes of thanks brought the meeting to a close.

WARRINGTON: ANNUAL SOIREE.

On Monday evening the annual soiree of the Cairo-street congregation was held in the Co-operative Hall, which had been handsomely decorated for the occasion. After tea, which was attended by about two hundred persons, a meeting was held, the Rev. R. PILCHER, B.A., presiding.

The CHAIRMAN read a letter from Mr. Monks announcing that he had received £260 towards the £300 required for the new organ. After an appropriate reference to the recent outrage upon the Queen, he continued:—In the report which was published very lately they would remember that he noticed the very cordial feeling which had animated them during the past year, and he expressed his deep thankfulness at that fact. He was glad to think that on both sides—the side of the minister and the side of the people—there was nothing but the friendliest feeling, and the most earnest and zealous co-operation. Unitarians professed that they had no creed. They had a creed—a definite system of doctrines, which they had clung to with steady enthusiasm, and for the sake of which they bore the heat and burden of the day, and what was still harder to bear, exclusion from communion of other churches. If they had not a deep and vital faith in the great principles which they professed, they would, he dare say, be like a great many others—enjoy fair weather and the pleasure of going with the stream; and not stand out singularly as they did. The difference between them and other deno-

THE DECAY OF MODERN PREACHING.*

THE learned author of the interesting treatise we have mentioned below assumes that "the decay of modern preaching" is an almost universally admitted fact, and it is not for us to dispute the authority on such a subject of a University professor and theological lecturer who, from his close connection with a great historical church, has much wider experience than we can claim. Mr. MAHAFFY'S opinion is quite in harmony with the general tone of the secular Press, which is never tired of lecturing the clergy on the dulness and inefficiency of their public ministrations; and recent statistical returns seem to show still more conclusively that in our large towns at least the larger number of the population remain aloof from an institution which is usually represented as "a means of grace," if not as an indispensable agency of salvation. At no recent date it used to be considered as a homage due to the stern exaction of "society" to go to church at least once a day, and there are still country towns and rural districts where systematic absence from church and the slightest suspicion of heterodoxy are sufficient to exclude otherwise estimable people from good society. Happily we are outgrowing this sort of religious Pharisaism in the large towns, although the fact that a considerable number of the more intelligent classes, and young men especially, are from various causes drifting away from all churches and neglecting the practice of worship in any form is by no means a subject of congratulation, but quite the reverse. There seems, on the whole, to be too much reason for Mr. MAHAFFY'S opening remark, that "there are perhaps few institutions in modern life more universally accepted, and at the same time decried, than that of preaching." Yet at the same time it is equally true that "a great preacher, though, perhaps, no longer a great power, attracts crowds of hearers wherever he is to be heard." And the same may be said not only of great preachers like Canon LIDDON, Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE, and Canon FARRAR, but of men of far less culture and social consideration who have a real message to this busy modern world, and know how to deliver it in a simple, homely, effective style, and not as the mere routiniers of conventional pulpits.

But, unfortunately, we hear these prevailing complaints of the inefficiency of modern preaching not merely from the ordinary "people of the world," looking upon the whole matter from a purely conventional point of view, but from serious and earnest and thoughtful persons who complain that they live in a dry and barren land where there are no food and water. They look up to the preacher with eager souls vainly searching for spiritual life, and complaining that when they ask for bread they receive but a stone. It is in fact, says our author, only the simplest or the most old-fashioned congregations who are nowadays satisfied with preaching, and who regard it habitually as a spiritual boon.

Is this a fair statement of the condition of the Pulpit in these days? We are inclined to think that it is, and we are thankful that so competent and experienced a writer as Mr. MAHAFFY, well known to us by his admirable works on the "Social Life of Ancient Greece" and the "History of Greek Literature," has instituted in this little work the inquiry whether the decadence of the pulpit is necessary and inherent in the nature of things, or whether it is due to defects and difficulties which may be lessened or removed.

We purpose in this and two or three subsequent articles, following Mr. MAHAFFY'S divisions, and largely quoting from his admirable little work, to consider some of the main causes of hindrance to the success of the Pulpit, and to examine some of the proposed remedies.

The growing want of sympathy between the ordinary preacher and his congregation—which seems to be generally admitted—is it due to his fault or to theirs, or to the fault of both, or to the march of events which neither can control? That is the real practical question which this thoughtful little book helps us to answer.

Mr. MAHAFFY classifies the causes of hindrance to the success of the Pulpit into—first, historical, secondly, social, and thirdly, personal. By historical causes are meant those which depend on the great changes in human life and opinion produced by the course of ages, and for which the preacher is not at fault. Social causes are those arising from the general action of society upon the Pulpit, such as any single man can hardly overcome; and personal causes are such as arise not from the outer circumstances but from the character of the preacher, defects in education, mistaken theories of preaching and the like.

In speaking of the historical causes our Essayist remarks that nothing is more marked in most Christian preachers than the firmness with which they hold and declare that their form of faith was established once for all by its founder, and that no change or modification whatever is to be tolerated by the Orthodox. "The rigid adherence to the doctrines of Christianity is extended even to the very form in which it is preached, and nothing is thought better or more profitable than to repeat the old watchwords of those who once stirred the world to its depths." But, as a matter of fact, it is obvious that the circumstances of the modern world are so greatly different from those of the primitive Christian age that much of the language of the Evangelists and Apostles needs to be largely qualified in its application to our condition. The early missionaries of Christianity preached a new faith in the midst of a heathen civilisation; they boldly proclaimed the downfall of the old Polytheistic religions; they called upon their hearers to abandon all their old traditions, beliefs, social customs, and religious observances. The old formula which then converted the world is now almost powerless, and falls upon comparatively indifferent ears. To proclaim to a company of Christians, as Mr. MAHAFFY observes, the once magical Evangelical watchword, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," is to tell them to do what they already profess to do. "There is a necessary decrease in the power of preaching from the loss of novelty in its creed. The preaching of the eighteenth century is in form not the best preaching for the nineteenth. How much less is the preaching of the second century a model for those who desire now to reform the world! No employment of second century formulas, with the aid of new and subtle meanings, will satisfy the present need of spiritual help and direction."

The decay of preaching is again partly occasioned by the raising of the general standard of education. There is no longer the same difference of intellectual level between the preacher and his congregation, except, perhaps, in the rural districts. The preacher can no longer claim special authority, nor is he the sole instructor of the people. The Press more than rivals the Pulpit in the extent and depth of its influence; and even in theological matters a large number of persons in most congregations—especially we may add among Unitarians and the more cultivated class of Nonconformists generally—are apt to think that they know as much as their ministers, and listen to their sermons only to approve or disapprove, according as their critical judgment leads them. And we fear there is much truth in Mr. MAHAFFY'S caustic remark that if a second PAUL were to stand forth to this class of persons, even though they had the discretion or the good taste not to mock, they would say to him calmly, "We would hear thee again of this matter."

And this accounts for the fact, as our author adds in the same style of veiled sarcasm, that no missions are attempted to the professors at the German universities, though they are believed by evangelical Christians to require conversion as much as any class in the world. "Their intellectual level is too high, and, like the Brahmins in India, they look with contempt upon the most earnest and pious missionary, because they believe he has not thought, or is not capable of thinking, as deeply as they on spiritual subjects."

Yet we are not prepared to adopt the conclusion that "to such people regular preaching is well-nigh useless, and for all practical purposes an anachronism." It is certainly true that the world cannot be saved by "the foolishness of preaching," nor does that greatly misunderstood text imply that the world ever was saved by preaching that was not wise and searching, and that did not appeal to great and permanent spiritual realities. But preaching of the highest order—if we can only get it—is still needed as much as ever to save people from their self-conceit and self-sufficiency, to break through the thick crust of their hard earth-bound natures, and awaken them to a deeper consciousness of their moral obligations and spiritual relations. And if we had generally preachers who were filled with a noble enthusiasm for God and humanity, and appealed with something of the old fire and directness to the universal sentiments and aspirations that are latent in the human heart, we verily believe that the Pulpit will still hold, or if it has lost it, will regain the position which it once occupied as the foremost agency of moral and social reform and religious culture, notwithstanding the alleged loss of novelty in the main subjects of preaching, and the general growth of intelligence and culture in modern congregations.

DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY:

III.—THE ATONEMENT.

If evidence were needed how completely the liberal orthodoxy of our day has abandoned the old positions so vigorously and tenaciously held by orthodox theologians of the old school, it is furnished in abundance by the Rev. JOHN HUNTER'S fourth lecture in his course on "Old Truths Restated." The subject was that vital doctrine of the popular theology—the Atonement; and we can say, Unitarian as we are, that we have read the report, which occupies a column and a third of the Christian World, with almost entire approval. It is indeed a remarkable lecture as coming from an avowedly orthodox source, and abundantly justifies the heading we have given to these criticisms. We have seen the orthodox doctrines of the Trinity and the Deity of CHRIST fade away like dissolving views under the ingenious manipulation of Mr. HUNTER, and now we have to witness the same process with regard to the doctrine of Atonement.

Mr. HUNTER chose for his text the words "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." He began with saying that he preferred the word "reconciliation" to "atonement," as Unitarians have said before; and he takes note of the fact that the word

"atonement" occurs but once in the Authorised Version of the New Testament, and even there, in the Revised Version, "it has been well replaced by reconciliation." This is the rendering which Unitarians have contended for, as their controversial writings will clearly show. Mr. HUNTER says "the two words mean the same thing." Not precisely, we think. It is true the idea of reconciliation is present in the word atonement, but something more than that is conveyed, namely, expiation, sacrifice, satisfaction. Reconciliation is much the simpler and more easily understood word of the two. Mr. HUNTER'S theory is this:—"The need of reconciliation arises from the conviction of sin—and sin is the alienation of man from God and the divine order of human life, through the assertion of the selfish nature and will, as the final law. The state for which we were created was union with God, and our inward disquietude found its true interpretation in the fact that we were living in a sinful state—that is, an unnatural state. We were made for God, but our wills were in conflict with the Divine will; we were at strife with the Divine order of our life; our powers, affections, and activities were estranged from God, and were restless in their departure from Him. In the visible creation man was the only creature who could alienate himself from God, and be at strife with the Divine relations and order of his life. The faculties which clothed him with the majesty of freedom made it possible for him to transgress and depart from the Divine order of his being and life. He was permitted to live and move in a domain of liberty that he may have opportunity to find himself and achieve a moral existence." Sin, then, according to Mr. HUNTER, is the abuse of man's moral freedom—that abuse brings about an unnatural state, the alienation of man from God. This is a sinful state, and our great need is to become reconciled to God. This is a simple theory, but it is not the foundation of the old orthodox doctrine of atonement. The basis of that doctrine was the fall of man, which not only alienated man from God, but estranged God from man, so that God needed to be reconciled to man. This reconciliation could be affected only by the death of His Son, who, by his sacrifice of himself, appeased the wrath of God against man, satisfied the claims of Divine justice, and opened the way to reconciliation between the angry Deity and his offending creature.

Let us look once more at Mr. HUNTER'S version of the affair:—

The Atonement was, in the first place, the establishment of personal and filial relations with God, interrupted and broken by sin. The personal intimacy of Jesus with the Father, his perfect trust, submission, obedience, love, his filial intercourse and communion, gave us the Divine interpretation of our existence. He revealed in his own person the Divine idea of our human righteousness, the meaning and end of the Divine redemption, the reconciliation of man to God, the harmony of the human and the Divine. The Christian idea of reconciliation included all possible reconciliations; it regarded man as a whole, touched every aspect of his being, every relation and province of his life. The physical life had its Divine order, which no ignorance or wilful blindness on our part could alter or reverse, and an important part of our well-being depended on being reconciled to God as He was revealed in the laws impressed on our physical constitution and the constitution of the world. The bringing of our thought into harmony with the Divine thought was the aspect which reconciliation assumed in the intellectual sphere. The alienation of the mind from God consisted in thinking as we pleased and believing as we liked. There was also a Divine moral order wrought into the very substance of our human being, and man's nature was full of fundamental discords and differences so long as he lost sight of the righteousness of God and set up some selfish scheme of life in its stead. The divine order for men in relation with one another was that of a family, and whenever or wherever the laws of brotherhood were violated or broken, society was torn asunder, injustice, selfishness, exclusiveness and antagonism prevailed. The life of personal communion with God had also its order without variableness or the shadow of a turning, and which was confirmed by all genuine religious experience. The heart must be penitent and pure before it could be blessed with the peace and vision of God. Reconciliation to our earthly lot as the discipline of heaven, the Father's education of his children was also another aspect of reconciliation to God. To be able to approach God without fear, and to look on his face in righteousness, to have removed the dark barrier of distrust and conscious guilt which separated us from the light of his countenance, to have our minds and hearts brought into filial sympathy with his mind and heart, our wills into sweet and perfect accord with his will, and our whole nature and life into complete harmony with the Divine law and order—this was the highest conceivable blessing man could obtain, and it was the blessing which through Jesus Christ our Lord could be obtained by every man.

Now all this might be said in any Unitarian pulpit, and would be heard with hearty acceptance by the majority of any Unitarian congregation. Passages might be taken from Unitarian discourses identical in thought with the above. But, perhaps, Mr. HUNTER throws in the orthodox strongly in the concluding portion of his discourse. Let us see:—

Sinful man brought by Christ into harmonious relations with God—this was the fact of the Christian atonement, its positive and practical side, whatever might be its philosophy. The whole manifestation of Christ, and not the death on the Cross only, was and is the mighty power of atonement. His divine personality and character, his entire life and ministry, all that he was and did have rendered possible a union and communion with God which impart a new life and hope and power of progress and redemption to mankind.

It is true Mr. HUNTER adds, "CHRIST, while he was God toward man, is man toward God, &c.," but this is just the saving bit of Orthodoxy thrown in there and there, and but for which the discourse from beginning to end would be a noble utterance of spiritual Unitarianism. "The process of atonement," he says, "cannot be explained, but the moral force of it lay in the fact that it was the Divine love, self-sacrifice and forgiveness which we behold in CHRIST." Mr. HUNTER expressly repudiates "the coarse conceptions of the atonement" which have hitherto been the popular exposition of the doctrine. He speaks of them as the "dark ideas and dreams of human brains which had embarrassed the subject with subtle questions and obscured the simplicity that is in CHRIST;" and again, as "notions that have filled the heavens with lurid visions of an implacable Deity, and made men imagine that it was from God and not to God they had to be redeemed."

We might quote still more from this remarkable discourse. It is full of ideas which may be found expressed in nearly the same terms in the writings of the more spiritual school of Unitarians. It is a great step in advance from the ordinary orthodox standpoint towards a rational theology. What have been hitherto the popular ideas of the atonement are all conspicuous by their absence. There is not a word about the legal theory of the atonement, the satisfaction scheme, the claims of Divine justice insisting on the punishment of some one to satisfy the broken law, nothing about God's wrath, of his being made placable, and of his being enabled to forgive the sinner by CHRIST'S sacrifice of himself; nothing of the "blood of CHRIST"—the expression is not even mentioned; nothing of CHRIST having died literally in our stead, to save us from the penalty which, through ADAM'S fall, all mankind had incurred, nothing about any relation between the death of CHRIST and the sacrifices under the Jewish law, nothing of CHRIST'S being forsaken of GOD in his hour of suffering, and left God-forsaken to bear alone all the burden of human sin, and dying of a broken heart in consequence, according to Mr. R. W. DALE'S wonderful exposition. Mr. HUNTER'S view is happily free from all these "dark dreams" and "lurid visions;" but, so far as it is free, it surrenders the popular theology, and what remains is only a dissolving view of Orthodoxy.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXVI.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

151. REV. JOHN STEVENSON GEARY (1820-38).—Minister of the Presbyterian Congregation at Brentford (1815-38).

152. JOHN WANSEY, Esq. (1820-32), of Walthamstow.—A member of the Presbyterian Board as a representative of Jewin-street Chapel. He succeeded his father in the Trust, and on his death, in 1832, was succeeded by his nephew, Wm. Wansey, Esq.

153. REV. JOHN PHILIP MALLESON, B.A. (1821-22).—Minister of Hanover-street Chapel, Long-acre (1819-22). In 1822 he removed to Leeds, having accepted the office of Chaplain to Mrs. Milnes, of Fryston Hall (grandmother of Lord Houghton). In 1828 he settled at Brighton, where for many years he conducted a school of high reputation, being at the same time minister of the Unitarian Chapel there. After thirty-two years thus spent he retired to Croydon, and was re-elected a Trustee in 1860.

154. REV. JOHN JONES, LL.D. (1821-27).—Author of numerous works on theological and ecclesiastical questions, but chiefly distinguished as a classical scholar and teacher; author of Greek and Latin Grammars, Greek-English Lexicon, Latin-English Vocabulary, and other educational Handbooks. He was a relative of Dr. Priestley's colleague, the Rev. David Jones, known as "The Welsh Freeholder," in his controversy with Bishop Horsley. Dr. Jones was born about the year 1766, near Llandovery, Carmarthenshire; educated at the endowed Grammar School, called Christ's College, at Brecon, and afterwards at the New College, Hackney, where he studied for six years, and was a favourite pupil of Gilbert Wakefield. For some time (1792-95) he was one of the tutors at the Presbyterian College, then located at Swansea. After short settlements as a minister at Plymouth and Halifax he returned to London, where he resided during the rest of his life. He occupied himself chiefly as a teacher of the classical languages, and in that capacity acquired a high reputation. For many years his services were in great request amongst persons of rank and eminence. For a considerable time he superintended the education of the sons of Sir Samuel Romilly. He was a zealous defender of Christianity against Deistical writers; but although a Unitarian, he wrote a work "in which is demonstrated the genuineness of the Three Heavenly Witnesses, 1 John v. 7"; and in other writings he maintained some singular opinions. "The characteristics of Dr. Jones's mind were an irrepressible ardour and enthusiasm in the prosecution of whatever he undertook, great confidence in the correctness of his own views, arising from a consciousness of superior intellectual powers; an utter disdain of the authority of great names when he failed to be convinced by their argument; a devoted attachment to truth, and a faithful adherence to what he deemed such, united with a fearless disregard of personal consequences." The University of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and he was a Member of the Royal Society of Literature. He died 10th Jan., 1827.*

* There was at the same time in London another John Jones, LL.D., who also came from the neighbourhood of Llandovery, and who, like his namesake, was a man of strong intellectual powers and eminence as a scholar. This gentleman was a barrister by profession, the author of a treatise entitled "De Libellis Famosis," 1818; but he is mentioned here chiefly on account of a work which might naturally be attributed to the clerical Dr. Jones—a new translation of the our Gospels into Welsh (1826). He possessed considerable critical knowledge as a Greek scholar, and was

A Latin inscription over his grave at St. George's, Bloomsbury, described him as Vir sacris profanisque literis apprime peritus. His first wife was the only daughter of Dr. Abraham Rees.

155. REV. THOMAS JERVIS (1823-33).—Re-elected a trustee in 1823. A full account of him has already been given.

156. DAVID MARTINEAU, Esq. (1823-36).—Son of David and Sarah Martineau, of Norwich, and great grandson of Gaston Martineau, a French Emigré of 1688, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He was born at Norwich in 1754; carried on the business of scarlet dying until 1798, when he removed to London, and became first a brewer, and then a sugar refiner. He resigned Dr. Williams's Trust in 1836, and died at his residence at Stockwell Common, Nov. 15, 1840, aged eighty-six years. A fine engraved portrait of him was kindly contributed by his daughter, Miss Martineau, of Stockwell, to the collection presented to Dr. Williams's Library.

AN ANTI-OPIMUM CONVERSAZIONE.—By the invitation of Mr. George Williams, Mr. James Mattheson, Mr. T. A. Denny, and Mr. T. B. Smithies, a conversazione was held at Exeter Hall on Wednesday last. The chair was taken by the Right Hon. Lord Polwarth, who briefly stated that they had come there to learn from the missionaries present what were the effects, physically, morally, and intellectually, of opium-smoking. The first reply to this question came from Mr. Collins, twenty-three years medical missionary in China. He said that the opium-smoker could not work like a healthy man, that he had to leave off to take opium, and that the longer he indulged in the habit the more he took of it. The working classes in China were especially enfeebled by it. Dr. Galt, formerly medical missionary in China, in charge of an opium hospital, said he could at once tell the opium-smoker by his sallow appearance and bloodless lip, and shortness of breath. The habit reduces a man to poverty, as he will sell everything to procure opium. Dr. Underhill asked if there were no moderate opium smoking, but the answers seemed to imply that it was so wondrous a drug that in a little time moderation was quite out of the question. In answer to a question from Mr. Henry Varley, it came out that the labouring classes were not, as a rule, opium smokers. According to Dr. Maxwell, eight years medical missionary (Presbyterian) in China, in the large cities the proportion of opium smokers among all classes was very large. In one city of 200,000 population, half were opium smokers, and some smoked as much as three drachms a day. A working man earning a shilling would spend two-thirds of that sum in the purchase of opium. Morally, the Christians in China held the custom to be so bad that they would not admit an opium smoker to the privileges of Church membership. Mr. Baker, eight years in the China Inland Mission, testified to the increase of poverty and crime in consequence of the opium smoking. Mr. James Sadler, fourteen years agent in China of the London Missionary Society, followed, and gave similar testimony; as did Dr. Gauld, fourteen years medical missionary. In answer to a question from Sir Thomas Chambers, M.P., Mr. Hugh Matheson said that in China the supply created the demand. In the early part of the present century opium smoking was rare in China, but now the habit was rapidly extending. Mr. Arthur E. Moule, twenty years missionary in China, stated that in Ningpo there were 17,000 opium dens, in a population of 400,000. Mr. Collins had said one per cent. of the Chinese were opium smokers; but he thought that estimate rather under the mark. One of the questions put was as to the ability of the smoker to give up his habit. Mr. Collins had only known one such case. Dr. Galt said they came to the hospital to give it up, but they speedily relapsed.

It was resolved at Vienna last year that the next meeting of the International Literary Congress should be held in Italy, and that the central committee should choose the city in which the meeting would be held. We hear that Rome has now been chosen as the place, and the month of May as the time of meeting.

deeply read in the manuscript records of this and other countries. A portrait of him is prefixed to his "History of Wales" (8vo., 1824). He died in 1838. He was not the popular advocate and verdict-winner of the South Wales Circuit—John Jones, of Ystrad—who died about that time, but who is still well remembered in legal circles.

Occasional Notes.

THE House of Lords on Thursday night "assisted" at a prolonged and most ponderous joke, viz., the discussion of Lord Redesdale's wonderful Bill for creating a new religious test upon an existing oath, which most sensible people on the Liberal side are anxious to get rid of as both irritating and irrational in itself, and an unwarrantable interference with the constitutional rights of constituencies. It would be an affront to our readers' intelligence, and simply a waste of time to argue against an absurd proposition, which even one of the most orthodox of the Bishops condemned, the evangelical Lord Shaftesbury opposed, the High Church, Marquis of Salisbury threw over, and its own author was forced ignominiously to abandon. It is something to the credit of the Lords that not a single member of their House was found to support the proposition, with the exception of the Orange Lord Oranmore, whose support is alone almost sufficient to condemn any measure. But there are depths of absurdity into which even the Upper House cannot be persuaded to follow their Chairman of Committees. It is delightful to hear Lord Shaftesbury emphatically asserting that "the general current of opinion at the present day was against all tests and promissory oaths whatever, and that Lord Redesdale's Bill, if passed, "would create the greatest possible disgust in the minds of a great many people who would think that there were still further tests behind." One good effect has arisen from this debate. It has proved more conclusively than ever that any inquiry into religious belief as a necessary condition of exercising political rights is utterly wrong in principle, and that, as the Duke of Argyll said, an affirmation should be allowed, as well as oath, or, as we contend, in place of the oath.

We have more than once expressed the opinion that the treatment of the eccentric but excellent people of the "Salvation Army" is monstrous, and reminds us of the brutality of the mob towards Wesley and Whitefield in the worst period of the eighteenth century. We are glad to observe the manly tone of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P., in a letter to a gentleman at Dawlish, sending a subscription towards the expenses of Captain Trenhall, of the Exeter Salvation Army, who was recently summoned before the Exeter magistrates for street obstruction. Sir Wilfrid says: "I look with considerable alarm on the mob law which, at the instigation of the drink trade, and with the connivance of the magistrates, appears now to reign in several of our towns. From what the Home Secretary stated in the House of Commons it appears that at present we can bring no influence to bear in Parliament which may conduce to a better state of things. Some of my friends in the House, as well as myself, are anxious, however, in every practical manner, to show our deep disgust at the organised rowdyism which reigns rampant in so many localities, as well as our sympathy with the harmless people whom the authorities fail to protect from brutal outrages." In the same letter Sir Wilfrid Lawson enclosed contributions from the following members of Parliament: Messrs. Hugh Mason, J. Cropper, W. S. Caine, W. Fowler, and Arthur Pease. It is quite clear that either all street processions should be stopped as illegal, or that the Salvationists should be protected just as much as any other religious body from popular outrages.

THE Leeds Mercury prints the following story which, it remarks, might well be deemed incredible were it not for some recent revelations:—An old lady, the widow of a Wesleyan minister, died at Helmsley recently, and her friends wished her body to be laid beside that of her late husband in the consecrated portion of the parochial burial-ground. It is said that such obstacles to the realisation of this wish were interposed by the vicar, the Rev. C. N. Gray, that eventually the relations had to content themselves by procuring a grave for the deceased in the unconsecrated part of the cemetery. On the day of the funeral, as the party of mourners were about to enter the burial-ground by the ordinary gate, they were warned away, and ordered to enter by a meaner door. This order was given, we are told, on the authority of the Rev. Mr. Nightingale, by the vicar, because "the passing of Non-conformist funerals over consecrated ground" might wound the feelings of Church people! The story is perfectly credible. The bigotry of some of the country clergy is an unknown quantity.

THE nomination of a Professor of Moral Philosophy for Dublin University has resulted in the choice of Dr. Thomas M. Maguire, a well-known scholar and metaphysician, already a Fellow of Trinity College. The appointment is one of unusual significance, as Dr. Maguire is the first Roman Catholic who has held this post, as he is the first Catholic Fellow, and was also the first Catholic Scholar. Since the removal of the religious restrictions and tests which formerly barred such positions in the Dublin University to all but Episcopalians, the personnel of the staff is gradually undergoing a remarkable change, the full effect of which will only be seen and felt in years to come.

WE commend to Lord Redesdale's attention the following passage just written by that eminent authority, M. Lemoine:—"Well, now, we ask religious men is this what they call an oath before God? Ought we not rather to regard the measure which will suppress the formula of an oath as a religious, moral, and virtuous measure? For the honour of sworn faith, for the honour of human conscience, and, if we may so say, for the honour of God himself, it is our duty to suppress oaths, which are only profanations, lies, sacrileges, and perjuries."

MR. WILLIAM HOYLE has just published his annual statement of the liquor traffic, from which it appears that an increase is shown by the Excise returns of something over three per cent. in 1881 beyond the aggregate outlay of 1880 upon beer, British and foreign spirits, and British and foreign wines. A hundred and twenty-seven millions sterling were spent in this way last year, as against a hundred and twenty-two in the preceding twelve months.

M. DESOR, the Swiss naturalist, has lately died, and in accordance with his expressed desire, no ceremonial accompanied the deposition of his body in the grave. His useful text-book on Ornithology will preserve his name for a long time. He was a professed Protestant, but belonged certainly to the Liberal section, and the Freethought Society of Nice claim him as a member.

A NEW journal, Le Pelerin, the advocate of pilgrimages, which are the latest revival of fashion in France and Spain, is being issued, to keep the faithful informed of the newest projects which we on this side undertake, pioneered by Cook or Gaze. Late in this year we are offered an opportunity of going to Nazareth, as the journal confidently informs, to meet François d'Assise, who will greet his visitants on the occasion of the seventh centenary of his death.

A TALE, which has recently been completed in the pages of Blackwood's Magazine, entitled "The Fixed Period," has just been issued in two volumes, with the well-known name of Mr. Anthony Trollope as the author. The subject is rather a ghastly one, and it is spun out much too long. The date is supposed to be a hundred years hence; the scene an island called Britannula, inhabited by an English colony who enjoy the privilege of self-government. Under the persuasive influence of an enthusiast, they adopt a law to the effect that at sixty-seven years of age every inhabitant shall withdraw from active life, and after spending twelve months in a college provided for the purpose, shall be painlessly put to death, and then cremated. The story of the passing of this law, of the arguments by which it was supported, and of the practical difficulty, ending in failure, which stood in the way of its being carried out, is supposed to be told by the President of the island, who, according to his own showing, seems to have been a monomaniac, and is certainly a bore. Anthony is weakly imitating the late Lord Lytton's "Coming Race," and would do better by giving us more of his charming stories of political and ecclesiastical life in England.

As an indication of the scarcity of candidates for the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, it may be noted that the Dromore diocesan correspondent of the Ecclesiastical Gazette states that "non-university and short service men are now in the ascendant," the latest appointments to large and important parishes having been conferred in one case on a rector only four years in orders, and in the other, on one barely thirteen months ordained; neither gentlemen possessing a University degree.

BIRMINGHAM.—The last service in the Old Meeting-house took place on Sunday, when the Rev. Charles Clarke, the retiring minister, closed a pastorate of thirty years' duration by preaching morning and evening. In recording the services the Birmingham Daily Post says:—"The Old Meeting congregation dates from 1662, when several ministers of the Church of England, ejected from their livings for non-compliance with the Act of Uniformity, settled in Birmingham. These were Mr. Turton, of Rowley Regis, Mr. Fincher, of Wednesbury, and Mr. Baldwin, of Clent. Though dispossessed, and legally forbidden to continue their ministry, these sufferers for conscience' sake obeyed the higher law, and, regardless of penalties, conducted services in and about Birmingham for several years. In 1669, when the law was relaxed by the Toleration Act, the three ministers, with others, appeared at Warwick Sessions, and took out licenses as Protestant Dissenters. One of them, Mr. Turton, became the first regular minister of the Old Meeting, which was organised on the Presbyterian model, and which, though since 1748 associated with the Unitarian body, has always retained the Presbyterian name. In reality, however, the place has from the outset literally been independent of sect, for the trust deeds contain no theological tests of ministry or membership, and we believe that the society has never in any formal way given its corporate adhesion to any confession of doctrine. Reckoning Mr. Turton, there have been fifteen ministers since the first assembling of the congregation; among whom the names of Samuel Clarke, John Corrie, Joshua Scholefield, Hugh Hutton, and Charles Clarke stand out conspicuous for length of service, or capacity, or both. The two last named—Mr. Hugh Hutton and Mr. Charles Clarke—than whom none have been more laborious or eminent, ministered to the congregation for a period of nearly sixty years; Mr. Hutton's ministry having extended over twenty-nine years, and Mr. Clarke's over thirty years. The Post adds:—"When the chapel property was sold to the railway company, a claim for compensation for disturbance was preferred on Mr. Clarke's behalf, and the company agreed to give a sum of £2,000 in satisfaction of this claim, in addition to the £30,000 agreed to be paid for the property held by the trustees. It was thought necessary that Mr. Clarke should formally resign in order to complete the legal arrangements; and accordingly, with this view, he placed his resignation in the hands of the trustees, and it was accepted by a meeting of seatholders. At the same meeting a motion was proposed for the re-election of Mr. Clarke as minister of the congregation; but upon a ballot being taken this motion was rejected by a majority. Consequently Mr. Clarke's pastorate came to an end on Sunday, thus closing a connection maintained unbroken for thirty years, and characterised throughout by faithful, laborious, and unselfish service."

THE LONDON AND PROVINCIAL HOUSE, LAND, MORTGAGE AND INVESTMENT COMPANY, the prospectus of which is given in our advertising columns, is a new Building Society formed for the purpose of acquiring good marketable properties and estates, and for their development, improvement, and sale. This is an excellent time for acquiring such properties to great advantage, and it is well-known that securities of this description are among the best kind of investments. The company is brought out under good auspices, and the liability of shareholders is limited to the amount of their shares.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday. The debate on the question of higher elementary education was resumed and adjourned. The Drapers' Company placed at the disposal of the Board four scholarships, two for boys and two for girls, each of the average value of £30 per annum, and tenable for four years.

THE death is announced of Mr. William Newmarch, for many years general manager in the banking firm of Messrs. Glyn, Mills and Currie, and formerly President of the Statistical Society.

Reviews.

Moses and Geology; or the Harmony of the Bible with Science. By Samuel Kinns, Ph.D., Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society; Member of the Biblical Archaeological Society; Principal of the College, Highbury New Park. London: Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co. 1882.

The author of this book has succeeded in launching his work under most brilliant auspices. It is as well printed as all but the very best publications of the firm whose imprint it bears. The type is good, the paper excellent, the illustrations 110 in number, and beautifully produced, and the binding is very tasteful. The dedication is to the Right Rev. Bishop Claughton, D.D., "as a mark of appreciation of his valuable friendship, which the author has enjoyed for the last ten years, and has found a source of continual encouragement in all his professional and scientific engagements." There is, moreover, appended a list of subscribers "who honoured the author with their names during the compilation of the work"—a galaxy of stars which must excite the envy of many a writer who timidly places before the world matters destined to revolutionise its thought. In this list are thirteen "Right Honourables," five of whom are Earls; fourteen "Right Reverends," several "Very Reverends," and a host of Reverends, Esquires, ladies, &c.—enough to make the author proud, but forming, nevertheless, the very élite of that class whose prejudices are decidedly in favour of "Moses" as against "Science."

In his preface the author confesses that he "cannot sufficiently express his most sincere thanks to the Lord Bishop of London, to Bishop Claughton, to my esteemed vicar, and numerous other friends for the encouragement they so kindly gave me before many pages were written." "To the noblemen and eminent men who have also honoured him with their support" he tenders his grateful acknowledgments, as well as to the Rev. Prebendary Reynolds and others whom he has had "from first to last the privilege of consulting." Following the preface is yet another page devoted to "Gratiae," and, in fact, the volume reeks from beginning to end with a servile obsequiousness unworthy of a charity boy. The author will also be seen to be in very excellent conceit with himself, but to our mind his book is as lamentable an exhibition of literary charlatanism as could well be made. We are not glad to receive books of this kind, but we are gratified to find in this case that an extraordinary amount of "patronage" has apparently been necessary to make the publication a safe venture.

In thirteen chapters on Astronomy, Geology, Chemistry, Botany, Zoology, Human Physiology, &c., &c., the attempt is made to prove "the remarkable correctness of the order of fifteen creative events as given by Moses," the author falling back upon the far-fetched fancy of Hugh Miller that the "order of creation" was revealed to Moses in a series of visions upon Mount Sinai, and the spirit of Hugh Miller himself is called up from the "vasty deep" to testify to the undeniable harmony of ancient Jewish notions with modern science. In Hugh Miller's lifetime his "Testimony of the Rocks" was never received by those who were acquainted with the science of geology even as it then stood, and all smiled at his "visions" except those who had a supernatural revelation to defend and needed an argument wherewith to defend it. The science of geology, however, is not to-day what it was when the "Testimony of the Rocks" was published, and if Mr. Kinns is satisfied with Hugh Miller's authority, he is ill-qualified to touch the subject at all.

"For myself," says the author, "I am thoroughly convinced that when Moses was on Sinai's top God rehearsed to him these particulars; and it seems to me most probable that he did so by a series of panoramic visions." "Thoroughly convinced," are you, Mr. Kinns? And are you as thoroughly convinced of the former existence of a race of ladies who rode through the air on broomsticks? And if not, why not? We cannot deny, however, that this theory is a very ingenious one, and would have reflected some credit upon the author, and perhaps have saved his book from the contempt it deserves—

if it had been original. "To prove that all these events happened in this order, with probable intervals of thousands, and it may have been millions of years between each, is the task I have set myself to do." A Herculean task, surely, especially when we reflect that it was so well executed for the author nearly thirty years ago. Nevertheless the small boys at the little school at Highbury will be duly impressed, no doubt, by this pomposity, and the amazement of the pupils of Goldsmith's village schoolmaster will be theirs—

And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew,
That one small head should carry all he knew.

Taking this sentence from an eminent author, "To make them square with science new meanings have been found for the beautiful myths and stories of the Bible," he, with a striking touch of genius, substitutes for it these words, "Upon a careful study of the sublime truths and stories of the Bible they will be found to harmonise with science." Mr. Kinns actually admits that there are men of mark and eminence in the scientific world whose views are opposite to his own, but, he adds, "there are also not a few who cherish for the Bible such a sincere regard and deep reverence that they look with some amount of distrust upon any new translation of the original text, or upon any explanations of its teachings other than those which they have held from their childhood upwards." Exactly so. Concerning some of the things about which the author of this wonderful book feels doubts, in opposition to those who know, the Times recently in a leading article declared that not a single man of any eminence in science now doubted them. To the great men whose observations have enriched mankind for all time with these discoveries the author graciously extends his patronage. "We all owe them," says he, "a debt of gratitude for their many valuable discoveries," &c. "Perhaps it may be that some of my arguments will be successful in winning over to our side these scientific men, who so well deserve our esteem." What evil have Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Hooker, Wallace, Spencer, and the rest done that they should so well deserve "our" esteem?

In the first chapter the author gives a list of names of persons who, although more or less eminent in science, yet adhered to the "truth and authenticity of the Bible." Amongst these not a single name appears of any man who was either acquainted with the biological teachings, or who was in a position to understand the scientific methods of the present day. Sir Isaac Newton heads the list, but Mr. Kinns does not point out that Sir Isaac's opinions of the Bible differed very widely from his own, that in fact he held certain heretical opinions at a time when to hold those very opinions was penal. George Stevenson also was a very good man in his way, but it is highly absurd to cite him as a case of a scientific man holding orthodox views—seeing that he was neither a scientific man at all in the proper sense of the word, nor one in any way qualified to judge a question of Biblical criticism. Dr. Samuel Johnson brings up the rear of these stars, but he could not possibly know what is now meant by science, and, moreover, he made a point of believing what the Church taught. The trick of calling up testimony of this kind is always illogical—in this case it is ridiculous, and we wonder Mr. Kinns cannot see it.

The author lays much stress upon the manifesto drawn up at the time of the meeting of the British Association in 1865, and signed by 617 "scientific men." He seems to attach great value to this kind of reasoning; and at the end of the volume he gives a selected list of one hundred and fifty of these names, so important is it to his position. The "manifesto," it will be remembered, deprecates the "perverting of researches into scientific truth for casting doubt upon the truth and authenticity of the Holy Scriptures." It is an unfortunate thing for the peace of mind of those who wish to believe their "much-prized Bible," as the author calls it, that scientific truth clashes so much with "Mosaic" cosmogony, and that so much harmonising (as it is absurdly called) of the Bible with science should be necessary. But if this be so we cannot help it. So long as people prefer to see by what was taught them in their childhood, or what was taught in the childhood of the world, in spite of the contradictions given by newer discoveries, they must expect to have plenty of work to do in "squaring" the old with the new, if such a thing be possible; but these harmonisers must not be surprised because the world will not heed their far-fetched arguments, strainings of scientific facts, and childish interpretations of "Moses;" and they would do well to avoid flourishing about words and phrases, as our author does, such as "infidel," "sceptic," "God's word must prevail," and the like.

The work is a curious medley of scientific information, theological curiosities, allegories, anecdotes, &c. The author, indeed, apologises for the allegories and anecdotes, "which may not appear to have a direct bearing upon the special subjects of the various chapters;" but he pleads that similar digressions have been pleasing to his audiences. A reference to the preface tells us that these audiences were composed of his pupils, in lectures he has given them at the British Museum and the South Kensington Museum. We fear the authorities at those places have found the lecturer a somewhat tiresome person; his distortions of the teachings of the museums must have distorted their features occasionally.

When we came to the author's setting out of the "fifteen creative events," the matter looked much like a huge joke, and had it appeared in a comic journal we are sure we should have laughed at it heartily. It is not worthy of argument.

The author's display of scholarship is but little help to his argument, because antecedently of the question of correctness of text it is not feasible that any interpretation short of a forced and improbable one should show that the writers of the early Jewish books were in a position to explain the phenomena of the earth and the universe. What will be the feelings of the eminent personages who gave the writer their encouragement "before many pages were written," when they see the medley of scholarship, science, fancy, anecdote, and verse which has been produced, will be easily imagined. The first name in the list of subscribers is that of the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury, K.G. If we remember rightly, the noble earl severed himself from the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge on account of the publication of an excellent little book on geology by the Rev. Professor Bonney. This circumstance almost leads us to believe that he at least will look with favour upon the following passage describing the vision vouchsafed to Moses of the creation of light:—

Casting his eyes upwards he saw the cloud which surrounded him moving, and soon a pitch-black sky was above him; whilst wondering what this might mean, he heard the same voice of God saying, "Let there be light," and immediately the whole of the expanse was filled with luminous æthereal masses of every variety of form. He gazes with admiration, and as he does so these nebulae condense, and suns and stars blaze forth throughout the whole canopy of heaven. The cloud again closes over him, and he is left for a short time to reflect upon the glorious spectacle which had filled his soul with ecstasy.

How long this vision lasted we cannot tell, but this we know, that ages must have been compressed into seconds.

Some of his emendations of King James's translators' version, however, do not help him, though he seems to think they do. He has attempted to explain away the difficulty of the appearance, according to Moses, of grass, herbs, and fruit trees before the creation of the sun and moon; but the buffoonery of the attempt is extremely apparent, and the juggling between sunlight and sunshine is contemptible.

Some sentences reveal an ignorance of the facts of biology, which is in glaring contrast with the author's pretentious style. Thus he says that as plants derive their nutriment from inorganic matter, which animals cannot do, this marked characteristic invariably comes to the help of the naturalist. He seems to be quite ignorant of the existence of a large class of plants which receive their nutriment from organic matter, as well as of the existence of life concerning which it is quite impossible to decide whether it should be classified as animal or vegetable. It is, too, a striking piece of intelligence to read that "there are other foraminifera and nummulites which may be obtained by shaking the sand from a piece of new sponge, or by carefully pulverising a piece of chalk;" and why he deals so extensively with the nummulite under his treatment of the Cretaceous Period might be a puzzle to some folks. Of the fresh-water hydra he remarks that the creature has no special organs except a mouth and a tubular stomach. We hardly see how he can fairly call a simple body cavity and the simple opening at one end of it special organs; but when he goes on to speak of the "head" and the "feet" of the animal we see how little he knows or how inaccurately he speaks of this organism. Mr. Kinns impresses upon his readers that he most thoroughly believes in "so much of the development theory as implies a progression of species from a lower to a higher organic condition; for this is evidently part of the divine plan." He admits also that natural selection or the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence is "certainly also a law." Yet he professes his unwavering belief in the creation hypothesis, and approvingly quotes Hugh Miller's remark about Asterolepis—"In the morning it was not, and in the evening it was." His position towards Evolution is thus somewhat unique. Moreover, he cannot think that "the non-use of any particular organ or limb would eventually cause its entire absence." How he reconciles this on page 256 with the following on page 288 is hard to conceive:—

Some interesting specimens have been found of the bones of the legs of the horse in former periods of the world's history, which seem to add weight to the arguments of our Darwinian friends. My reply is, that whatever modifications the limbs of the horse may have undergone during some millions of years, its ancestor, however remote, seems to me still to have been a horse. Some think that the singular structure of these specimens are easily accounted for as being monstrosities, and that the foot of the horse as at present constituted shows evident design and adaptability for its present use. Dr. Bree grows quite eloquent upon this subject, and thinks the foot of the horse one of the most beautiful structures in nature; and, after describing all its parts anatomically, concludes with these words:—"What principle do we find operating here? Use? Variation? Survival of the fittest? Natural selection? No: the 'principle' we observe is that of the 'least action' of mechanical work done by reasoning forethought—of adaptation, of design." I confess it is this wonderful adaptation of the structures of animals to the very different parts they have to play in the world, and the evident design in the arrangement of such structures, which render it beyond measure difficult for me to conceive of any other plan having been adopted than separate or special creations of each species.

The point referred to in this passage is the possession by the older (in geological time) horses of three or four toes to each foot, while the living horse has only one. Now, as Professor Marsh has demonstrated, a regular gradation has been found in tertiary strata of horses from one possessed of four complete toes in front and three in the hind foot down to the existing horse, in which a single toe is found in each foot, as already pointed out. And on lines precisely parallel with this other parts of the structure of the same animal have become modified, so that the author was perforce bound to make his acknowledgment as to the pedigree of the living horse. But this is a case of the atrophy of the ancient toes from non-use. Many other facts quite as significant might be adduced to show the wonderful intrepidity of the author in venturing to make public the conviction he expresses. Then the author falls foul of the teachings of the recent discoveries in Embryology in a way which shows clearly how incapacitated his mind is to perceive the meaning of scientific facts. An incidental remark on page 333 shows further how utterly unfitted the author is for an earnest and devoted study of nature. Referring to Dr. Darwin's newest book, viz., that on "The Formation of Vegetable Mould through the Action of Worms," he intimates that until the publication of that treatise "many of us have looked with disgust upon these slimy things." Who are the people who thus feel towards Nature's children? Surely not those who regard all as God's creatures! Nor yet those who have learned the poet-moralist's truer wisdom,

Never to blend our pleasure or our pride

With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels.

In chapter X. Mr. Kinns digresses into an expression of his opinions on educational methods. He clings to the old scholasticism from which we always dissent. He is welcome, of course, to his own opinions, but intelligent readers of his book will not attach much weight to them.

The book is fertile enough of matter, but the great mass of it is quite unnecessary to the argument of the work—if we may dignify it by the name of argument. The author has apparently got hold of a number of illustrations, many of which are from Cassell's "Science for All," and some of which have appeared in Young Days magazine, and has written up to them. There is much that is interesting and useful, but it is so mixed with senseless, silly stuff that the good is rendered ineffective. This sort of book-making will not tend to the intellectual advancement of readers.

[Since the above was written we have received an intimation from the author that her Majesty the Queen had been graciously pleased to accept a copy of his work. Mr. Kinns's cup of happiness will now be full.]

Economy. By James Platt. London: Simpkin, Marshall and Co. 1882.

Mr. Platt is in many respects a very able man, and the public has reason to be thankful to him for his many valuable little books on business matters, and especially for his clear exposition and vigorous defence of the principles of Free Trade. Such a champion is not unnecessary even in the present advanced times; for, notwithstanding the obvious, the clearly demonstrated advantages of Free Trade, there are men insidiously endeavouring to revive Protectionist fallacies, under the guise of what they call Fair Trade. Our author shows that only that can be truly "fair," which is truly "free." But though admiring Mr. Platt for his talents, acquirements, public spirit and energy, we are a little vexed with him for not being somewhat more careful as to the literary form of his thinking. He is diffuse even to wearisomeness. This handy little volume, though it consists of only two hundred pages, might have been compressed easily into about half the space. The author, when he keeps to his point, is admirable both in argument and illustration, but he allows himself to roam and ramble into all kinds of topics, into moral philosophy, natural history, natural theology and social affairs in general. Even when thus far a-field he shows himself to be a sensible, thoughtful earnest man; but since other minds more specially trained than his own have already dealt with these topics, it would have been as well, we think, to have kept them out of these little volumes. The style wants succinctness and condensation. The words flow with an easy copiousness, and have generally a pleasant harmonious sound; but they do not stand the test of analysis. The sentences are not vigorously jointed, and the paragraphs are too long. What is called the "Introduction" reappears in substance, and often in form, in subsequent portions of the work; and almost every chapter contains some needless repetitions of what had been said in chapters preceding. Mr. Platt having by nature a healthy, vigorous mind, might become a good writer as well as a sound thinker, if he would only allow himself a little more time to revise, condense, and arrange his matter prior to publishing it.

Being ourselves ardent free traders by conviction, we heartily concur with the general purpose of this volume; but we dissent a little from our author in his severe condemnation of the Irish Land Act. We readily allow that it is better, far better, as a general rule, that contracts between landlord and tenant, like ordinary contracts between man and man, should be left to the honour, sensible perception, reasonable feeling, and sense of mutual interest of the parties concerned, without legislative intervention, except for the purpose of giving necessary precision and certainty to a voluntary legal act. But in Ireland a most unhappy necessity seems to have required Government interference. In that country the quarrel between landlord and tenant has been going on since the days of the Stuarts. The wicked manner in which immense portions of the land of Ireland were originally wrested from the native proprietors and handed over to English and Scotch settlers by violent and illegal confiscation has never been thoroughly forgotten or forgiven by subsequent generations. The wretched sufferers do not discriminate between the present and the past, between the cruel and unjust spoiler of a former time and the blameless possessor of to-day—between those who have now gained their property by fair and legal means, and those who originally seized it by violence. The passions engendered by the first wrongs have never been extinguished, but have gone on smouldering, and occasionally breaking out into an almost demoniacal fury. In this miserable state of things some legislative attempt to amend, soothe and reconcile seemed necessary. Hence the Land Act.

A contract once legally entered into should be honourably adhered to, says the Political Economist. True! But suppose one of the contracting parties is a thoughtless, ignorant, impulsive, eager simpleton, who in his blind, passionate desire to settle on the land, contracts to pay a rent for it which it is quite certain in many cases he cannot pay, except by the semi-starvation of himself and family, is there to be no relaxation of the rigid iron laws of political economy in such a case? Is the tenant to be cast out into homeless wretchedness merely because he was wanting in foresight and calculation and acted like a fool? And are the astute and clever landlords and landlords' agents justified in allowing these poor ignorant peasants to enter upon contracts which they cannot possibly fulfil, except by the endurance of dreadful privation and misery? And when these wretched beings hear, as they sometimes do hear, that many of the landlords of Ireland, even at the present day, live fashionably and "fare sumptuously every day" in London or Paris on rents derivable from worthless Irish farms, the actual cultivators of which are more than half starved, is it much to be wondered at that fierce animal passions should rise in the bosoms of these poor peasants and overpower for a while all sense of duty and obedience to the law, all reason, all moderation, all the gentler feelings of humanity? And shall the Political Economist stand aloof in such a case and with stony countenance exclaim, "It is entirely your own fault, Patrick! This misery is the natural penalty of want of prudence and foresight, the just consequence of violated economical law. Cease this foolish eagerness for land which you cannot cultivate so as to maintain you in comfort and decency. Take to some other form of industry either at home or abroad! Learn thrift and steadiness!" Fine words! But is it likely that a poor ignorant starving wretch, goaded into madness by misery, will accept "good advice" as a substitute for food, and sit down quietly under a hedge to study Political Economy?

The Land Act is confessedly a hazardous experiment in applying legislation to an evil that ought to be remedied by the intelligence, honour, and righteous feelings of private men. Probably none regret the necessity of the Act more than the Ministers who passed it. But was there any alternative? The Salisburys, the Northcotes, and others at present in opposition, of course denounce it and use it, in the usual evil spirit of party warfare, as a weapon of offence against the Ministry. Nevertheless, it is pretty certain that had they been in office at the time they would themselves have framed an almost identical measure, not from choice, but from sheer necessity. Doubtful as the Act may be in its theory, it may possibly, in its actual working, be now and then of some little incidental benefit to the landlords themselves, since in cases where the judgment of the Land Courts is in their favour, it may enable them to get a payment which they otherwise would not get, and lend a little solidity to a socially precarious position.

Mr. Platt being a man of ability, experience, and of great aptitude in economical matters would make a very useful member of Parliament. We know not whether he has ever been a Member or whether he would like to become one; but if all right men were in right places, the author of this little book would probably occupy a seat in the House of Commons. E. A.

The first instalment of Mr. Froude's Life of Carlyle will be published on the 31st inst. The work, which is complete in itself, consists of two 8vo volumes, with two portraits and four views, all being etchings. It is a history of the first forty years of Carlyle's life, and we understand that it may almost be considered of the nature of an autobiography, as it contains so much of Carlyle's own writing. Some very interesting letters from Goethe and Edward Irving will appear, but no letters, it is thought, will strike the reader with more force than those from the pen of Mrs. Thomas Carlyle.

Mr. Shaw will contribute to the next number of the Antiquary a paper entitled "A Chat about Cheap Books."

Our Contemporaries.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Times, commenting on the fact that the Record, which has appeared three times a week, from the close of March will only appear weekly, remarks:—"That is to say, it is to become less a journal of events, and more exclusively a review of and commentary upon them. It marks a sense that men are become too eclectic to slake their thirst for intellectual communion from the fountain-head of a single religious paper. The religious press as a monopolist of the supply of current information to the sections sympathising with its denominational views is a bygone institution. Each school is strong enough in itself to support an exponent of its opinions. It is for the advantage of its rivals and of public judgment at large that those opinions should have an authoritative and avowed interpreter which may be consulted on their true bearing and limitations." One danger might be supposed to be incident to a change from the form of a regular channel of current news to the form of a weekly commentary on occurrences already learnt from other sources. It will be feared by many to whom the rancour of the religious Press has been a grief and a scandal that a journal which professes principally to discuss the significance of events may have space and leisure for more bitterness than one which has hitherto been weighted and ballasted in some measure by the duty of a faithful reporter. The Record, it may be hoped, has outlived the days when reviling and insult seemed worthy substitutes for argument. It was abundantly and superabundantly bitter when it could reckon on the acceptance by its readers of the implicit authenticity of the text on which it undertook to preach. But it was not consciously unfair. With readers no longer dependent upon its statements it may be trusted to be still more careful not gratuitously to invite doubt of its conclusions by wilful-perversion of facts. Many of its warmest friends may be credited with the most emphatic repugnance to a reproduction of the old tempests of rage against adversaries who questioned its infallibility. The ranks of its opponents themselves offer at least one successful example that a religious journal can be refined and restrained in its temper without abandoning its rigour of party orthodoxy. The Church at large is concerned as well as partisans that the representatives of the several phases of Church doctrine shall employ a tone and spirit not prohibitive of their consultation by persons who have not enrolled themselves in any separate denomination. Beliefs which stir vast and powerful bodies of Englishmen with all the supreme forces of religious conviction are not matters which the rest of the nation can safely affect to disregard or despise. A journal entitled to communicate the wants and wishes of the great Evangelical division of Churchmen, and evincing no desire to inflame the passions of adherents by outraging the susceptibilities of antagonists, would not have to rely solely upon countenance from within. It might count upon being approved by a much larger number of uncovenanted readers than the few who now glance at a religious newspaper to amuse themselves with observing in what vindictiveness so-called Christians can indulge.

THE LANCASTER MARTYR.

The Nonconformist, in an article on Mr. Green's imprisonment, writes:—

We Nonconformists have constantly had to stand, and some of our fathers had to die, for points of conscience that seemed to all around as idle and empty as a shadow; and the world is at this day far better, richer and wiser for our maintenance of those judgments of conscience as supreme. And we hold that, when there is so widespread and deep a conviction on the subject of a new truth or a new method, it is best in every way that it should be left alone to try what it can do to realise its idea. The system which brings the jail into play, and seeks to stop its course by incarceration, condemns itself as utterly out of tune with the spirit of wisdom and sound understanding, and disastrous to the public good. But then our fathers, that they might use their freedom, forsook the Establishment. Let the Ritualists do that, and their position in claiming the right to follow their conscience wherever it may lead them would be unassailable; now they only expose themselves to growing contempt by their insolent defiance of the authority, which, protest as they may, their Church distinctly recognises, while they wear its livery and receive its pay. Two-thirds of their contention about vestments has turned upon the true construction and bearing of advertisements about vestments put forth by the secular power. And if they dread to go forth from the Church as by law established, lest they should commit the sin of schism by separating from the Anglican branch of the true Catholic Church, they would place themselves in a much higher and better position, did they fight and strive strenuously to emancipate themselves and their Church from these fetters; at present they only put themselves and their Church to shame. The consummation of Ritualistic martyrdom would be reached were Mr. Hall sent to join Mr. Green in prison for refusing to obey the law of the land in a matter so purely legal as a registration. That would be a reductio ad absurdum of Ritualistic conscientiousness; and whatever the issue, the resistance already offered to the decree of a court of justice ought to open people's eyes to what is behind these clerical pretensions, and lead the State to shake itself free from all complicity with this effeminate clerical conscience for ever.

THE MILN CASE.

The American press is devoting much attention to this case:—

The Christian Leader says:—The Unitarians will need to protect themselves from the disintegrating influence of orthodox radicalism. Time was when the flaming sword was set at the gate of the orthodox garden to keep Unitarian destructives from ravaging the sacred possessions of their neighbours. That time has passed. Now, the agnostic and atheistic despoilers issue from the bosom of the "Evangelical" churches. Such graduates as Chainey and Miln incite the query whether the orthodox schools have many such on their rolls. They distance all competitors in the radical quality of the article they turn out. The Boston Journal writes:—Mr. Miln's complaint because his congregation "refused to give him reasons for their action" in requiring his resignation is scarcely frank or manly. It does not appear what reasons could be necessary to give after Mr. Miln had avowed his rejection of the truths which the Church was organised to proclaim. Religious "come-outers" would command a good deal more respect if they were courageous and candid enough to relieve the churches of their presence when their views change, without seeking to distract the church or waiting to be assisted out of the place in which they no longer belong by the formal action of their congregations.

The New York Independent says:—Mr. Miln has not proved a very willing martyr. It was anything but an edifying spectacle to see him pleading piteously not to be dismissed from his six-thousand-dollar engagement with the Unity Church of Chicago. We are heartily glad that Unitarianism, as represented by that church, has not proved itself broad enough to keep as a teacher of religion one who does not believe in God or the immortality of the soul. Why he should expect to remain and tearfully beg the privilege of defending himself before his society is not clear. His engagement was with the stipulation that it might be terminated on three months' notice; and no wrong would be done him by giving him that notice, with no reasons whatever. The man who takes a position outside of that of the Church of which he is an accredited minister has absolutely no claims on that Church. We sometimes blame the Church (we do not here) for having rules of exclusion which are not Christian; but we never waste any sympathy on the man who is driven out for this cause. His martyrdom is a very tolerable one, and quite regular ecclesiastically. As to the Atheism of a man like Mr. Miln, we feel no sympathy for it. It does not grow up in a few months out of any profound study. It is only shallow and flippant, and deserves no consideration beyond the mere notice which we make of the profession of a neophyte. When he went to Chicago, he was understood to be more orthodox than the average Unitarian minister. He has during these few months been reading the literature of scientific materialism for the first time, and has got unsettled. As a thinker, he deserves only the slightest regard.

ANOTHER TRIBUTE TO DR. BELLAWS.

The Index (Rationalist), of Boston, U.S., writes:—

Dr. Bellows was a zealous denominational Unitarian, and devoted himself with all the large resources of his mind, and heart, and soul, and strength to the building up of the Unitarian Church. He believed earnestly in the Unitarian faith, and believed it was a good faith for the world as well as for the few people who accepted it. Hence, he was first and foremost in all efforts for organising and extending the Unitarian form of belief. If the principles and polity of Unitarianism could have allowed a bishop, he would have been the natural selection for the place. Though not a profound scholar nor a philosophical thinker, he had great qualities of leadership. He was an organiser and worker, many-sided, many-handed. Not thinking deeply, he yet thought largely; was capable of conceiving large schemes, and had the energy and wisdom and personal power to carry them through to successful accomplishment. As an orator he held high rank, more especially in extemporaneous speech. The side which had his advocacy in a public meeting was pretty sure to win. It is safe to say that, while the Unitarian denomination has no one man at its head, there is yet no other man in it who will precisely fill the place which he has filled these many years. But Dr. Bellows, though a zealous Unitarian, was very much more than that. In New York he was among the few most eminent men and useful citizens. By his long career there he had become identified with the best interests of the city. He threw the weight of his great influence into every cause that had at heart the welfare of the community. And during the Civil War, as President of the Sanitary Commission, he did a national work and won a national reputation. Through his addresses, delivered in all the large cities of the North from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the enthusiasm of the people for this organisation of mercy was kindled, branch societies were everywhere formed, and money poured by millions into the treasury. Doctrinally, Dr. Bellows cared little for consistency. Having no very definite system of theology or philosophy other than the indefinite and changeable belief denominated Unitarianism, he was much swayed in his doctrinal attitude by his transient moods and sympathies. Once, at least, he astonished conservative Unitarians by his ultra reactionary tendencies toward church creeds and forms. But more than once he has astonished radical Unitarians by the liberality of his utterances. In general, however, it may be said that his denominational influence has been conservative. In the famous conflicts over the Preamble to the Constitution of the National Unitarian Conference, out of which came the Free Religious Association, he fought the left-wing Unitarians with all his power. They doubtless would have been conquered in any event, yet he made the victory over them more complete. But, with all his conservatism, he was progressive. And now, for several years, he has manifested, both in public and in private utterances, a most broad and hospitable sympathy toward the new rationalistic thought of the younger men of the denomination. He had the insight and foresight to see the inevitable trend of denominational belief, and he was prepared to accept it with composure. It should be added that personally he was among the kindest and most generous of men. Whether friend or foe, he was the same magnanimous, whole-souled man. If friend, you could have none better. If foe, he was an open and honest one; and, while he opposed your cause with all his might, his heart and hand were ever ready to do you a personal benefit. Such natures have a weight and power of character beyond any sum of their separate resources, however large.

AN HISTORICAL CHAPEL.

NEWINGTON-GREEN.

One of the parts of the metropolis hitherto most impervious to the attacks of the builder is Stoke Newington-green. Alas! it is doomed. Railways have come within a measurable distance; streets of new houses are run up all around it. Where Sam Rogers lived part of the garden has been utilised, and most of the old houses have suffered more or less of change. It was standing in one of them the other day, with its carved oak and ancient fire-places, I pointed across to the little chapel where Dr. Price preached; where Belsham was an afternoon lecturer; where Mrs. Barbauld had a pew, the position of which is yet marked by an appropriate inscription; where Crabb Robinson and other men of light and leading frequently worshipped. And said my friend, "I have never been inside the place in my life;" and he said it in a tone which seemed to indicate that it was not exactly the place for a regular Orthodox Christian to go to. The fact is, Unitarianism has decreased in Stoke Newington. When Belsham published the "Memoirs of Theophilus Lindsay" he wrote:—"The title of Unitarian, then"—that was, at the time of the establishment of the London Unitarian Society—"a term of general reproach, is now, in consequence of the extensive diffusion of Unitarian principles" become a mark of honour, and is courted rather than shunned." Well, that is not the case now, or at Stoke Newington-green things would not have come to such a pass that actually at this time they have a preacher who is not Unitarian temporarily supplying the pulpit. But it is not alone Unitarianism that has gone down in Stoke Newington. Where are the friends who till almost the present day were quite a power in that locality? Where are the Allens with whom all the leading philanthropists of the day associated, and at whose house in Stoke Newington Wilberforce came to dine? Where the cottages in Lordship-lane where, in "The Memorials of a Quaker Lady," we read William Allen was conducting his agricultural experiments, and Wilberforce was weighed and found wanting? At Stoke Newington it was discovered that this great man, who abolished the slave trade, and to whom England has erected statues, and whom we yet revere and love, weighed, including the iron stays which he invariably wore, but seventy-six pounds! Was there ever a little man more truly great? Quite a new order of things has arisen in Stoke Newington in these latter days. A stone's throw—it is hardly little more—from Stoke Newington-green, stands the Mildmay Conference Hall; and of a Sunday morning you cannot walk far without having a tract or two put into your hands. I was sorry to decline the second lady, but the first had handed me one headed, "Where will you be a hundred years hence?" a most unfair question just as you are going to enter a place of worship. Why, it was only the other day the Bishop of Manchester and the Spectator backed up Mr. Proctor when he hinted that in about fifteen years' time we should, dead or alive, all be cremated. As to where you or I shall be a hundred years' hence, who can tell? Rather than puzzle our heads with such questions, let us

"Act, act, in the living present, Heart within and God o'erhead."

Hence, declining all proffered tracts, I walked straight into the chapel, and I was in good time, the service not commencing till a quarter-past eleven. An inscription outside tells you that the chapel was built in 1768, and enlarged in 1860. Even enlarged as it is, the chapel is a small one. It seems to me that our grandfathers—most respectable people as they were—never cared much about getting people to come to chapel. There was the little flock to whom the truth was made known, and by whom it was to be guarded and handed down to ages yet unborn; and outside that little Goshen there was Egyptian darkness. The smaller the number of the saints—who "were a garden walled around"—the greater their privileges. I have been told that at a certain chapel near Radcliffe-highway, for instance, there were people planted outside to prevent the sailors from coming in. Nowadays we plant people outside to get any passer by to enter, and that is surely an improvement on the ancient custom. In the little chapel on Stoke Newington-green the elect have it all their own way. I dare say at one time they had carriage-people there, men as refined and a great deal more genial than old Sam Rogers, women almost as charming and lovable, it was impossible they could be more so, as Mrs. Barbauld. Alas! they have gone, and their pews are empty. There is an organ in the gallery, there is a sprinkling of hearers in the pews, around on the walls are tablets to the departed. At the back of the chapel is a schoolroom, but where are the children? Yes, the place has seen better days. It is older even than the date recorded on the outside. In a manuscript preserved in Dr. Williams's Library I find there existed a church here many years before the original place of worship was constructed. The congregation was made up of such chiefly as had been hearers of Dr. Manton, and could not fall in with his views of national establishment. They were most probably formed into a society by Mr. James Ashurst, who had been expelled from his fellowship in Magdalen College, Oxford, and who afterwards resided many years in Stoke Newington. "There have been," says the manuscript, "an uncommon number of ministers at the place, and it is remarkable that for a century past hardly one has died in the connexion." Several of them seem to have conformed. More than one were also the librarians of Dr. Williams's Library. Dr. Price came here in 1758, and when he moved to Hackney continued to be afternoon lecturer there till 1785. We

[* If Christopher had gone into the schoolroom on Sunday afternoon he would have seen a large and well-managed school of more than a hundred children.—Ed. of Inq.]

quite forget what a great man Dr. Price was in his day—not merely by his work on “Annuities,” but in other ways. Dipping into Adolphus’s “History of England,” I find the following anecdote, à propos of Dr. Price and his pamphlet, entitled “Observations on the Justice and Policy of War with America,” which treatise obtained for its author the thanks of the citizens of London as well as the freedom of the City, which was presented to him in a gold box. Shortly after the publication of this treatise the Duke of Cumberland, happening to meet Dr. Price in the lobby of the House of Lords, complimented him upon its merits. “I sat up so late last night reading it,” said the Duke, “that I was almost blinded.” “I am sorry,” said Dunning, who was standing by, “that your Royal Highness should have been so affected by a work which has opened the eyes of almost every one else.” In 1799 Mr. Barbauld became the minister of Stoke Newington-green Chapel; there is no record in the MSS. to which I have referred when he left. Now there is in the pulpit a gentleman, the Rev. William Wooding, educated at Spring Hill College, Birmingham, and formerly an Independent minister at Shrewsbury, but now one of the teachers of the City of London School—a tall, dark, scholarly man, who quietly read the prayers and gave out the hymns, one of them being Dr. Bowring’s well known—and preached a sermon accordingly from the text, “I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto Me.” The preacher spoke of how Christ, in his closing hours, was cheered by the thought that if his doctrine were rejected by the Jews, it was accepted by the greater world outside. Then he went on to describe Christ’s Gospel as one of attraction, and because of his personality, remarking that truth, as truth, has very little influence over men. Plato and Aristotle were in their way representative of the efforts of the human mind in search of the ideal. Zeno taught us to conquer the world by despising it. Epicurus told that the true aim of life was pleasure. They appealed, however, to the few. Christ came for the deliverance of the poor, to build them up into a brotherhood, to teach the true life, the sacrifice of self for the good of others. None of the old systems answered the question, What shall I do to inherit eternal life? As to the prediction of the text, the preacher intimated that he knew no present existing form fitted for the universal religion. Present systems are coloured by men’s views as to necessitarianism or free-will. Then, again, how we differ as to our conceptions of God. Christianity, to become universal, must become much more simple. As knowledge extends, as a common feeling of right extends among the nations, we shall better realise the idealism embodied once for all in Jesus Christ. And then the time would rapidly arrive when there should be one Lord, one faith, one baptism. Altogether, the sermon was so interesting that I was sorry there were not more to hear it.—Christopher Crayon in the Christian World.

ROCHDALE: BLACKWATER-STREET CHURCH.—On Sunday evening last the lectures, with open conference after the service, were brought to a close for the season. This novel innovation of a conference after and on the subject of each lecture has produced a most successful experiment. The interest has been well sustained throughout; the Church always full, and at times more than crowded, and the greater number remaining to join in the conference. The inquiries there made have embraced the leading topics on theology and religion, and put by inquirers of every phase of thought, ranging from the extreme orthodox to Secularism. Several expressions of thanks have been tendered to the Rev. T. Carter for the interesting and profitable evenings there spent together, and Mr. Carter invited all who found themselves in accord with the general views set forth during the lecture course to join the church, and he trusts that some substantial result will follow the efforts made. Certainly, thereby, a vast amount of religious inquiry has been awakened, and a wider knowledge of our distinctive views has been spread throughout the town. The interest in these services has been greatly aided by the able rendering of special music by the very efficient church choir, which is in part voluntary; and some of the younger members of the regular congregation have been most energetic in arranging for the accommodation and comfort of the people. Mr. Carter has promised to resume in the autumn the same mode of procedure on the Sunday evenings.

FREE WILL AND NECESSITY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am convinced, from knowing the plain facts of the subject, that the time is come when the whole controversy respecting free will and necessity may be settled decisively, if the students of mental science will carefully observe the facts of the subject as they are, and as they may now be pointed out, instead of adhering to the old metaphysical ways of stating them, in which the facts are erroneously described.

Each doctrine consists of two parts, an affirmative and a negative part; and the negative part of each is the denial of the affirmative part of the other. And each is correct in its affirmative, and erroneous in its negative part.

The believers in free will assert that man has a power to choose how he will act; that is, that he forms his determinations, and in this they are right. But they deny that man’s determinations are dependent in the first place upon internal conditions (conditions of constitution and character), and external conditions, or surroundings. And in this they are in error. The believers in necessity or determinism assert that man’s will to act or determination is dependent upon internal and external conditions; and in this they are right. But they deny that man’s determinations are in any way dependent upon his personal agency, or upon any efforts of his, in the forming of them. “Man’s will is given him,” says Mr. Mill, “not by any efforts of his, but by circumstances which he cannot help.” And in this they are in error.

What has been wanted to remove these differences of opinion has been, first, that the believers in free will should be able to trace distinctly and to point out plainly the mental facts by which it is made evident that man is a personal agent in the forming of his determinations, and that therefore he has a power of self-government—the facts of the mental process by which we form determinations. If they could have done this they would have made it evident that the believers in necessity have been in error in denying this truth.

And secondly, it has been required that the believers in necessity should trace and point out the facts by which it is made evident that, although man has a power of self-government, there is always a cause, in internal and external conditions, for his exerting this power as he does exert it. And they would thus have made it evident that the believers in free-will have been in error in their denial of this truth.

But while they were not able to trace the facts of the mental process by which we form determinations this second requirement could not be fulfilled. For of course the believers in necessity could not point out the facts by which the conditions are made evident upon which the exercise of a power of which they had no knowledge depends.

There is nothing metaphysical or logical in either investigation. Each of them is merely the observation of facts of consciousness, which are very plain when they are correctly pointed out. And when both truths are ascertained as plain matters of fact, it seems strange that either of them should ever have been denied by psychologists. For everyone acts upon the belief that man has a power of self-government, or power to resist temptations; and everyone acts upon the idea that the formation of man’s determination is dependent upon internal and external conditions.

But when with simple and correct views of the facts of the subject we read the writings of psychologists, the cause of their inability to trace the facts of the mental process by which we form determinations is easily seen. For it was impossible that they should ascertain this analysis while they described as mental acts phenomena in which there is no personal agency, and while, therefore, they did not discriminate between what we do and what we experience in our mental operations. While, for instance, they confounded willing to do an act, which is having a will to do it, with determining to do an act, which is forming a will to do it.

Your correspondent “C.B.U.” has not described my view respecting the forming of our determinations in his remark that “Dr. Henry Travis fancies that he has removed all the difficulty by pointing out that the action of our own personality counts for something in our moral choices, and that, therefore, man is not wholly the creature of circumstances.” What is here meant “by the action of our personality?” The meaning of this remark appears to be that man’s personality, or constitution and chaacter, counts for something in the causation of our moral choices. But believers in necessity have always included internal conditions as well as “circumstances,” or external conditions in the sum of the influences upon which our moral choices depend. What I have been enabled to point out by ascertaining the analysis of the mental process by which we form determinations (as described in No. 5 of Mind) is, that man does something, and what he does, in the forming of his moral choices—the truth which has been asserted by the believers in free will, and has been denied by the believers in necessity.

When the error of the idea that “man’s will is given him, not by any efforts of his, but by circumstances which he cannot help,” is thus made evident, we are in a position to trace the facts by which the error of the idea that man’s personal agency in the forming of his determinations is, or can be, independent of conditions. But the error of this idea is easily shown in a general way by asking those who have this idea to point out any case in which a man has formed a determination independently of internal and external conditions—by asking them, for instance, to point out a case in which a theft has been committed by a thoroughly honest man. And why do we use persuasion or give advice to anyone? Is it not that the ideas which we excite in him may operate as internal conditions or partial causes to influence him to act as we wish him to act? Was not the writing of “C.B.U.,” as he has written in the Inquirer of the 11th of March, dependent in the first place upon his acquired habits of thought and feeling (internal conditions), and upon the contents of the book he so ably noticed—external conditions? Could he have written as he wrote if the internal or the external conditions had been different?

I should not say, as “C.B.U.” supposes, that “we praise or blame a man for his conduct, not because he could have acted otherwise in a moment of temptation, but because he himself acted as he did, and as he was necessitated to do by his natural constitution and surroundings.” I praise or blame a man for his conduct because I know that he has a power of self-government. I praise him when he has exerted this power in accordance with the dictates of duty or prudence. And I blame him when he has not done so. But as I know that his agency in the exercise of this power was dependent upon internal and external conditions, my praise or blame is very beneficially qualified by this consideration. I should not praise or blame a man in any case for doing what he was necessitated to do; that is, if he had no power to determine how he would act. In such a case there would be no ground for praise or blame.

The settlement of the controversy is effected by the knowledge of both the truths included in it. Man is a moral being, because he has a power of self-government. But his merit or demerit is in all cases qualified very beneficially by the fact that his agency in the exercise of this power is dependent upon internal and external conditions, including the laws of his mental constitution. We praise and blame too much, and very injuriously, if we forget or deny the second truth. We cannot rationally praise or blame at all, in the true sense of those terms, if we deny the first. HENRY TRAVIS.

THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In 1871 Sir Rutherford Alcock repeatedly and emphatically declared that the Chinese Government were perfectly sincere in their desire to put an end to the consumption of opium. He now holds up the idea of such sincerity as little short of ridiculous. When brought face to face with his own former declarations, he says (Journal of the Society of Arts, January, p. 234) jocosely, “a good many things have happened since then.” He proceeds to enumerate these things, which are three in number:—“In the first place, the whole of the Western Provinces had not then been covered with native opium. The Emperor had not issued an edict sanctioning, on the request of Li-Hung-Chang, the issue of licenses to levy a regular duty upon it. They had not then, as had been since done, proposed to buy the monopoly of the whole of the Indian opium we produced, for resale and their own profit and advantage in China.” Before asking how far these facts justify Sir Rutherford’s present position, let us ask whether they justify a change of position since 1871. Sir Rutherford could not have known at that time things which “have happened since then,” and have changed his opinion.

What, then, did he know in 1871? In evidence before the Indian Finance Committee he quoted an official paper of his own as follows: "If Mr. Medhurst's information is to be relied on, nearly two-thirds of the rich and fertile province of Szech'uen is under opium cultivation and one third of Yunnan." He further quotes with approval the statement of a Chinese authority that it was spread from Kansu to Shensi, Shansi, Kiangsu, Honan, Shantung, "and other provinces, in a word, all over China," and quotes evidence that it was being successfully cultivated even where it would have been least expected. He further read to the commissioners a pathetic appeal from Prince Kung on the subject, containing the following words: "There are others again who suggest the removal of the prohibitions against the growth of the poppy. They argue that as there is no means of stopping the foreign trade, there can be no harm, as a temporary measure, in withdrawing the prohibitions on its growth. . . . Such a course would be practicable, and indeed the writers cannot say that, as a last resource, it will not come to this." Sir Rutherford further states the result of special inquiries thus:—"I found . . . that Li-Hung-Chang . . . had actively employed himself . . . in promoting the cultivation of the poppy. . . . He had memorialised the Throne for leave to issue licenses as a productive source of revenue, and a means further tending to exclude the consumption of foreign opium. . . . His high official position and political influence both combined to make his individual action in this matter very significant in connection with the covert menaces conveyed in the official note" [i.e., Prince Kung's note quoted above]. And again, "I think it will be seen the substance of the whole is this: that there is a very large and increasing cultivation of the poppy in China, that the Chinese Government are seriously contemplating if they cannot come to any terms or arrangements with the British Government for restricting the area of growth in India, and either gradually or suddenly putting an end to its importation, as they think they have the power to do, the cultivation without stint in China, and producing opium at a much cheaper rate. Having done that they think they will afterwards be able to stamp out the opium produce among themselves. I doubt their power to do so, but that is their theory." Having made some statements about the various charges on native opium, Sir Rutherford was asked, "Do you suppose that this includes all the presents made to the authorities for conniving at the growth of it?" His answer was, "They do not connive at it; because, according to Li-Hung-Chang's plan, they give licenses, and the license is the first charge that they pay."

These were the facts within Sir Rutherford's knowledge when he declared, "My own conviction is firm, that whatever degree of honesty may be attributed to the officials and to the central government, there is that at work in their minds that they would not hesitate one moment to-morrow, if they could, to enter into any arrangement with the British Government, and say, 'Let our revenue go; we care nothing about it. What we want is to stop the consumption of opium, which we conceive is impoverishing the country, and demoralising and brutalising our people.'"

If Sir Rutherford has since changed his opinion it cannot be because "since then" Li-Hung-Chang has issued licenses as he had done before (as to the alleged Imperial sanction of this plan Sir Rutherford must pardon a little scepticism by the way. Such sanction if unofficial is not to the purpose, and if official would hardly be a secret known to no one but Sir Rutherford Alcock); or because certain features in the native growth of the poppy which Prince Kung and Sir Rutherford jointly foresaw, foretold and explained in 1871 are matters of history in 1882. Sir Rutherford has stated reasons for his change of front, which on his own showing cannot be the true ones. The only inference is that his true reasons are not such as he wishes to state. The most respectable motive we can assign to him is an official dislike of a "popular agitation," even when on the right side. As her Majesty's representative he tried to do right, but he will not consent to see the British public taking official matters into its own hands.

One other reason Sir Rutherford alleges for discrediting the sincerity of the Chinese. They are now negotiating (having tried everything else and been refused everything else) to purchase the monopoly of the Opium trade with India, "for resale and their own profit," says Sir Rutherford. But he omits to state that the proposal is coupled (as we are informed it is) with the condition that the Indian Government should reduce the amount exported every year at such a rate as to secure the complete and final extinction of the trade in thirty years. The whole nature of the negotiations is at present only known indirectly and vaguely, except by those who are engaged in conducting them, but it seems very clear that this is but another attempt on the part of the Chinese to obtain at any price and under any conditions the ultimate extinction of the trade.

Such are Sir Rutherford's avowed reasons for his avowed change of opinion. We cannot wonder that in search of some august precedent by which he might vindicate his character for consistency he hit upon—the late Lord Beaconsfield!

I must reserve for another letter the question itself, "How does the native growth of the poppy affect our duty?" PHILIP W. WICKSTEED.

P.S.—Since I wrote my last letter I have come upon the following words in Sir R. Alcock's evidence in 1871:—"The fact is, they (the Chinese Government) have been compelled by the superior force of foreign Governments to admit it (opium) against all the moral feeling and judgment of the nation, and against their own, as an article of commerce." This is a still more flat contradiction than I had given before of Sir Rutherford Alcock's recent statement that the Chinese Government were pure "consenting parties" from first to last.

THE LAND ACT OF 1881.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—On the introduction of the Irish Land Bill last year into the House of Commons, in a letter which you kindly published I ventured to predict that however liberal and well-designed it would never meet the exigencies of the case. My first objection was that as it contained no provision to restrain the landlord from evicting for unpayable arrears, like the rejected Compensation for Disturbance Bill of the previous session, it should have had prefixed to it a preamble making Griffith's valuation the legal standard for rent as well as taxation, until its complicated machinery for determining a fair rent could be brought to bear upon every property in Ireland; for where there were some six hundred thousand cases of tenancies to be dealt with, our sagacious rulers, had they duly considered it, might have foreseen that it must take some considerable time—not months, but years—for the benefits of the Act to reach them all.

Secondly, I objected to the provisions of the Bill as much too complicated—that, expressed as they were in legal phraseology, they were only intelligible to those versed in the study of law, that even where intelligible enough, it revoked by one section what by another it conferred, or at least so surrounded its benefits with restrictions and conditions as in most cases to make them practically useless—that in short it was a Bill to enrich lawyers, and to carve out for those seeking them fine places under Government, but to the poor, broken-down tenants, of but little moment.

Other objections were—one to the exclusion of leaseholders from the Bill as it first appeared in the House—an exclusion afterwards and with much trouble rectified, but guarded with such provisions and exceptions as to render this clause of the Act, as now proved, all but worthless. The other objections were, I think, to so much care and thought having been spent on "the reclamation of waste lands" and "emigration," where the lands in Ireland that are not "waste" would profitably employ, and much more profitably than the "waste," all the labour and available capital in Ireland for generations.

Now let me ask, Mr. Editor, how has the result so far confirmed my anticipations? as the Act is now for about six months in operation. It is notorious that the much laboured clauses about "emigration" and "reclamation of waste lands" are a dead letter. Nobody ever hears of them. Owing to the limitations, the clause designed to benefit leaseholders is, as I have said, nearly the same, thus excluding from its benefits some one hundred thousand tenants. And how is it with tenants from year to year, those whom the Act was really meant to serve? Those who were hopelessly in arrear in Mayo, Connemara, Galway, Kerry, and even in Tipperary, &c., thousands of them, since the Act was passed, by aid of the Queen's forces ejected from their holdings, living in mud huts or wooden shanties supplied by the efforts of the Ladies' Land League to shelter their families, depending on the bounty or casual employment given by their neighbours to supply their necessities, and watching in the meantime lest any foreign foot might be so foolish as to take possession of their former habitations, an act which would soon attract the attention of Captain "Moonlight" and his men.

So much has the Land Act already done for the most needy class of the yearly tenants of Ireland.

The class above them, possessed of more means, have, especially in the northern counties, rushed by thousands, as is well known, into the courts. What is equally well known, though not so publicly noted, is that their chief attraction there was "the Healy Clause," designed to save their tenant-right, a clause not in the original Bill itself, but for which they are indebted to one to whom they do not even pay the grace of gratitude. As interpreted, however, by the Acts' administrators, little benefit, according to their own testimony, do these tenants receive from it; and as gratitude has been defined a "keen sense of favours to come," this these may plead as their apology. Even after all the expense and trouble of a first appeal to the Court, instructing a solicitor, paying valuers, getting from a land surveyor a map and measurement of their farm for its information, and the loss of time and weariness attending on its sittings until their case comes up for hearing, they may have again to re-enter a higher Court at still greater cost to defend from appeal the small benefit the lesser Court awarded. So that as in the now celebrated case of "Adams v. Dunsheath" the small reduction of £4 per annum on its rent may have to be purchased at the somewhat extravagant cost of £105.

In the other provinces, where tenant-right was not the custom, how stands it with the farmers? Until now, save in the case of the very sanguine, or much over-rented, few of these have entered the court. To the more timorous or doubtful a few liberal reductions to some of the farmers have given courage. More numerous notices have been served. And on the part of both landlord and tenant in every barony of Ireland gentlemen are engaged at two or three guineas a day, as the case may be, valuing land, or giving evidence in the court. Still the experience of other suitors has not been so encouraging. In the face of the admitted decline of agricultural produce, only yet in infancy, but which before fifteen years will be adolescent, some have gained nothing for their trouble but disappointment; whilst others say that "the game was not worth the candle."

In the meantime, how fares it with the lawyers? Of their bountiful harvest there is no uncertainty. Every hand is at work gathering in the golden grain. To one worthy solicitor in Belfast—a former eloquent tenant-right advocate—it is said the Land Bill has proved a veritable gold-mine. To my own knowledge three-and-fourpences and six-and-eight-pences flock into attornies' offices in amazing quantities. So that it is thought that the profession will do no less than express their gratitude to Mr. Gladstone, when this Land question is settled—a time likely to exceed his life—by perpetuating his memory by a statue of gold.

No doubt that gold will have come out of the pockets of those he meant to serve, but did not. To their alarm, however (see his last speech in the House), it is hoped he begins to see that he himself, by complexity of his Bill, and Coercion policy, has been the chief obstacle in the way of that message of "Peace to Ireland" which he threw Mr. Parnell into gaol for blocking, and which he sincerely intended to convey. Let us hope that he will at length find that Mr. Parnell's was the only true solution of the difficulty, and that he will yet give "Peace to Ireland" by taking Mr. Parnell into his confidence and giving us another Bill for purchasing out the landlords. "A VOICE FROM INDIA."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Will you allow me space for a line in the Inquirer respecting your quotation from an Indian paper on—"the attitude of the English towards the native population"? The writer may have come across a few solitary cases such as he refers to, but it should be most emphatically stated that the article, as it stands, is a gross misrepresentation both of the conduct of the English and of the feelings cherished towards them by the mass of the people. A Bengali naturally wields a facile pen, is a master of all the intricacies of composition and rhapsody, and always takes a keen interest in the preparation of a stirring article. Hence a little exaggeration and straining after effect are not uncommon.

After a residence of eighteen years in India I can confidently say not only that the article itself is utterly untrue, but also that the majority of the natives would decidedly refuse to endorse it. The bearing of some few Europeans towards the natives may be such as the writer describes; but such Europeans form but a very small minority; and it is against all the plain facts of the case to charge their faults upon the whole class of our countrymen out there. Nearly all the Englishmen I have personally known in India have been well-wishers of the natives, and always ready to cultivate friendly relations with them.

As to what is said in that article about the English losing caste among their own countrymen if they exhibit a friendly disposition towards the natives I can only say that I know nothing about it—I have never seen anything of the sort, and I can only regard it as the pure invention of an over luxuriant imagination. The people may sometimes complain of the action of Government; but that is no test of their feelings towards our countrymen as individuals. The mass of the people I feel confident would be quite as ready to admit the existence of a generous and considerate English friendliness as the writer of that article is vehement in denying it.

IN MEMORIAM: WILLIAM MORTIMER, J.P., OF EXETER.

On Sunday morning, at George's Chapel, Exeter, the Rev. T. W. Chignell made special reference to the late Mr. W. Mortimer, who was a trustee of that place of worship. There was a large congregation, including the Right Worshipful the Mayor (Mr. T. Andrew), and a number of members of the Corporation of the Poor, and others. The anthem rendered by the choir was "Rest in the Lord."

Mr. CHIGNELL took for his text Hebrews xi. 4, "He, being dead, yet speaketh." It was usual, he said, in ancient Athens, when soldiers fell in battle, for some one to pronounce a solemn discourse over them. There was none more touching amongst all written words than one such discourse from the lips of Pericles, which had been translated into very noble English. "These men," said he, "were not perfect. We are none of us perfect; but they did good, and by good they wiped out the evil that belongs to every man. These men have built for themselves the one true sepulchre, not that in which their bodies lie, but that of memory and love of noble hearts, in which their deeds are enshrined. The whole earth is a sepulchre of good men, and over many ages and in many lands true hearts enshrine in tender memory all those who do well." It was in the spirit of those high sayings that he ventured to offer to them a brief and simple discourse. For many days past one thought had been uppermost in the minds of most of those present. A shock had been occasioned in their midst by the very sudden death of one in the fullness of life and of action. Tears were shed in abundance over him, and he was buried in love and honour. It was not unfitting that a solemn service should be held in his memory, and that on a Sunday, as they gathered in a building set apart for high thoughts and worship, they should remember the best qualities they knew in him, and draw from them fresh impulses for new life. He was not there to laud his fellow creature. They were not in the world to flatter, but to do. They should, however, recognise the good that was in every man. Every man had two sides to his life. Every object in the Universe had two sides. One, the fragmentary, frail, and perishable; another the ideal perfection which partakes of eternity. He need not tell them on which side he was going to dwell that morning. He would seize, if he could, a few sparks of the divine. He would not say anything to harrow anybody's feelings. He reckoned that the shock which had come to the bereaved ones had gone by. Their tears ought already to be dry; for man was in the world to live and act, and not to drown himself in sorrow. The first thought was one touching God and the world. It was suggested by the bright quick thought that dwelt in him whom they wished to commemorate to-day, and there was no more glorious view of God than as the perpetual source of new human talent, which came out from His bosom into the world. They rejoiced this month in the breaking bud, in the opening flower. In the human talent in the boy and girl that prophesied a future, let them also rejoice. In this sense the world was never old, never exhausted, and there was never death. Death was only the struggle of new life with old forms of life. Nothing existed that did not exert an influence. Nothing was so small that it threw no shadow. Imagine the Infinite One, with its infinite attributes and powers. He must, from necessity of nature, put forth everything that could be conceived by an infinite understanding, and everything that came from Him bore the stamp of Him. God was always sending out new talent into the world. The old lights were extinguished one by one, but others ever took their place. Again, they were reminded to-day of the presence of energy and persistence of character. He need not remind them that those qualities dwelt in him whom they were commemorating; that from his cradle to his grave so good was Providence to him that his faculty was not bedimmed, and in the last days of life a short illness drew down the curtain over his life, so that he lived and worked to the last in full enjoyment of the gifts of God. "Let not the grass grow under thy feet, oh boy, oh youth!" were surely the words of him who, being absent, yet speaketh. Again, the death of their friend should remind them of the ideal that dwelt in man. In every flower seed that lived there was an embryo flower; in every man there was an ideal or pattern of manhood. All things were made up of an inward ideal that struggled for perfection, and an outward form that would not exactly yield to it. He should not flatter where he to say that an ideal dwelt in him whose spirit was especially present to him (the preacher) that morning. As a boy a delicate intelligence, a courtesy, and a steady persistence in good dwelt in him. There was an ideal that would, if it could, extend itself. To him (Mr. Chignell) he had said, "I had an ideal in my youth," and there was no better utterance that could come from a man's spirit than that. He could remind them of a form in which that ideal showed itself in their friend. A desire that knowledge should have no barriers in this world, and that every child should have the full irradiation of it. If he was asked to say what was the most essential quality in their friend, he thought he should venture to name manliness. His manners were manly. Courtesy was not with him something laid on him which came between him and those with whom he came in contact, but something in him, like the bloom of the flower, coming out from within. His affections as husband, father, and friend were fresh, strong and manly. His courage was manly. There were many forms of courage. Some could endure great bodily pain. Macaulay had said that there were men who would go to the roaring mouth of the cannon with a "hurrah," who would shriek under the surgeon's knife. But in their friend they had the highest form of courage—that which dared to confront the opposition of public opinion. He did not say that his friend's opinions were right or wrong, whether the direction his thoughts took or the causes he espoused were right. But he maintained that nobody could deny that he dared to be in a minority in regard to public opinion. That was a courage which was very precious. The deceased had also the religion of a man. There were many races and nations of mankind, and many modes of religion, with their various branches, but beneath these there was a substratum. Hear it from the most righteous lips that ever broke silence! Christ was the consummate flower of righteousness. They had no religious utterances equivalent to this: "Whatsoever thou wouldst that man should do unto thee, so do thou unto him—that is the law and the prophets." That was the text and the commentary of religion. "This world is God's world," Christ continually reminded them, and before every feature, every object of it, let them say "Hallowed be Thy name!" They who knew their friend best, and one who knew him best of all, had told him that he had a singular faith in a divine care in the railway carriage, the market place, and in the temple, and this was, to a great extent, a source of that cheerfulness that was prevalent in his nature. They knew that cheerfulness was a feature of his life. He would not believe that religion was something distinct from secular life, but that, as we were body and soul, so the secular and sacred were in everything, and the latter must be incorporated with the former if living was to be perfect. He had no fear of death, but believed in the doctrine of the grand chain of lay teachers, who taught that a man should die as a child who went to sleep in his father's arms. Perfect love casts out fear—religion that was fear was but superstition. He would gladly, had time permitted, recalled the many traits of their friend's character—his freshness, vitality, vivacity, consistent interest in all things that concerned the welfare and happiness of man. But he would add no more. To those to whom he was most dear he would say, "We are here to suffer pain, but we are also here to cherish the wound until it is healed, and the limb of the spirit will be stronger than it was before, when the wound is healed." We were here to live the present, not in the past—in the sunshine of daily life, not in the darkness of the grave; to live among the living, not amongst the dead; to cast our eyes forwards, not backwards. They must remember that the influence of those who had departed was as strong as when they were daily with them. Now they had become stars, and we looked up to them in their ideal perfection. Our life was made more sacred by the contemplation of them. What would the earth be without the stars? One star was now added to their spirits' armament, and he whom they had lost was now a star. The law of life was that they were in the world to utilise everything. The very dust of graves would give forth the best flowers. Let them be men and learn the lessons given them, let them not lose heart, but have the courage to go forward. Let them believe in that ideal which was behind all imperfection. Let them believe in Him who made them, so that they might be prepared to pass peacefully from this frail and short existence.

At the close of the service the organist played "The Dead March in Saul."

THE REV. J. MODEN'S FAREWELL SERMON.

On Sunday last the Rev. J. Moden preached his farewell sermon at Ashford, having concluded a ministry of six years, and leaving with the general respect and goodwill of the inhabitants, and the great regret of the congregation he has served so faithfully and efficiently. We subjoin a few paragraphs of the sermon, in which Mr. Moden stated some of the chief points of his faith and preaching:—

"First of all, it is of the essence of my faith that every man is perfectly free to judge of all religious matters for himself, reason being God's gift, and unity of spirit being consistent with the widest diversity of opinion. I believe, too, that behind all the phenomenal manifestations of the physical world, and in spite of the sorrow and darkness so often met with in the moral world, there is a Supreme Spirit of infinite power and intelligence whose eternal justice and love shine into the souls of men through the conscience and the religious emotions by a perpetual revelation which discloses him to us as 'Our Father.' This is a phase of my faith which I am never weary of reverting to.

"I have also taught, because I honestly believe it, that Jesus Christ felt more of that Father's love and mirrored his nature more clearly than any other member of the human race; still I have never denied, but gloried in affirming, that every great soul in every land and age has been a revealer of the God-head.

"This being so, it is necessarily a part of my creed or faith that all men are fitted to breathe what may be called a divine atmosphere, which manifests itself in spiritual aspiration or as moral power in the trials and temptations of life and is spoken of in the religious world as the Spirit of God.

"This implies the possibility of a spiritual brotherhood or Church consisting of a band of men and women anxious to strengthen each other's better life by common worship, and by a united effort to benefit their fellows.

"Nor can any one say that I have ever hesitated to assign supreme importance to religion as the divinely-appointed source of soul-food for humanity. At the same time, my Unitarian faith does not allow me to confine it to any age or system, to confound it with any book or any symbols, or indeed to bind it to any outward form or profession.

"And over and above all the clamours of angry disputants who profess to know more about a future world than they know about this, of those who would sneer down the doctrine of Immortality as a foolish dream, my faith rises as a sublime trust, as a holy confidence, that the problem of human destiny is solved by the spirit of love, and that in eternity there will be a realisation of that fulness of being which every man is fitted to enjoy.

"If this faith be worthy of acceptance, if this creed be true, then there is consolation and rest for every weary soul in that Eternity to which we are hastening. This life is often a ministry of pain; that will be a service of pleasure. Here our path is often bedewed with sorrow; there it will be bright with the sunshine of everlasting joy. Here there are farewells and painful partings from those we love; there in the great Beyond we shall meet to part no more."

In the sitting of the Dominion House of Commons on March 22 the Bill legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister passed the third reading.

Religious Intelligence.

THE BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

On Monday evening the annual meeting of the above society was held in the Mission Rooms, 21, Great Charlotte-street. EDWIN LAWRENCE, Esq., LL.B., presided. There were about fifty persons present, among whom we observed the Revs. Jeffery Worthington, T. W. Freckelton, W. Copeland Bowie, C. L. Corkran, F. Summers, Messrs. R. Bartram, H. Jeffery, I. M. Wade, C. F. Pearson, Percy Preston, I. S. Lister, E. Plimpton, H. Stannus, and S. S. Tayler.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening remarks, dwelt on the importance of the religious work which missions set themselves to do. To inspire the young with a pure and high conception of duty, to bring Christianity nearer to the hearts and homes of the people, might be an arduous task in such a neighbourhood as theirs, but those who took part in a such a work ought not to feel discouraged; for to serve God in the service of man could never be called poor or mean.

The TREASURER (Mr. C. F. Pearson) read his financial statement, which showed that there was a balance in hand of £64 12s.

The SECRETARY (Mr. Percy Preston) read the annual report, which stated decidedly satisfactory progress in all branches of the Mission work. There is hardly an evening in the week in which the rooms are not utilised for some work for the adult or junior members of the Society. The Sunday-school has doubled itself in the course of the year, the average attendance being, morning, 30; afternoon, 102; and at service, 40. Efficient teachers and visitors are wanted. The Sanitarium has been transferred from North London to rooms in Lordship-lane, Dulwich, and fourteen poor people were sent there. Under this head there is a balance due to the Treasurer (Miss Waterall) of £14 17s. 10d. The meetings of the Truthseekers' Union have been continued in the Mission-rooms on Sunday evenings, and various theological subjects have been discussed with great moderation by people of different persuasions. The Rev. W. C. Bowie continues to take deep interest in the Mission, and devotes a large amount of time to its welfare. He has started a class for English literature for young men and women over sixteen, which is a most valuable addition to the work of the Mission. The funds are in a satisfactory state, but new subscribers are needed in place of lately deceased members. The executors of the late Mrs. Warren have paid the sum of £100, bequeathed by that lady to the late Carter-lane Mission.

The MISSIONARY (Mr. Geo. Wooller) then read his report, which gave a detailed account of the various operations in connection with the Mission. The Sunday-school and the meetings held in the week for young children had been well attended, and the general order and discipline were improving. No great impression had been made upon the young men in the neighbourhood, nor was the mothers' meeting a very flourishing one, so far as numbers were concerned. Mr. Wooller stated that he had delivered several outdoor addresses on religious and theological topics, and had succeeded in drawing a good many listeners from time to time. He also reported that there had been very little sickness or distress among the families of those connected in any way with the mission. After referring to the various societies which had held meetings in the rooms during the year, he concluded by stating that the Mission was beginning to make itself felt as an influence for good in the neighbourhood.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports, expressed his approval of what had been accomplished, and hoped the Mission would continue to uphold the pure, simple, and earnest religion which Jesus had taught and lived.

The Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON, in seconding the resolution, said that he had always a profound respect for the men who laboured in missionary work. The religious future of the masses was a problem of great perplexity, and though he did not think they were making much headway, that was no reason why an effort should not be made. Those who were engaged in such work need a strong faith in the imperishable nature of truth and goodness, and they well deserved all the support and sympathy which were bestowed upon them.

The CHAIRMAN then invited discussion on the reports, whereupon some talk took place as to whether it would not be better to hold a simple religious service adapted to the wants of the very poor, instead of granting the use of the rooms to the members of the Truthseekers' Union.—Mr. BARTRAM, Mr. WADE,

Mr. LEE, Mrs. BARROWS, and others addressed the meeting, and then, on the suggestion of the CHAIRMAN, the matter was referred to the Committee for consideration.

Mr. HENRY JEFFERY moved the appointment of the Committee for the ensuing year, which was seconded by the Rev. F. SUMMERS, and carried.

The Rev. JEFFERY WORTHINGTON, in moving that the best thanks of the subscribers and friends be accorded to those who had carried on the operations of the mission, said that he thought there should be a close relationship between the Mission and the suburban churches, and that was one reason why he had consented to serve on the Committee during the ensuing year. He found that men in all churches were beginning to feel that they could unite on the ground of a common work, and take part in promoting many moral and social movements, though differing widely in their theological opinions.

Mr. C. L. CORKRAN seconded the resolution, and it was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. C. F. PEARSON moved that the best thanks of the meeting be accorded to Mr. Lawrence for presiding.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER, in seconding the motion, said that he knew the neighbourhood well, and he felt sure there was an excellent field for missionary effort. He had a great deal of faith in the personal influence which an earnest missionary might bring to bear upon the people in visiting them at their own homes.

The CHAIRMAN having replied, the proceedings terminated.

KENDAL: RE-OPENING OF CHAPEL.

The ancient chapel of this town has for some time been undergoing a thorough restoration. Some old meeting house must have stood upon its present site, as foundations of old walls, pavement, and a well were opened out in course of the restoration. From a copy of the register kept by the Rev. Samuel Audland, the first child registered was James, son of Thomas Moore, who was born February 7, 1687. The date on the spout, 1720, evidently gives the date when the chapel was rebuilt, and from the only minute book (without date) referring to that period, subscriptions appear to have been made for rebuilding:—Collected in Kendal, £166 17s. 6d.; sale of seats, £94 10s.; "the account of assistance received from our Brethren abroad," £132 14s. 4d.,—costing in all £394 1s. 10d. In 1720 the Rev. Caleb Rotherham, D.D., was the minister, and his son John was baptised January 26 in that year. In 1722 Hannah, his daughter, was baptised on March 8th, and died in the same year, respecting which there is the following note:—"N.B. My daughter Hannah was the first that I baptised publicly, and her dear remains were the first deposited near the Meeting House. She slept in Jesus, May 15th, and on the 16th a pretty little garment was laid up in the wardrobe of the grave, to be worn again at the Resurrection. Blessed be God for the hope of this." A Mr. Atkinson, of Stainton, preached on this occasion. Caleb, his son, who succeeded him as minister, was born November 21st, 1732, and died January 30, 1796, having been forty years minister. On the 15 of April, 1796, it was proposed that an invitation should be given to the Rev. John Harrison, of Lancaster, to succeed him. Mr. Harrison died on the 6th of May, 1833, aged 72, and was buried on the 10th of May by the Rev. George Lee. The Rev. Mr. Hawkes was appointed on the 15th of June, 1833, and died January 15, 1866, having been minister thereby thirty-three years. The Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., was elected minister October 8, 1867, and resigned October 6, 1868. On the 1st of November, 1868, the Rev. John Russell was appointed, and resigned April 5, 1874. The Rev. W. Birks was the next minister, and was succeeded by the present minister, the Rev. J. Macdonald, who has taken great interest in the restoration. For some time it has been the wish of the congregation to reseat the chapel, and, as the old organ was completely worn out, to erect a new one. At the suggestion of Mr. Councillor Robinson it was decided to thoroughly restore the chapel, and to destroy its barn-like appearance by panelling the ceiling, which work has been carried out by Mr. Eli Cox, architect. The cost of alterations and fittings is close upon £1,000. The memorial window is given by Mr. John Robinson. The upper part of the window has two panes with ornaments, and on the panes below, running on a ribbon, is the text "God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." Below in old English is the inscription:—"In memory of William Edgar Robinson, who died April 25, 1846, aged five years, and of Edmund Robinson, who died Oct. 2, 1857, aged twelve years. This window was presented by their parents at the restoration of the chapel. 1881."

The restoration of the chapel has been very complete, all the old-fashioned seats and the three-decker pulpit having been removed and all floors and windows taken out; in fact very little remained of the old building but the walls, and therefore the architect had some scope for showing his skill and taste in the re-arrangement and decoration of the chapel. The new seats are all made of the finest figured pitchpine, open ends, with sloping and moulded backs, which makes them very comfortable for sitting on. Under each seat is a hat rail, a very convenient thing, but it seems very seldom put in places of worship. The seat ends are of a very neat design, each end having a beautiful carved flower and foliage in a sunken circular panel, and each flower and foliage being different gives a very pleasing effect. All the seat fronts facing the reading desk and communion rails are filled in with rich tracery panels. The reading desk, seat, and table, were made by Messrs. Cox and Son, the eminent ecclesiastical furniture manufacturers, of London, and are of a beautiful design and workmanship. The two seats in front of the organ are raised a few inches above the rest of the seats, with the book shelves fixed on brass pillars. The ends of these two seats have exquisitely carved foliage and flowers, in fact, the carving to these ends is considered quite a work of art. All the aisles and the vestibule are tiled with neat four-inch tiles, the space within the communion rails being laid with encaustic tiles of a very rich pattern. The neat pitchpine rails to the communion, with the gilded ornamental brackets and the drapery about the reading desk, give this part of the chapel a very handsome appearance. The ceiling of the chapel is divided into panels and richly corniced; the beams in the ceiling are also panelled and beaded, and panelled pilasters with ornamental capitals are carried down from each beam to the floor. In the centre of the panelled ceiling is fixed a very fine sunlight, which illumines the building remarkably well. In addition to the above has been built a very handsome stone porch, which connects the two entrances into the chapel. It is built of dressed limestone and freestone, with angle buttresses, and over the doorway is a neat moulded label, and at the ends of this will be carved bosses in stone. The porch is lighted with two three-lighted stone mullioned windows, filled in with coloured glass. The doors into the porch are hung in two, and are of a very beautiful design with drapery panels.

The whole of the work has been designed and carried out by Mr. Eli Cox, architect, of Kendal, and reflects great credit on that gentleman's skill as an architect. A handsome Brussels carpeting covers the floors of the pews, &c., and the whole of the seats are made very comfortable with a lining of soft but serviceable material, and hassocks are provided, the whole being judiciously carried out.

On Wednesday week Mr. Smallwood gave a recital upon the new organ, assisted by his accomplished young pupil, Mr. J. S. Winder. Admission was by ticket, and previous to the hour for the commencement the seats were all well filled with a select assembly, which comprised members of various religious communities.

An afternoon service was held on Thursday week, when an eloquent sermon was preached by the Rev. A. SEINTREAL, of Manchester. The weather was most unfavourable, and the attendance was small. Mr. Wilkinson, the builder of the organ, presided thereat, and well proved its qualities by his skilful performance. The organ is a very beautiful instrument, and is considered to be one of the best—considering its size—that Mr. Wilkinson has built, some great improvements having been introduced into the instrument.

The foundation-stone of the Unitarian Sunday-school was laid by Miss Ann Kay Greenhow, of Anchorite House, Kendal, on Friday week. In a leaden box placed in the cavity were deposited coins of the reign of Queen Victoria, copies of Kendal, London, and Manchester newspapers, which contain the re-opening of this chapel, closed in September, 1881, and reopened with organ recital by Mr. Smallwood, organist of St. George's Church, Kendal, assisted by his nephew, Mr. J. S. Winder; the programme is also deposited. The Rev. James Macdonald, minister. A silver trowel was presented by Mr. Councillor Robinson to Miss Ann Kay Greenhow, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to Miss A. K. Greenhow on the occasion of her laying the foundation-stone of the Unitarian Sunday-school, March 10, 1882."

The school, which is now being built at the eas side of the chapel, will be about 46 feet long by 22 feet wide, and 15 feet to glass dome. It will be entirely lit from the roof with coloured glass, the ceiling will be a fine dome-shaped one with enriched frieze and ornamental brackets running all round, supported on twelve paneled pilasters ornamented with twelve beautiful Corinthian capitals. Round the dome above the frieze will be fixed foliage leaves about 18 inches high, above these again will be placed two rows of enrichments. The glass in the dome will be divided into three bays separated by ornamental beams. The school will also be paneled all round with the best figured pitchpine about 3 feet 6 inches high. At one end there will be a raised platform about 22 feet by 12 feet for the purpose of recitals and other entertainments when required. The school will also be approached from the outside by a neat stone porch. There will also be two extra rooms at one end of the school for purposes that will be wanted in connection with tea parties, &c.; a separate entrance will be made into the schoolroom from the chapel. It is proposed to decorate the school when built by painting and gilding the Corinthian capitals, frieze, and pilasters, and the other elaborate ornament in the beautiful dome-shaped ceiling, and it will be, when completed, one of the handsomest schoolrooms either in this town or neighbourhood; in fact, we may say it will be more like a first-class public hall, built regardless of expense. Mr. Cox is the architect, and he has shown great taste in his designs for the interior of this school.

CHELTEMHAM : REOPENING OF CHAPEL.

After a lapse of several months, the Unitarian Chapel, Bayshill, which has undergone considerable internal improvement, was reopened for public worship on Sunday week, when two sermons were preached by Mr. George St. Clair, F.G.S., Minister of the Church of the Saviour, Birmingham, to large and appreciative congregations. Special hymns were sung by the choir with good effect. On Monday evening a tea meeting took place in the schoolroom, when a large number of the congregation and friends were present. After the tea an adjournment was made to the chapel, where the organist played a selection of music. The interior of the building has been redecorated at an outlay of nearly £150, and this does not include the improvement to the schoolroom. The work has been carried out in a manner highly satisfactory to the minister and congregation of the church. The ornamental writing at the pulpit end of the chapel is especially pleasing, both in design and execution. The old doctrinal texts which formerly adorned the wall have been banished, and in their place are passages of Scripture of a general character, in respect of which no difference of opinion could possibly arise between Unitarians and Trinitarians. A bazaar was held some few months since in aid of the funds for repairing the chapel, and the amount realised by this effort was £70. This sum will be supplemented by the collections of Sunday, the profits of the tea meeting, and various donations, and it is hoped that the debt incurred by the alterations will soon be a thing of the past.

On Monday evening a public meeting took place in the schoolroom, when, in addition to several eloquent addresses, a musical programme was exceedingly well given by members of the choir and friends. The chair was taken by the Rev. J. Robberds, of Battledown Tower, supported by the Rev. O. J. Hirst, pastor of the Bayshill Chapel; the Revs. Carey Walters, Kidderminster; H. Austin, Cirencester; W. Birks, Stroud; J. W. Coad, Mr. Butcher, Major Barnard, &c.

After the singing of a hymn,

The CHAIRMAN said he thought they must all be of opinion that the designs had been carried out with very great skill and assiduity and care. In his opinion it was their duty to make their chapels and churches as attractive and comfortable as their own dwelling houses.

Major BARNARD proposed, and Mr. JOYNER seconded, the following resolution:—"That the best thanks of this meeting be given to Mr. St. Clair for his visit and helpful services on the occasion of the re-opening of the church."

Mr. ST. CLAIR, after some prefatory remarks, said:—Their position in the present day was that of a people who were not only tolerated but to whom a large measure of liberty was accorded. They were no longer persecuted. They could worship God according to their consciences, and they enjoyed so much liberty that they found members of other denominations coming to their special services and meetings, and occasionally speaking on their platforms. To such an extent had this feeling of friendliness made itself felt, that it was proposed to hold a conference in Liverpool of Unitarians, Presbyterians, Free Church members, and, in fact, members of all denominations that did not subscribe to any creed which would set a limit for all time on any future thought or inquiry. The promoters of this conference, the Unitarians, would probably be in a measure disappointed; at least, he was afraid they were a little too sanguine as to the results. It seemed desirable, however, that they should ask themselves the question why they, as Unitarians and members of Free Churches, enjoyed so much liberty; and why, on the other hand, so many members of what were called the orthodox denominations still stood aloof, and refused to join in conferences such as the one he had just alluded to? He thought it would be found that these orthodox people had followed too much the exclusiveness of the Jews instead of the large-hearted doctrine taught by Jesus Christ. The speaker passed on to show that much of the religious persecution of past ages had not been carried on so much by wicked men as by persons who fancied God would approve of their actions. They fancied they were serving God. It would be instructive to ask how it was a change had come over the scenes, and in looking back they would find that the persecution arose from the fact that certain people regarded their little church as the ark in which salvation was alone to be found, and regarded all outsiders as enemies of God. They believed that it was the intention of the Almighty to send all these outsiders to eternal torment; believed all those horrors about little children being consigned to eternal flames if they were not baptised. The way to banish such superstitious ideas was by introducing into the minds of such people some doubt as to whether they were right, and eventually the conviction that they had been actually wrong. If they looked into the matter they would find that doubt and scepticism had brought about the religious liberty they enjoyed, and doubt and scepticism in certain directions he rejoiced in. Surely they might rejoice that they had lived long enough to doubt the doctrine taught by some people, that a child was sent to hell because it did not live long enough to be baptised—(applause). Mr. St. Clair passed on to say that the idea of there being such a place as hell, as taught by orthodox Christians, had been exploded by men of science who studied astronomy. People could never put confidence in such teaching after Columbus sailed round the earth, and proved that it was round, and consequently that there could be no such place as hell underneath. The geography of people who talked in this way was at fault, and would not stand criticism. Scientific inquiry of the mind, with regard to religious questions, had proved the Bible to be a human book; written by men, albeit that they were good and holy men. It had shown that those men were not infallible.

The Rev. C. J. HIRST said that he had invited several ministers in the town to be present at their meeting. Mr. Wilkins would have been glad to have been present, but he had a long standing engagement, which he felt bound to keep. Mr. Blackie also had an engagement. Dr. York had undertaken to speak to a resolution, but was prevented from being present in consequence of illness. He had received a message from the Rev. J. W. Coad, promising to be present towards the close of the meeting. Mr. Hirst said he hoped to make it a custom once every year to speak a few words of welcome to their members. They did not increase very rapidly, but still every year since he had been connected with the church they had had a small number of new members. In words of kindness and with expressions of hopefulness Mr. Hirst then alluded to the work carried on in his church, and appealed to the congregation to assist him in the great work he had put his hand to.

Mr. OSBORNE, as one of the new members, thanked Mr. Hirst for his kindly expressions, and spoke of the valuable services rendered by the pastor in the past.

The Rev. CAREY WALTERS delivered an eloquent address, in the course of which he proposed a welcome to ministers of other denominations. The speaker said this was a sentiment which he felt great pleasure in speaking to. For himself he was an Episcopalian in the true New Testament sense of the word; he hoped he was a Methodist in believing in the necessity for method, and in fervour and earnestness in the prosecution of God's work. He believed he was a Congregationalist, because he held that their system of church government was the best; and he was a Baptist because he knew that they had a historical standpoint from which they could not be driven; he was a Unitarian because he believed in the unity of God; he was a bit of a Swedenborgian, and he did not know but what he was slightly connected in belief with several other sects—(laughter). But he was sure there was a wider Church than all these to which they belonged, and it was the Church of Jesus Christ. It was as a member of the church of the living God that he stretched forth the hand of fellowship and welcomed the ministers of other religious denominations on to the platform he occupied himself. They all preached the same Gospel, and he was pleased that a representative of another Church had come to show them that deep down beneath the storm of their intellectual differences there was a calm of eternal peace—(applause). He was not there to minimise the differences between themselves and those who were called orthodox, nor did he think Mr. Coad was there to compromise his own opinions; but though a wall divided them, happily it was not so high but that they could shake each other by the hand and extend the look of sympathy and kindness to one another. People told him he was heterodox, but to the people who were inclined to grumble he would reply—

"All such pretensions wisdom mocks,
As calmly she replies,
There's only One who's orthodox,
For only one is wise."

—(applause). The speaker passed on to condemn the complacency with which some religious people looked down on their fellows. They seemed to think that they had "climbed to higher heights and reached a purer air," and so they looked down with a bit of contempt on the poor souls who they supposed were struggling up through the mist to the high vantage ground occupied by themselves. Reference was made by the speaker to his work in Kidderminster, and advice was given to the pastor and congregation of Bayshill Church to hold services occasionally in the public buildings of the town.

The Rev. J. W. COAD, who was heartily received, expressed pleasure at their being allowed to render assistance to his friend Mr. Hirst, and hoped sincerely his labours might be blessed. Allusion was made to the efficacy of prayer, and the speaker urged the members of the congregation to hold up their minister's hands by supplicating the Throne of Grace.

A vote of thanks was accorded to the ministers and friends at a distance.

The Rev. H. AUSTIN, in responding, spoke of the work he was engaged in at Swindon, and

The Rev. W. BIRKS also acknowledged the compliment in a brief speech.

Mr. BUTCHER also responded, and, after the usual votes of thanks, the meeting was brought to a close.

MANSFIELD: RE-OPENING OF THE OLD MEETING HOUSE.

On Tuesday, the 14th inst., this chapel was reopened, after being closed for some little time for the purpose of enlargement and needful repairs. In 1871, during the ministry of the Rev. A. W. Worthington, a thorough restoration was carried into effect with admirable taste, and at considerable cost the old Presbyterian Meeting-house was transformed into one of the prettiest chapels of the district, without in any way spoiling the original character of the building. Since that time the congregation has steadily prospered, until in the autumn of last year it became very evident that the existing accommodation was insufficient. Fortunately there was a piece of land at the rear of the chapel available for its extension in that direction. After due deliberation it was resolved to build a chancel over this plot of ground, in which to place the communion table, organ, and choir, thus setting free a corresponding space in the original building for new pews. Mr. R. F. Vallance, architect, of Mansfield (a member of the congregation), prepared the plans, which were adopted in September last, and by the end of the month the contract was let, and the work commenced in good earnest. A wooden partition, from floor to ceiling, was put up at the end where the extension was to be made. By means of this arrangement a considerable portion of the work was done without interfering with the Sunday services, and it was not until the middle of January that it became necessary to vacate the chapel entirely. The Town-hall was then engaged, and for eight Sundays service was held there morning and evening. In addition to the minister, the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, the following took part in the course: the Revs. Eli Fay and C. H. Osler, Sheffield; C. C. Coe, Bolton; and F. E. Milson, Halifax. The result has been unexpectedly encouraging, large congregations having attended throughout, while many strangers, who had never been inside the Old Meeting House, showed their appreciation of the services by coming again and again. March 12 was the last Sunday in the Town-hall, and the following Tuesday was fixed upon for the reopening service in the chapel. The day was gloriously fine, and the Old Meeting House with its quaint surroundings all looked their best. As the time for service approached visitors from neighbouring towns arrived in goodly numbers. From Nottingham alone came some forty or fifty friends to show their interest. Sheffield and Chesterfield were also well represented.

The reopening service was conducted by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, and the organ was presided over by Mr. W. Wright, organist of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, who brought with him several members of his own choir to assist in the service. It may be mentioned that the Ten Service book, and Dr. Martineau's new hymn book were adopted, and used for the first time at this service. The chapel was crowded in every part, some ministers of other denominations in the town being present. Mr. Hopps preached a most eloquent sermon from the text, "Honour and Majesty are before Him; Strength and Beauty are in His Sanctuary." All present were deeply impressed with the truth and appropriateness of the discourse as the preacher dwelt upon the grandeur of the old thought of God, and pointed out how strength and beauty went hand in hand, alike in the highest character and the highest art. At the close of the service a collection was made in aid of the building fund.

At five o'clock a tea [meeting was held in the Town Hall. About two hundred and fifty sat down to tea, the tables being presided over by various ladies of the congregation. As soon as the tables were cleared the chair was taken by MICHAEL HUNTER, Esq., Mayor of Sheffield, who was received with loud acclamation by the crowded audience.

The CHAIRMAN opened the proceedings with a very interesting address, in which he alluded to his connection with the Old Meeting congregation. Most of those present, he said, must have heard of the Sylvesters of Mansfield, who were among the founders of the congregation nearly two hundred years ago. One of these Sylvesters left Mansfield and became a member of the congregation worshipping in Pepper Alley, Sheffield. He was going a good way back in telling them that his (the Chairman's) grandfather married the granddaughter of this same Sylvester. This was one ground on which he claimed a personal interest in the proceedings of that day, and it gave him great pleasure to be present among them, and to see such an enthusiastic gathering—(cheers).

After a glee sung by the choir, the Rev. C. H. WELLBELOVED proposed a cordial vote of thanks to the Rev. J. Page Hopps for his services, which they had all heartily enjoyed and appreciated, and to Mr. Wright, of Nottingham, for coming over to preside at the organ.—The resolution was seconded by Mr. ANDREW THOMPSON, and carried with loud applause.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, in acknowledging the vote of thanks, said he should remember for a long time the very pleasant afternoon they had spent together in their beautiful chapel. There was something very restful in the subdued light coming through the window, and sitting listening to the beautiful notes of the organ. He must congratulate them on what they had accomplished, as he had known the chapel in three or four phases, and had preached in it in its old phase. He would urge upon the young people present to be proud of being Unitarians, and not ashamed. It was always a sign of being manly and womanly when they endeavoured to hold their own convictions, and being true to themselves was trying to do good to others.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Nottingham, having thanked them very much for the hearty vote of thanks accorded him,

The Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON, who was received with long continued applause, said when the chapel was altered eleven years ago it was not thought advisable to remove the back wall—the only way in which it could be enlarged—but he was pleased to see that a younger son of an old friend had seen his way to do so. He did not know a place of worship where he could sit and listen to the service with more satisfaction than in that beautiful old chapel.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG said that the congregation in Mansfield always seemed to him an example to be followed. The families that had been connected with the place for years seemed to spread and grow, and bring in with them others, who in their turn brought in others, and so the congregation grew and multiplied. That seemed to him to be the best way a congregation could grow.

The Rev. C. H. OSLER said there could be no doubt that other churches were moving towards them, and they ought to move toward other churches, but they ought not to allow one brick of sturdy Unitarianism to be removed. If they were only true to themselves they would raise up a temple that would not crumble and decay, but be a living temple as long as God's universe stood.

The Rev. C. H. WELLBELOVED proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman, which was seconded by Mr. J. E. BIRKS, and carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN, in reply, said he was pleased that they had expressed their vote of thanks so sincerely. He thanked them very much indeed for the reception they had given him, and trusted that, as a short time ago the life of her Majesty the Queen was in danger, they would not leave the room without singing that grand old national hymn, "God Save the Queen."

The Rev. C. H. WELLBELOVED having taken the chair, the meeting was addressed by the Revs. A. FARQUHARSON, of Chesterfield, BARNARD GISEY, of Derby, and J. FOX, of Newark.

A very pleasant and encouraging meeting was brought to a close by a vote of thanks to the ladies who presided at the tea tables, and the choirs and others who provided the musical part of the proceedings and the singing of the National Anthem.

THE CASE OF THE REV. G. C. MILN, OF CHICAGO.

The case of the Rev. George C. Miln, of Unity Church, Chicago, writes the Christian Register, may be briefly described as "peculiar." Bret Harte once gave a Mongolian illustration of this word, which greatly excited the public interest. Mr. Miln has now determined that the pulpit shall not be outdone by the gaming-table. Without resorting to that secular game so common in the West, he has proved nevertheless that a minister can be as "peculiar" as the unlearned Chinaman who played successfully a game he did not understand.

Mr. Miln has openly declared in his own pulpit that he does not believe in a personal God or personal immortality. He disowns prayer, and considers the church as only a kind of ethical club. In many respects, his views seem to be akin to those of Mr. Felix Adler, with this important difference, that Mr. Adler is a pronounced idealist, planting himself firmly on the Kantian ethics, while Mr. Miln is an avowed materialist. The difference between these two positions to our mind might be illustrated geographically by the difference in position between Boston and Calcutta; they are almost diametrically opposite.

But it is not the peculiarity of Mr. Miln's views that attracts our attention. His views have been held by others before him. He is breaking no new path. We do not care to discuss these questions with a neophyte. We would rather debate them with some one who has studied them longer, and whose convictions have been thoroughly matured. The peculiarity in the case is principally revealed in the movement of Mr. Miln's mind for the last two years, and in the fact that he has felt willing so often to reveal its secret operations to the public.

We mean to be just and fair in this matter, and we cordially respect the honesty and courage with which Mr. Miln puts by an old view when his conscience requires it. Nevertheless, his recent treatment of Unity Church seems in the highest degree peculiar, and to require explanations which have not yet been furnished. If he had laid a deliberate plan to entrap and embarrass his church that he might make capital out of the transaction, he could not have done it more successfully than he seems to have done. If not a contrived plan, it was at least a gross blunder. Mr. Miln tendered his resignation on the ground of ill-health (resulting, we believe, from congestion of the brain), and also because he thought in a general way that he was too radical for the society. His congregation requested him to remain. "Mr. Miln consented, and then, having committed himself and his society, preached the sermon which astonished his people. Why did not Mr. Miln preach this sermon before he tendered his resignation? Undoubtedly, he changes his views frequently and rapidly; but we can hardly suppose that in two weeks he could have made such a mental leap as that which his sermon describes.

Although Mr. Miln was called to the pastorate of Unity Church, he declined to identify himself with the Unitarian body. We heartily wish that he had shown more sympathy to the Unitarian position and had given it a careful study before passing as rapidly as he did from Orthodoxy to materialism. If he had been willing to spend a couple of years at Meadville, studying theology from the Unitarian standpoint, he might have found in Unitarianism a congenial soil, where his mind could grow as well as take root. At Cambridge he could not only have studied Unitarianism, but, free from all sectarian tests and under the guidance and inspiration of able teachers, could have fought and settled this battle with materialism before re-entering the Christian ministry. While we recognise the fine culture and great ability of many clerical converts from Orthodoxy to Unitarianism and heartily welcome them to our ministry, we nevertheless believe that there are few who would not be richly repaid by studying a year or two at our theological seminaries before taking a pulpit. With changes of belief as well as changes of residence it is necessary that one should be acclimated. Otherwise there is danger of colds and fevers.

Having a firm confidence in the Congregational idea, Mr. Miln's case we felt could be safely left with the only body that had power to deal with it,—his own church. The result shows that this confidence was justified. If Mr. Miln had duly respected his church, he would not have trifled with its affections in this manner. But it is gratifying to know that the church respects itself. By the conditions of settlement, either party could terminate the engagement at the expiration of three months. The church has availed itself of this privilege. A telegram just received from our Chicago correspondent says:—

At a special meeting of Unity Church, February 13, P. P. Haywood, Chairman of Trustees, presiding, the following resolution was offered:—"That the trustees of Unity Church be instructed to give forthwith the Rev. G. C. Miln a notice in writing that his connection with Unity Church as its pastor is to terminate at the expiration of three months."

Mr. Miln, desiring to be heard in his own defence, was given forty minutes to state his views. His request for statement of reasons for this action of the society was not entertained, and the resolution passed by one hundred and eighteen to thirty-eight.

WHITBY.—At the annual meeting of the trustees of the Flowergate Old Chapel, on Thursday, the 16th inst., the Rev. John Owen announced his intention of retiring from the discharge of his duties as minister on the last Sunday in June, when he will have completed a ministerial service of sixty-one years.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—Last Saturday a large audience assembled in the Palace concert room, drawn by the announcement that Dr. Joachim would perform on the violin. Nor was the audience disappointed in their expectations of an unusual treat. This great master of perhaps the most difficult of instruments performed two solos, and united with the splendid band, led as usual by its accomplished leader, Mr. A. Mann, in the execution of one long and intricate piece of music, in which it was hard to say whether Dr. Joachim or the band performed the better. Indeed, after a listener has overcome his surprise at the complete mastery of the violin displayed by the former, he is compelled to say that the band yields more enjoyment to the music loving. Its training seems almost perfect; not a discord of any kind to be heard, while notes of exquisite delicacy issue from time to time from one or more of the many instruments that make up the rounded harmony of the whole. The lady singers, Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Glenn, sang the few pieces allotted to them with all the skill of trained vocalists.

THE BIBLE AND ROYALTY.—Following the precedent of former years, the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society have decided that a Family Bible, suitably bound, shall be presented to Prince Leopold and Princess Helen on the occasion of their marriage.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed for the purpose of acquiring good marketable properties and estates, and for the development, improvement and sale of such properties and estates. It will also advance money on the security of freehold leasehold, or copyhold land and buildings, and carry on all or any of the businesses usually carried on by Land Companies in all their several branches.

It is a well known fact that securities of this description stand unrivalled as high class investments when all other securities are depressed, and some idea may be formed of the success obtained by similar undertakings from the sub-joined list :—

NAME OF COMPANY.	Dividend paid.	Amount paid.	per share.	Present Price.

* This Company made its first issue of Shares at par, the second at £1 premium, the third at £2 premium, the fourth at £3 premium, the fifth at £4 premium, the sixth at £5 premium, and the seventh at £6 premium. In each case the Issue was £100,000.

There is a large field for the operations of this Company, and no more trustworthy estimate of its prospects of success could be formed than the actual status of the Companies referred to in the above list furnishes to intending Shareholders.

The Company will derive its chief profit from the increasing income arising out of properties purchased by them, and from the subsequent resale of such properties when developed. Investments in freehold, leasehold, and copyhold estates afford the greatest security and the best guarantee for a satisfactory return upon the capital invested, and although there are many demands for accumulated funds, it is believed that substantial landed investments are invariably preferred.

The Company will also issue debentures, and it is anticipated that these will command the confidence of capitalists at the usual rates for debentures issued on the best securities, and will prove highly desirable investments. Money will also be received on deposit for fixed periods at such interest as may be agreed upon.

The Directors have already entered into provisional agreements for the purchase of valuable properties now ripe for development, and as some of these properties consist of house property producing upwards of £3,000 per annum, the Company hopes to be in a position to pay a substantial dividend from its commencement.

The only Contracts entered into are the following, dated respectively the 23rd day of February, 1882, and made between JOHN EMERSON of the one part, and HENRY PECK of the other part, being a provisional Contract for the sale and purchase of houses and land, and another made between the same parties, being a Contract for payment of formation expenses up to and including allotment.

Copies of these Contracts, together with Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, can be seen at the Offices of the Company, and of their Solicitors.

It is intended to apply to the Stock Exchange for a settlement and official quotation for the Company's Shares.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Shares may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, and Auditors, and at the Offices of the Company.

THE DECAY OF MODERN PREACHING.

SOCIAL AND PERSONAL CAUSES.

WE have noticed in a previous article some of the causes of the alleged and, we fear it must be added, the admitted decay of modern preaching. The Rev P. J. MAHAFFY, whose admirable little book on the subject we have so far closely followed, maintains that there is a necessary decrease in the power of preaching from the loss of novelty in the creed. For our own part, we attach much less value to mere novelty, and believe that the old truisms still have power over the heart and conscience of this modern world whenever they are made instinct with a new spirit of divine life, and are preached with power by men who are fully persuaded of the truth of what they profess. Old formulæ which have become mere worn-out symbols can no longer move the world, but aphorisms which have not lost their original meaning, even if they have become mere truisms, are infinitely better than the newest speculations, if they go forth from an earnest conviction appealing to the common spiritual life of humanity. But we entirely agree with our author when he says that the preaching of the eighteenth century, which was entirely devoid of the deeper spiritual element, is not the best preaching for the nineteenth, and that still less is the preaching of the second century, with its vastly different political and social conditions, a model for those who desire now to reform the world. "No employment of second century formulæ, with the aid of new and subtle meanings, will satisfy the present need of spiritual help and direction."

Among the social causes of the decline of preaching Mr. MAHAFFY mentions some which, however trifling they may seem in themselves, nevertheless exercise considerable influence on the preacher. Thus there is the tyrannical and exacting power of custom, the King Nomos of whom PLATO speaks as the real ruler of society, and whose influence is felt quite as much in the Liberal as in the Traditional churches. In the ordinary public observances of religion, for example, the smallest variation from the usual practice is quite as much deprecated by heterodox as by orthodox worshippers. There is a rigid uniformity which asserts its bondage over the preacher by an unwritten law, more effective than rubrics and articles. Thus the preacher is required on periodical occasions, however indisposed or empty he may feel as regards power of teaching, to ascend a pulpit, generally of the old tub-like form, where he has no power of movement or action beyond that of thumping the pulpit cushion. He is obliged to select a text of Scripture from which to draw his lessons, although it must be confessed it requires no very great ingenuity to select one which will be a more or less appropriate motto, and is often, indeed, the best part of the sermon, because it has the ring of simple truth and reality in it. If he employs anecdotes he is thought familiar, and might shock the propriety of some of his superfine hearers; if he keeps to dogma only he certainly becomes dry and generally narrow and denunciatory. Above all, as Mr. MAHAFFY points out, to be amusing is a great crime, at least in Protestant churches. Roman Catholic preaching is much less bound by rules and conventionalities, and allows more scope to a variety of gifts in the preacher. But the shadow of Puritanism still hangs over our Churches, the Liberal Churches quite as much as the Orthodox. There is no orator in the world, Mr. MAHAFFY rightly observes, speaking on the subject nearest to his heart, and most vital to those he addresses, who totally avoids humour, the appeal to that peculiarly human quality the faculty of laughter, except the preacher. "To him, while wit is wholly inadmissible, even humour is only allowed in the form of bitterness and sarcasm, the very forms which are really most unsuitable to his sacred office." Modern society, with its artificial conditions, has done its best to make preaching a mere perfunctory duty, and it has succeeded. Few men have genius enough—especially in the clerical profession—to shake off restraints of this kind, and the natural result is that the pulpit is exactly what society has thought fit to make it. Yet, on the other hand, when there are great and original preachers who shake off the deadening influence of custom, this tyranny of King Nomos, they inspire general admiration, and what is still better, exercise a commanding influence for good. Few men have shown a more entire disregard for all the traditional customs of preaching than Mr. SPURGEON. He is "the chartered libertine" of the pulpit, from the first doing and saying things which shocked the starched propriety of the most Puritanical of Dissenting sects, and excited the uncontrollable levity of the profane outer world. But now it is acknowledged by all candid observers that his lively imagination, his rich fund of apt anecdotes, his natural dramatic power, his appeal to the faculty of laughter—kept more in restraint, however, than in former years—combined with unimpeachable orthodoxy, and the possession of the rare gift of natural eloquence, are the real causes of the wonderful power he exerts, not only over his vast congregation, but over incidental hearers, who come only to criticise. And with certain qualifications the same may be said of our own ROBERT COLLYER, the prose poet of the Pulpit, who with fewer of the natural gifts of the mere orator has far more native genius, broader human sympathies, and a higher literary culture, as well as a marvellous gift of discerning both the humorous and the pathetic sides in this great drama of human life. Great preachers, like great saints, it is urged, will overcome all the restraints and unfavourable conditions with which they are often shackled by society. But then great preachers are unfortunately so rare!

But besides the social causes to which we have adverted there are strictly personal causes which partly account for the decay of modern preaching. The greatest of these, which, of course, tells against men in any other profession, is want of ability. Mr. MAHAFFY dismisses with proper contempt the pleas which may be heard sometimes even among the religious Liberals, about being puffed up with human knowledge, the simplicity of the Gospel, and administering the pure word as milk to babes, and other totally irrelevant quotations, which cannot properly be applied to cultivated modern society. He insists upon the obvious fact that want of brains is a capital defect, and that no amount of piety and moral excellence will make a stupid man a successful preacher. No doubt, as our author says, the majority of mankind is wanting in real ability; and the average of intellect is low; but the misfortune is that so many worthy men assume the office of the preacher—especially among the Dissenting sects—who have not availed themselves of the training requisite to develop their latent faculties—such as they are—and are certainly unable to instruct thoughtful and educated hearers even in the special subject to which they devote their time and attention. Even among ourselves it must be sadly confessed that with few exceptions the ablest young University men, and the sons of our foremost ministers do not adopt the ministry as a profession; and

Mr. MAHAFFY acknowledges that in his own body—the Irish Disestablished Church—the preachers as a body are below even the average in intellect—a very sad confession for any Church to make. Speaking from his wide experience as an old theological lecturer at Trinity College, Dublin, he tells us that every year there were men “who deliberately adopted the profession of religious teaching with the consciousness that they could not possibly understand what they had to teach; they were, in fact, adopting this profession because they were too dull for any others.” The same can hardly be said of the Nonconformist ministry, which offers no great social or worldly advantages, and which few men are likely to enter upon without decided convictions, and a genuine desire to exercise a purely spiritual vocation. But, generally speaking, it must be said that in these modern days few men of great ability turn to preaching as a profession. The great preachers of all Churches may be counted upon the fingers almost of one hand, and it is the rarest thing in the world to hear a sermon which really touches the heart and inspires the intellectual interest with which we listen to a great political speech. Yet it may be added for the consolation of the majority in this much-criticised sacred profession that there are, as Mr. MAHAFFY himself allows—rare cases where a man, endowed with but moderate intellectual ability has a curious force in him, difficult to define, the quality of leading men by strength of will or character. But this faculty or endowment is one of the rarest of natural gifts, just as real common sense is one of the most uncommon possessions in the world.

We need not dwell further here upon the need of general intellectual culture in the preacher, if he is to exercise an influence over educated congregations—nay, even over uneducated congregations, because this is an admitted truism among religious Liberals. Nor is it necessary to point out the extreme desirableness of special academical and theological training for the ministry, if the teachers of religion are to command the respect of their hearers. There are now but few foolish persons among us, we hope, who think that to feel strongly on the subject of religion and to have a general superficial acquaintance with the Bible is sufficient to warrant a man in assuming the office of a teacher of religion. The purely non-professional theory of the Christian ministry is quite as injurious in its way to the efficacy of preaching as the highest sacerdotal theory; and some of us, we fear, have not yet learned the lesson that the position of the ministry is the real test of a standing or falling Church. But this and other branches of the subject we must leave for due consideration in one or two subsequent articles.

“THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY.”

DR. CONGREVE'S annual address on New Year's Day, “the Festival of Humanity,” is always deserving of attention, and the one delivered last New Year's Day and just published is no exception to the rule. It is divided into two parts. The first deals with general questions of morals, politics, and religion considered with reference to Positivist principles and aims; the second reviews the recent progress of the movement and the efforts which are being made to extend the influence and recognition of Positivism. The first part differs little from what has appeared in former addresses; we therefore pass on to what Dr. CONGREVE says concerning the present position of the Positivist movement,

He prepares his hearers for a very modest statement, and tells them that it is wise not to think too much of their actual position, and reminds them of the slow growth of Christianity in the first Christian age. He refers them to the records of early Christianity as full to Positivists of encouragement and instruction. “Carefully made,” he says, “the comparison of its origin with our own is not to our disadvantage. And it is curious how much similarity such a comparison reveals.” It is well known that small in number as the avowed adherents of the cause are, there is division among them. This is alluded to by our author thus:—“I spoke last year of two centres, both in Paris and London. One of the two in Paris has wholly disappeared. In London both continue, and one has placed itself on a much firmer footing than before by the possession of a really good room.” This “solid establishment” of a second “centre” he regards as “a gain of strength” and “an evidence of the extension of our doctrine.” Verily Dr. CONGREVE is thankful for small mercies.

Speaking of the little society with which he is more immediately connected, Dr. CONGREVE says:—

Our action has been continuous; this room has been open every Sunday during the year, though on one or two Sundays there may accidentally have been no meeting. Most of the year there has been the simple religious service which we use; during the rest, there have been meetings of a conversational character, and from our experience such meetings have been felt to be of great use. During the later months there has been an evening meeting of this less formal kind. The usual social gatherings have also continued with the quiet persistence which should characterise Positivist conduct. The library has gained both in order and number, and slowly advances to completeness. The portraits of the leading representatives of Humanity are nearly all acquired. Throughout the year we have had the addition of music, giving a different character to our services. I would express my own and the general gratitude for the kind perseverance of those who have in their various degrees helped us in this way. There is a desire to advance beyond instrumental music. I share the desire, but do not see how it can be accomplished at present. I would only urge on this subject that we all give due weight to the experience which testifies to the value of congregational singing, even when as a mere question of music it is not of a high order. In this as in everything social considerations should prevail. The Sacraments administered have been two—Initiation and Marriage. The Initiation was the completion of the sacramental reception mentioned last year, in the only case in which circumstances admitted such completion. The Sacrament of Marriage was administered to two complete disciples of the Religion of Humanity, who had the courage to accept in full this institution as it is modified by the new faith.

Dr. CONGREVE urges especially on his friends the acceptance of their social sacraments as one great service which they can render to the cause. He recommends them to have the courage of their convictions—to identify themselves openly with the cause they approve, to take up its profession in face of the world. No doubt there is great need for this counsel. We know how much it applies to our own Unitarian cause. How many thousands are there in secret sympathy with us who do not openly avow themselves! Talk to them and we find that in theological opinion they are Unitarians, but they do not call themselves such, and are never to be found in our chapels. If all who hold Unitarian opinions would profess them openly the Unitarian Church would take rank with the most popular Nonconformist denominations.

Dr. CONGREVE proceeds next to review the progress and present position of Positivism in some of the large towns; but the account he is able to give seems to us anything but cheering, though he himself discovers ground for encouragement. He says:—

There has been no slackening, quite the contrary, in the religious advance of the Liverpool Positivists. There has been from the first a religious impulse with a most truly social bearing. They have lately lost one of their number by death; one who had given in his complete adhesion, though he knew that death was on him; his burial was a purely Positivist act, beautifully performed by Dr. Carson. The work of the Birmingham Positivists is done under greater difficulties partly as having been more recently begun, partly owing to the peculiarities of their social atmosphere. They persevere, however, with a wise moderation, adapting their method to their circumstances, and not without good hope of gradually increasing their number and making their action felt. The same may be said of Wolverhampton, as far as the perseverance is concerned. The prospect of increase there is not so good, in the judgment of those who are most capable of forming an opinion. I could not learn that there was any chance as yet of a Positivist movement in Manchester. There is in that city, as far as I know, no one whose circumstances enable him to attempt a beginning; the essential requisite in all such cases, the existence of some one around whom others may gather, is therefore wanting. In Newcastle I have good reason for saying that this requisite exists—good reason, therefore, for hoping that in that important centre there may be a beginning of Positivist organisation. In Edinburgh, again, I am persuaded that this is the only real want, the only obstacle to the setting on foot of some simple organisation, and there, from what I saw, it might be so easily removed. Very simple might such organisation be in the first—an occasional or periodical meeting in a friendly way—nowhere are such meetings better understood. I speak from a grateful recollection of several.

Such, then, are the towns in which there has been as yet any direct action of the Positivists; and such, so far, is the progress of the movement. The man must, we think, have large faith who can regard it as encouraging. We are glad to notice, however, that there is no attempt to magnify these small results, or to represent the state of things as better than it is. Dr. CONGREVE'S statement is transparently truthful and candid. We feel in following him all through that his statements are reliable to the letter. Speaking of Scotland, he says:—

In the loosening of the hitherto dominant belief which is generally admitted in Scotland, and to which English attention has of late been not unfrequently directed, what we offer may surely be expected to be weighed if it be but presented. Hardly any direct result, however, do I look for from my efforts there just at present; but it was something to bring the subject before considerable numbers, and without impatience as without discouragement we may await for its gaining ground, especially if the interest in it is kept alive by others, as I am glad to learn is the case.

Replying to the question—What are we doing, Dr. CONGREVE says, “We are holding on under great pressure of various kinds. The minds of those around us are indifferent, or pre-occupied, or hostile—or if none of these, then there comes in the distrust of our powers to succeed, a distrust justified by our actual want of success.” The feeling had been strengthening, he adds, that mere lecturing had done its part, and that the time had come when their belief in Humanity should find some expression in words, in a common act of prayer and praise, which should be at once the evidence of their faith and the mutual assurance, as it were, of those who held it.

“I speak in no despondency as to the ultimate issue,” observes our author, bravely and hopefully.

Some time or other, he well assured, there must come the direct worship of Humanity, direct addresses to her, her complete recognition as a living and real power. All our reasoning, all our invitations to others, suppose this. Why not begin at once? What motive is there for the believer to adjourn his testimony to the sincerity of his belief?

"We are so few." We must be few at the beginning. "It is so unreal while we are few." I have not so read the history of other religions; the unreality has not lain with the small number of their early disciples, and I see no ground for our being an exception. From judgment and from feeling, then, I am for continuing in the same track, improving where we can, adding what we can, but with no concession in the principle. We are not fallen on a time which favours inaction, any more [than] on a time which is oppressively discouraging to wise exertion. Sufficient motive for such exertion may be found in our past as in the present. We have not been, and shall not be, without our influence upon others. There are not a few who look to us, though I would not exaggerate their number. Our way is gradually being prepared; the hearts of men are opening for the entrance of the new Madonna, the queen of their love and devotion.

We have quoted largely from Dr. CONGREVE's address to his brother Positivists because some parts of it are not without application to ourselves. We have already drawn attention to this point. Their cause is a struggling one, and so is ours. Popular indifference, apathy, and prejudice confront them, as they do us. Divisions exist among them, and so they do in our ranks. Patient effort, they feel, is with them the duty of the hour, and so it is with us. The counsel which Dr. CONGREVE gives on these points will apply not to Positivism only, but to every public cause which has faith in itself and is struggling under great disadvantages, for growth, development, and influence. He counsels steady persistence in the same lines on which they have begun. We would offer the same counsel too. It is not by novelties, surprises, or new departures, but by "patient continuance in well-doing," on the part of its friends, that the victory of truth will be won at last.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.
THE death of LONGFELLOW, the most popular poet of two worlds, following so soon upon the death of his friend and co-religionist Dr. BELLOWS, the greatest pulpit-orator of America, has smitten every one with a sense of personal grief and loss. There is no need that we should pen here a tribute to his genius, or analyse the causes of his wide-spread popularity. That work has been done for us in the full and admirable sketch we give in another page, for which we are chiefly indebted to "the Portrait Gallery," published by Messrs. CASSELL, who also give us an excellent likeness of the venerable poet taken in his old age. Our beloved Bard needs no testimony of honour; for in every English and American home, nay, in all cultured homes of almost every foreign land, he is a cherished "household word," and his benignant countenance, full of the calmness and elevation of inspiration, is a familiar guest in the homes of the Prince and the Peasant.

Two poets more than any other—LONGFELLOW and TENNYSON—of widely diverse gifts—have contributed to form the poetic taste and elevate the ideal of the present generation and its immediate predecessor. Inferior in genius to the poet-Laureate, LONGFELLOW has attained a wider popularity during his life-time, and has touched the common heart of humanity more deeply than any of his contemporaries. The highest poetry is almost always religious, because if it expresses not a single religious phrase it lifts up the soul to a loftier ideal, and raises an earthly prosaic life into a diviner atmosphere of thought and aspiration. And LONGFELLOW's muse was in all its forms essentially religious. Search his works from beginning to end, and Excelsior runs through all like a golden thread. That is the characteristic mark of sons of GOD and Prophets of the Highest. Happily does LONGFELLOW describe the essential nature of his own life-work as a religious teacher in his description of the theologian in the "Tales of the Wayside Inn":—

"He preached to all men everywhere
The Gospel of the Golden rule,
The new commandment given to men,
Thinking the deed, and not the creed,
Would help us in our utmost need,
With reverent feet the earth he trod,
Nor banished Nature from his plan,
But studied still with deep research
To build the Universal Church,
Lofty as is the love of God,
And ample as the wants of man."

These lines indicate not only the singular purity, but also the catholicity of LONGFELLOW's poetic genius. Born of a Puritan family in a Puritan land, he sympathised not only with the forms of mediæval art, but with all that is permanently good and true in all religious creeds and institutions. He personally aimed to realise the ideal of his own Theologian, and as one of our contemporaries of the Puritan school has happily expressed it, "whether he has found it more nearly reached by Catholic priest or Puritan minister—here or there—in the Acadia of Evangeline or the stern New England of his own ancestors—he has always welcomed the good man, and drawn a loving portrait of him, upon which all generations to come might rejoice to look."

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXVII.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

157. REV. DAVID DAVISON, M.A. (1825-58).—Successor of Dr. Abraham Rees at Jewin-street Chapel, and on Dr. Williams's Trust and the Presbyterian Board, of both which institutions he was for thirty-three years an eminently useful member, rendering special services to the schools, Scholarships, and Carmarthen College, for which he was so well qualified by his classical and literary attainments and the kindly interest he took in young students. As a minister he was not successful. Having resigned the pastoral office in 1840, when Jewin-street Chapel was closed, he spent three years in Germany for the education of his children in modern languages, and himself undertook heavy literary work. He translated from the German Professor Schlosser's "History of the Eighteenth Century," eight volumes, 1843-52; and from the French Coquerel's "Le Christianisme Expérimental," 1847, &c. He took very great interest in Carmarthen College, the annual examinations of which he conducted for a quarter of a century with great ability and marked advantage to the College. It was chiefly through his advocacy and efforts that the College was affiliated with the London University, and thus made the first institution in Wales from which students could graduate in Arts; and he was the chief means of greatly improving the efficiency and extending the benefits of Dr. Williams's Schools in their various localities. In the administration of the Trust, which is an old Presbyterian foundation, Mr. Davison was zealously faithful to the traditions and practice handed down by preceding generations of trustees. Long before his time they had widely departed from the religious opinions of their Presbyterian ancestors of the reign of Queen Anne, but they took an honourable pride in administering their funds with judicial fairness and impartiality. In that respect Mr. Davison was a pillar of strength in the Trust. In 1851 the Receivership became vacant, an office which in the judgment of his co-trustees ought to be held by one of themselves, in accordance with the will of the founder and the early practice of the Trust. It included the general management of the Trust affairs, the duties of treasurer and paymaster, and so much of the correspondence as was not assigned to the solicitor in his capacity of secretary (the secretaryship having long before been carved out of the Receivership for the purpose of securing the presence of a solicitor at the meetings of the trustees).

Mr. Davison undertook these duties with energy and pleasure, and discharged them with great satisfaction to his co-trustees, until ill-health compelled him to retire; he continued, however, to be trustee until his death. For a short time he was also secretary to the Presbyterian Board. He died on the 18th of December, 1858. Mr. Davison, who was an Irish Presbyterian minister, was for some time settled at Dundalk previous to 1825. His appointment as colleague of Dr. Abraham Rees was partly due to his Arian views, the profession of which he never altogether relinquished.

158. EDWARD BUSK, Esq. (1826-38).—Barrister-at-law and a bencher of the Middle Temple; the father of Henry W. Busk, Esq., barrister-at-law of Lincoln's-inn, and the elder son of Sir Wadsworth Busk, barrister-at-law, and Attorney-General for the Isle of Man, who was the youngest of the nine children of Jacob Hans Busk, of Leeds (a Swedish merchant, who was naturalised in this country by Act of Parliament in 1722), and his wife Rachel Wadsworth, grand-daughter, on her mother's side, of the Rev. Joshua Kirby, of New Inn, Oxford, who was one of two thousand confessors of 1662. Sir Wadsworth's Busk's eldest brother was Hans Busk, whose younger daughter, mentioned under No. 153 supra, married Richard Slate Milnes, Esq., of Fryston Hall, M.P. for Yorkshire. Edward Busk died September 26, 1838, and was succeeded in the Trust by his brother, Jacob Hans Busk, Esq.

159. REV. JOHN SCOTT PORTER (1827-32).—This distinguished Biblical scholar and divine was minister of Carter-lane Chapel from 1825 to 1832, then for forty-eight years minister of the First Presbyterian Congregation, Belfast; author of "Lectures on Homiletics and Preaching," 1835; "Lectures on Unitarianism," 1841; "Principles of Textual Criticism," 1848, &c., &c.; Professor of Biblical Criticism and Doctrinal Theology at Belfast for students connected with the Non-Subscribing Presbyterians. In a letter to the author of these notes, dated January 7, 1873, inclosing two photographs for the collection of portraits, Mr. Porter wrote:—"I need not say that I feel a melancholy pleasure in having a memorial of myself placed among those of the great and good men with whom I had the honour of being associated in the management of Dr. Williams's Trusts. Of that band I am, as you truly state, the last survivor; but although my connection with the body ceased forty years ago, I still recollect with pleasure and gratitude the instruction and delight which I experienced in the society of such men as Belsham, Aspland, Barclay, Fox, Davison, and others of kindred spirit; I ought not to omit special mention of Dr. Thomas Rees; a man whose varied stores of learning were always freely opened to me, and I believe to many others, whom he perceived to be animated by an honest desire for knowledge. Among the laymen, Esdaile and Towgood dwell permanently in my memory." He died on the 5th of July, 1880, aged seventy-eight years. In an obituary notice of him in The Northern Whig it is mentioned that he held "clear and distinct views on most subjects," and "never hesitated to express himself with force and candour. . . . The family of which he was the eldest son," it was added, "have all been distinguished;" and his four brothers are particularly named (one of whom, the Hon. Wm. Porter, was formerly Attorney-General at the Cape of Good Hope), and his eldest son, Andrew M. Porter, Esq., Q.C., M.P., the present Solicitor-General for Ireland.

160. JOSEPH YALLOWLEY, Esq. (1828).—Treasurer of Jewin-street Chapel, a member of the Presbyterian Board, and for many years an active member of the Court of Common Council of the City of London. He died suddenly Sept. 25, 1828, aged fifty-three years.

161. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, Esq. (1829-37).—Of Highbury. He took great pains to understand the several branches of the Trust, as appears by his carefully compiled notes, and was highly conscientious. Having discovered that a person to whom grants had been made on his recommendation was not a proper object, he insisted upon returning the money out of his own pocket. He resigned the Trust in 1837.

162. REV. THOMAS MADGE (1830-70).—Minister at the Old Presbyterian Chapel, Bury St. Edmunds (1810-11); of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich (1811-25); and of Essex-street Chapel, London (1825-59); Author of "Lectures on Puseyism," 1844. "The Relation of Miracles to Christianity," 1865; and numerous occasional sermons and other publications. On his retirement from the pulpit of Essex-street Chapel he was presented by his congregation with a substantial "Memorial of their grateful and affectionate remembrance" of him, "consisting of a purse and a silver salver, with an inscription in the words following:—"To the Rev. Thomas Madge, who faithfully for four and thirty years bore eloquent testimony to the truths of the Christian religion as minister of Essex-street Chapel, in worthy succession of three honoured labourers in the Church of Christ, Lindsey, Disney and Belsham. This memorial (with a thousand guineas) was presented on his retirement by the members of his congregation, in grateful acknowledgment of his public services, and as an expression of their affection for him as their personal friend, May, 1860." He died August 29, 1870, aged eighty-three years, and a memoir of him, by the Rev. Wm. James, was published in 1871.

LEICESTER: THE SUNDAY GATHERINGS.—The series of Sunday afternoon services at the Temperance Hall, which during the past winter have been conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, was brought to a close on Sunday week, and as a wind up of the meetings a social gathering of those interested took place on the following Tuesday evening. A public tea was held, of which upwards of eight hundred partook. A number of greenhouse and other plants in bloom adorned the tables, which were presided over by ladies of the Great Meeting congregation, and the front of the platform was also enlivened by a number of flowers and ferns. After tea a capital programme of music was gone through, the choir, the band, whose services have been engaged at the Sunday afternoon meetings, and a number of ladies and gentlemen assisting in making the evening a highly enjoyable one. During the proceedings the Rev. J. Page Hopps briefly addressed the assemblage on the work of the past season. The work from the commencement had been a serious one. They had not been sensational, but success had attended their efforts. They adopted no sensational means for getting people together, nor for maintaining their interest. They had tried to keep their hymn-book from everything sectarian and dogmatic, and such as no one could object to, and he thought the hymns used at the Sunday afternoon meetings might be sung in any church or religious assembly in the world. He thought also they had found a universal religion at those meetings. They had found what was true for the good Catholic, true for the good Protestant, for the good Unitarian, the good Unitarian, and, if they would only believe it, true for the good Secularist. They had found the old religion of the Sermon on the Mount, of the Lord's Prayer, the religion of humanity, of daily life and work, and daily faithfulness to one's ideal of what was right and good. That was what he called a universal religion. The moment they shut the door of sectarian dogma they opened the door of humanity. They had also been trying to break down all bigotry. They had done it, not by denouncing bigotry, but by trying to set up an ideal of what would be the very opposite of bigotry. Referring to the financial part of the undertaking, the rev. gentleman said that those attending the meetings had, by their pence given at the collections, subscribed nearly £50 during the season, and the expenses amounted to about £80, but he entertained no fear of being enabled to raise the £30. As regarded the next season, if it was the desire of the congregation, he hoped to be able to continue the services, a suggestion that was met by energetic affirmative cries. In conclusion, Mr. Hopps urged those who had been in the habit of attending the gatherings to continue the custom of going to some place of worship—to the churches or chapels in the town where they found that which best suited their wants. A most successful and pleasant evening terminated by the singing of a hymn, in which the vast audience heartily joined.

READING.—On Sunday evening the Rev. R. R. Suffield preached on "The Joys and Benefits of Literature," the offertory (which amounted to £4 14s. 3d.) being devoted to the Free Library and Town Hall Buildings Fund. The rev. gentleman took for his text Ecclesiasticus xxvi. 14, "There is nothing so much worth as a mind well instructed"; and Eccles. xxv. 3, "If thou hast gathered nothing in thy youth, how canst thou find anything in thine age?"

A second and enlarged edition of Mr. Edwin Hatch's Bancroft Lectures, "The Organisation of the Early Christian Churches," will now come out.

THE AIM OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL, AND HOW TO ATTAIN IT.

[The following paper was read by Miss ANNA SWANWICK at the meeting at the Portland British School last Saturday evening.]

It was with extreme diffidence that I accepted the invitation to address you on the present occasion; so many years have elapsed since I ceased to be a Sunday-school teacher, a vocation which I relinquished with great regret, that it seems presumptuous on my part to address those whose experience is so much fresher than my own.

Remembering, however, that the Conference which will follow the address forms the principal feature of this evening's gathering, and that full opportunity will there be afforded for the expression of individual opinions, I am in some measure relieved from the painful feeling of responsibility with which I entered on my task, and am fain to express the heartfelt pleasure with which I find myself once more among this earnest band of workers in one of the noblest causes which can engage the energies of the philanthropists. Before bringing under your notice what appears to me to be the special function of the Sunday-school, it may be desirable to dwell briefly upon the significance of Sunday itself, the true appreciation of which is of vital importance to the highest well-being of the community. We shall, I imagine, all agree that the main object of human existence is the development of mind, the training of men and women to the recognition of their true dignity as children of the Living God. Of the two elements which constitute human life, labour and rest, the former to the vast majority of mankind is the inevitable condition of existence; this being the case, we must needs recognise that work, when not in excess, is, under the providence of God, one of the most potent agents in the education of the human race, and very noble are the virtues which are cultivated in the school of toil—industry, patience, perseverance, self-denial, self-control, and many others; nevertheless, were this the only side of life, many of our noblest faculties and affections would remain undeveloped. Most grateful, therefore, should we be for the institution of the day of rest, when the toiling millions leaving the factory and the forge, the counter and the workshop, and putting aside their implements of toil, may feel that they are not merely daily labourers for daily bread, but rational beings, say rather, immortal souls, endowed with affections and capacities which work alone can never satisfy. We doubtless owe a debt of gratitude to the Puritans for impressing a sacred character upon the seventh day; the obligation is, however, greatly diminished by the exclusive character which that sacredness assumed.

With their blind reverence for the letter of Scripture, together with their fatal misconception as to the antagonism subsisting between the spiritual and the natural worlds, they transformed the day of rest into a season of idleness, the ennui of which was relieved only by the services of religion. It may be doubted whether the triumph of their narrow Sabbatarianism would not be more inimical to the highest interests of humanity than that of their anti-Sabbatarian opponents, who, regarding Sunday not as a holiday, but simply as a holiday, would ignore the religious element, and allow all forms of amusement to compete for popular favour. As opposed to both these views, we shall probably all agree that Sunday should be not only a day of rest, refreshing alike to body and to soul, but also a season for the exercise of the devout affections, and for the cultivation of those higher faculties and aspirations which, amid the noise and bustle of the world, are, for the most part, suffered to lie dormant. We are enjoined "to love the Lord our God," not only with all our heart and with all our soul," but also "with all our mind and with all our strength," remembering what high, capacious powers lie folded up in man, which too often exist only in embryo, we cannot doubt that their development is essential to enable the soul to enter, as it were, into the infinitude of God, which constitutes the highest prerogative of His children; when we consider, moreover, the munificent provision which the Great Father has made for the enjoyment of His children, it must needs grieve His Holy Spirit to witness the brute unconscious gaze too often cast, by creatures so richly endowed, upon this glorious Universe.

Now, the special function of the Sunday-school appears to me to prepare our pupils for the true enjoyment and worthy employment of their day of rest, which constitutes no small proportion of our mortal lives. Hence religion, under its more joyous aspects, should, in my judgment, be its presiding genius. In accordance with this view an effort should be made to render school arrangements, as far as possible, attractive to the pupils; and thus special attention ought, I think, to be given to music, for which many children have a natural love. If trained to take part in a Sunday-school choir, the delight which they would take in the psalmody would extend to their homes, and become there a purifying and elevating influence. Flowers, like music, I regard as among the most precious gifts of Infinite Love; they continue to be a source of the purest delight and refreshment in age, while in childhood, as the poet says, "Daisies and buttercups gladden our sight like treasures of silver and gold." When possible, during the season, these precious treasures might with advantage be employed occasionally for the adornment of the school-room, and afterwards be distributed among the children on leaving school; another purifying influence would thus, through their agency, be extended to their homes.

Having had no experience in teaching the younger classes in Sunday schools, I must leave this branch of our subject to the speakers who will follow me, and will dwell briefly upon the objects at which I aimed with my classes of elder boys and girls—I may rather say, of young men and young women—expressing, at the same time, my painful sense of the inadequacy of my efforts.

Foremost amongst the agencies at our command for fostering the religious sentiment stands of course the Bible, my love and admiration of which has grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength. I am aware of the difficulties which modern criticism has introduced into the teaching of Scripture. The wise course, it appears to me, is not to ignore these difficulties, above all to be perfectly truthful in the expression of our convictions, but at the same time to dwell most emphatically upon those portions of the sacred narrative which are most pregnant with moral and religious truth.

The history of the Jews, as unfolded by modern scholars, such as Milman, Ewald, Dean Stanley, and others, is a narrative so deeply interesting, so full of pictorial and biographical detail, that teachers who make it their theme will, I imagine, find little difficulty in awakening and maintaining the interest of their class. The same may be said of the life of Jesus, the exhibition of whose character, as the moral image of the great Father, should, in my judgment, be an object of primary importance to all Sunday-school teachers. They will also, as a matter of course, bring prominently before their class the grand figure of St. Paul, together with the main features of his epistles.

The importance of Biblical study as an element of Sunday-school teaching, however, is so universally recognised that I will not dwell upon the subject at greater length; I will only add that instruction upon these great themes should, I think, as far as possible, be made attractive and delightful; it is also desirable that some definite lesson should on each Sunday be brought home to the minds of the class and imprinted on their memory. This object I endeavoured to secure by preparing a brief epitome of the lesson of the day, which, at its conclusion, my pupils wrote from dictation. I also prepared a few written copies of questions, which several of my pupils liked to take home, and to which they brought written answers on the following Sunday, which were considered before entering upon the topic of the day.

I turn now to another subject, which appears to me to be peculiarly suitable to Sunday-school teaching, appealing as it does to our highest sentiments and aspirations; I allude to poetry. We can, I imagine, hardly realise the benefit which would be conferred upon the working classes by inspiring them with a genuine love for poetry; as by the stroke of an enchanter's wand, the poet opens to us an ideal world, wherein, raised above the dusty thoroughfares of ordinary life, we breathe a serene and a purer atmosphere. The delight thus experienced bears witness to the element of infinity in the human soul, which, being immortal, rejoices in the awakening of its diviner instincts. Poetry, moreover, by depicting the scenes of nature and of life, interprets for us the divine drama of the universe, and under this aspect also becomes the handmaid of religion. This view of poetry has been so admirably set forth by an eloquent writer that I may perhaps be excused for quoting his words:—"Poetry," he says, "is not only a creation of the human mind, but a power like one of Nature's; it speaks to men as the winds and ocean speak; it moves them as the beauty of evening moves them; and makes them thrill, as does the thunder in the tempest, with a sense of grandeur; it softens, soothes and blesses, as the quiet of the stars in the ripple of water; for the poet is the living voice of nature, as he is the expressing voice of man."

It is, moreover, my belief that the ideal forms which haunt the imagination have a far more powerful effect in forming the character, especially in youth, than truths which address themselves more directly to the intellect. I have had some gratifying proofs that my faith in the power of poetry to stir the deeper springs of feeling in the human heart is not unfounded.

I once took a class of young women through the poems of Milton, associated with a brief sketch of his life. Some time afterwards I was told that I was wanted, and on going down stairs, I found one of my former pupils with a perambulator; she told me that since she last saw me she had been married, and had gone to reside at some distance, adding that her chief object in coming to see me was to thank me for having taught her to love poetry, especially "Comus," because, having now a little girl of her own, she could teach her to love poetry also. Most fervently, therefore, do I respond to the sentiment embodied in the following lines of Wordsworth:—

"Blessings be with them and eternal praise
Who gave us nobler loves and nobler cares—
The Poets, who on earth have made us heirs
Of truth and pure delight by heavenly lays."

There is another topic peculiarly suited to Sunday-school teaching, upon which I would fain dwell. I allude to biography. Lives of the Great and Good have been called the rungs of the ladder by which we ascend to God. The glorious company of men and women whose pure and holy lives have helped to establish on earth the Kingdom of Heaven, are a precious heritage, bequeathed to us by every age and every clime, and form one of the most powerful agencies for educating the conscience of mankind.

We hear much in the present day of the "decay of deference," of the respect paid to rank and social position, a legacy bequeathed to us by the feudal age; this process will doubtless continue with the changed conditions of society which characterise the present day; most earnestly do I hope that it may be accompanied by a corresponding growth of that genuine politeness which is the natural outcome of the Apostolic injunction, "Honour all Men," and which ought to be most sedulously cultivated in the Sunday-school. This decay of deference, which cannot, I imagine, be wholly arrested, renders it the more imperative that we should cultivate reverence towards those who are truly worthy of reverence, and hence, in my judgment, the extreme importance of inspiring in the young a taste for biography.

How fully this feeling was shared by the late Dean Stanley may be seen by the following incident:—A lady having undertaken to distribute the prizes to the successful pupils in one of the high schools, Dean Stanley kindly promised to support her. In doing so he related that a lady in America had informed a clergyman, a friend of his, that she objected to her daughter learning the catechism, because she was there enjoined "to behave herself lowly and reverently to her betters." The lady did not consider that her daughter had any betters, and on this ground her objection was founded. "Now," observed Dean Stanley, "I do not at all sympathise with this lady; on the contrary, I hold that we ought all to behave ourselves lowly and reverently to our betters; to some of these you will now be introduced; you will receive the works of Shakespeare, of Milton, and of other great men, towards whom we must all behave ourselves lowly and reverently."

The History of Christianity—a subject which I found attractive to a class of youths—forms a valuable framework for biography, independently of the lessons of which it may be the medium. Other passages of history might with advantage be made subservient to the same end,

One of the great lessons which I am anxious to enforce this evening, in opposition to the narrow Puritan notion of the antagonism subsisting between the natural and the spiritual worlds is, that religion will not exert her legitimate influence till she asserts her claim to direct every department of human life, and, consequently, till it is recognised that all knowledge may be hallowed by being devoted to her service.

All who have had the privilege of attending the lectures of the late Professor Faraday will remember how with him science became religious; his whole soul seemed so impressed with a sense of the immediate presence of the Great Being whose laws, as manifested in the material Universe, it was his object to expound, that he unconsciously raised his hearers to the same high level of thought. In the present day, when science occupies so large a share of public attention, it seems to me to be important that it should be brought before the minds of the young under its more sacred aspects. Accordingly, should any Sunday-school teacher feel impelled to teach his class the rudiments of science, if his lessons are in harmony with the spirit of the sacred day, I, for my part, should consider that he was doing a good work. The injunction, "Consider the lilies how they grow," might be urged to justify a botanical Sunday-school class.

How deeply the scientific mind may be imbued with the religious sentiment is strikingly exhibited in the closing words of the diary of Ampère, whose discoveries in the higher mathematics and in electricity entitle him to rank with Newton and Faraday. "Work," he writes, "in the spirit of prayer. Study the things of this world, . . . but contemplate them only with one eye; let the other eye be constantly fixed upon the light eternal. Listen to the voice of the sages, but listen to them only with one ear; let the other be always ready to receive the sweet accents of the voice of thy celestial friend. . . . Write only with one hand; with the other grasp the garment of God, as a child clings to the garment of his father. . . . Let my soul henceforth remain thus united to God and to Jesus Christ. Bless me, my God."

We must all recognise how little direct instruction, in any department of knowledge, can be communicated during the comparatively brief period of school-day intercourse.

The aim of all true teachers will be to stimulate the minds of their pupils, to inspire a love for the good, the beautiful, and the true, and to awaken the appetite for more ample knowledge which books can alone appease. "In the best books," to quote the words of Channing, "Great men talk with us, give us their most precious thoughts, pour their souls into our souls;" if we can succeed in leading our pupils to appreciate these priceless treasures, and to take real delight in making their acquaintance we shall have conferred upon them an inestimable boon.

I have reserved to the last what I regard as the most important function of the Sunday-school, namely, to inspire our pupils, together with the thirst for knowledge, with the desire to become teachers themselves; to make them feel that to be fellow-workers with God in establishing his kingdom upon earth is the highest privilege of his children. It was the consciousness of this high vocation which transformed the fishermen of Galilee into apostles and martyrs, and some humble spark of that sacred fire, kindled in the hearts of working men and working women would, I believe, shed a glory over their lives, and impart a dignity to their ordinary avocations, which could be derived from no other source.

I have thus very imperfectly indicated some of the objects which, in my judgment, ought to be aimed at in the Sunday-school; the discussion which will now take place will, I trust, throw light upon the most effectual means for their accomplishment.

PROFESSOR KUENEN has chosen for the subject of his Hibbert Lectures "National Religions and Universal Religions," and they will be delivered as before in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, the first being on April 25th. Professor Kuenen has consented to deliver the lectures also at Oxford, and he will lecture in English.

Occasional Notes.

ON Tuesday 'Sir A. Gordon succeeded, with the approval of the Government, in gaining a Select Committee of the House to inquire into the law which authorises the demanding of mortuary fees, and into the ecclesiastical fees levied by ministers of religion upon the occasion of burials, and the erection of monuments in cemeteries and parish churchyards; and to report to that House whether any legislation is desirable with a view to their regulation and reduction. It appears that as far back as the time of Henry VIII. an Act was passed prohibiting the clergy from taking higher burial fees than those prescribed by the Act, which range in different parishes from 1s. 6d. to £1 3s., while in regard to memorial and monumental charges, the clergyman has the power of making any charge he thought proper. It need hardly be added that although the clergy as a rule are not mercenary, this power has often been greatly abused under the influence of party spirit. Had not Mr. Osborne Morgan stated it as a fact, we should hardly have thought it possible that there are some clergymen who used the fees as a screw to compel burial with the Church service instead of under the new Burials Act. The way in which the clergyman did this, according to the same high authority, was to say, "If you have the burial according to my service the fee will be 5s., but if you have it under the Burials Act the fee will be £5." Every sensible person, whether Churchman or Nonconformist, will agree with Mr. Osborne Morgan that "it is desirable in the interests of the clergy as well as the public that such things should be impossible." A clergyman is professedly a Christian, and presumably a gentleman. He is neither when he misuses his influence for purposes of extortion and ecclesiastical domination. In such a case as that mentioned above he ought to be publicly stigmatised as a swindler.

LAST week a curious incident occurred in the City of London during the hearing of a case in which a Parsee gentleman was called as a witness. He objected to be sworn either on the Old or New Testament, and not being a Mohammedan, he could not be sworn on the Koran. He mentioned, however, that he had a sacred relic about his person as a charm, and he thought by making a declaration, and holding the relic in his hand, and not concealing it, the act would be binding upon his conscience. Mr. Commissioner Kerr said under the peculiar circumstances he would be justified in taking the witness's declaration, if at the same time he held the charm unconcealed in his hand, and declared that he would consider the act sufficiently binding upon him to bear true testimony in the matter at issue. He always understood, however, that a Parsee was usually sworn holding the tail of a cow, which was a sacred animal in India.—That last remark is very suggestive, but our instinctive British reverence for noble Lords and honourable gentlemen prevents us from even hinting the name of the animal by holding the tail of which some of them might not inappropriately take the present parliamentary oath, and probably the oath so administered would be quite as solemn and quite as binding on some elastic consciences.

It is not all impossible that at no distant period a Parsee—who, as a fellow subject, is quite entitled to the honour—may be elected a member of the House of Commons. We may then have the remarkable spectacle of some bucolic gentleman guiding a cow to the table under serious difficulties, in order that the honourable member may take the oath holding on to its tail with due solemnity. Two questions will then arise—supposing that the cow is got to the table. Will a British cow answer the purpose as effectually as an Indian cow? And if it should be decided after prolonged and animated debates that an Indian cow is indispensable, a second question will arise: Supposing that a native Indian cow is imported for the purpose, will the sanctity it undoubtedly possesses for the Parsee conscience on Indian soil be transmitted with the animal to British soil? We can conceive that both these important questions would give rise to interminable debates, quite as intricate and instructive, and involving as many important constitutional considerations as the recent Bradlaugh discussions. There would be one inestimable advantage. It would be quite impossible for the honourable Parsee to steal a march on the Speaker and the House, because the indispensable cow could not be got to the table surreptitiously.

POSSIBLY if Mr. Bradlaugh could have produced some sacred relic which he regarded as a "charm" he might, like the Parsee, have been allowed to be sworn. But Mr. Bradlaugh we fancy is not a relic-hunter, and so unbelief is shut out where the grossest superstition is free to enter, although Bacon said, "It were better to have no opinion of God at all than such an opinion as is unworthy of him;" and again, "the similitude of superstition to religion makes it the more deformed."

ON Monday the Record published its last number in its present form. Yesterday it appeared as a weekly paper, instead of three times a-week, and in an altered garb. In the course of an interesting retrospect of its fifty years' career, it refers to its manifold services to the Evangelical party, its long and persistent conflict with Ritualist and Sacerdotal forms of error in all their various stages; and adds the following passage, which has special interest for our readers:—"The Broad Church errors tending directly to substitute Rationalism for Revelation, and to deny the divine inspiration and authority of Holy Scripture always seemed more subtle, and even more dangerous, than Ritualism. Against these in every form the Record therefore waged war, although careful to make a difference between those errors which directly assail the foundations of the faith, and those which only tend in that direction. The Neologian "tendencies" of Hare, Arnold, Bunsen, Coleridge, Maurice, Frederick Robertson, Stopford Brooke, Voysey, Jowett, Stanley, and the Essayists and Reviewers were all successfully canvassed and exposed, but we have always welcomed the thought that some, like Arnold and Coleridge, appeared to advance nearer and nearer to truth, whilst others, like Maurice and Frederick Robertson, seemed to be oppressed by a morbid constitutional idiosyncrasy which disturbed their judgment; so that whilst we were bound more or less to condemn their writings, we were happily relieved from the duty of sitting in judgment on the writers." That last sentence really is a "sign of grace," and shows that the Record is improving in her old age. Poor old grandmotherly Record, she little knows how much she has done to promote both the Ritualist and the Broad Church movements!

THE Pall Mall Gazette, referring to the "Tom Collins" episode in the House of Commons yesterday week, says:—"A member of the House of Commons made a public profession of his faith in the doctrine of the Trinity, and the House, instead of being edified, was convulsed with laughter. Yet the occasion was hardly one for merriment if the conventional cant about the peril of admitting atheists to the Legislature possessed the least reality. Sir Wilfrid Lawson's attempt to catechise the newly elected member for Knaresborough had given rise to a 'reasonable suspicion' that Mr. Collins was an atheist in disguise. Whereupon a vigilant and orthodox public overwhelms the suspected atheist with an avalanche of letters, inquisitorial and minatory, to escape a continuance of which he stood up last night and declared his readiness 'to declare his belief in the Nicene or in the words of the Athanasian Creed.' Instead of welcoming this conclusive refutation of the grave charge brought against one of its members, the House laughed so consumedly that Mr. Collins could hardly get a hearing. The scene affords a fitting pendant to the reception of Lord Redesdale's Bill in the other House, and aptly illustrates the hollowness and hypocrisy of the prevailing outcry against Mr. Bradlaugh's unbelief." It was hardly, by the way, Mr. Collins's profession of belief in the Trinity that the House laughed at, but the hon. member's profession of his readiness to formulate and expound his faith in the terms of the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds, which is quite a different thing. A layman in these days professing serious acceptance of these creeds seems to be thought quite a ludicrous spectacle.

THE Charity Organisation Society are about to bring out a useful work. It is called the "Charities' Register and Digest," being a classified register of charities in, or available for, the metropolis, and a digest of information respecting the legal, voluntary, and other means for the prevention and relief of distress and the improvement of the condition of the poor. There is a preface upon the administration of charity and the legal provision made by the Poor Law and other authorities for the relief of the poor and afflicted. The information required in connection with charitable work by the public generally, district visitors, and almoners will be given in regard to the local authorities in the metropolis, the School Board, reformatory and industrial schools, institutions for inebriates, &c. In an appendix there are particulars regarding benevolent and friendly societies, trade societies, savings banks, servants' registries, &c.

DR. WALTER C. SMITH, the Free Churchman, in addressing an audience of students last week on "Progress in Theology," protested against the notion of finality in theological science. Theology was bound to move with the other sciences, and the supreme law of all science was the law of growth. He did not believe radical beliefs would be affected by the critical investigations of the future, though some things at present deemed highly important might have to be discarded. The ethical idea of God would in time to come dominate the metaphysical conception of Him. God's fatherhood would be more to us than His sovereignty. His love would control His power.

THE REV. PAXTON HOOD has been the medium for the presentation to Harvard University of a gift from Mr. John Hargraves, of Liverpool, of a picture by one of the most illustrious of old English artists, "Old Crome." The picture has a noticeable interest; it came into the possession of Mr. Hargraves from Miss Mather—believed to be the last representative in England of the family of Increase and Cotton Mather. Richard Mather, the father and ancestor of the Mather family, was for some time master of Toxteth Grammar School, near Liverpool, and an oak tree, planted, it is believed, by him, stood in the park of Mr. Hargraves. It had to be cut down, and from it he had an elegant frame made, in which he placed the picture which is now, through his generosity, the property of the University. The picture presented to Harvard is one of the most pleasing illustrations of the style of "Old Crome," so called to distinguish him from his son, who attained to some eminence as a painter in water-colours.

THE New York Express has the following encouraging Prophecy:—

When lawyers fail to take a fee,
And juries never disagree;
When politicians are content,
And landlords don't collect their rent;
When naughty children all die young,
And girls are born without a tongue;
When preachers cut their sermons short,
And all folks to the church resort;
When back subscribers all have paid,
And editors have fortunes made;
Such happiness will sure portend
This world must soon come to an end.

MR. TENNYSON, replying to a Good Templar remonstrance against the invitation to repeated drinking in his new national song, explains that the "common cup" has in all ages been employed as a symbol of unity, and it is only in reference to that symbol that he has used the word "drink."

A RETURN has been issued, which shows that of a total population in Scotland of 3,735,536, those who speak Gaelic number 231,602. The three greatest Gaelic-speaking counties are Inverness (60,447), Ross and Cromarty (56,767), and Argyll (50,113).

In a review of "The Two Mills," the Daily News stated that, at a time when he could ill afford it, J. S. Mill assisted Mr. Herbert Spencer in publishing one of his books. The latter thus states the actual facts:—"When, after having for many years continued to lose by my works, I issued with one of the serial numbers of the 'System of Philosophy' a note of cessation, I received a letter from Mr. Mill expressing his concern, and proposing, in the first place, to raise a fund to reimburse me, and, in the second place to guarantee my publisher against loss if I would continue. These generous offers—the more generous because on some cardinal questions we were at variance—I felt unable to accept, and, fully recognising the nobility of feeling which prompted them, wrote to decline."

IN Canada and the United States the freedom of the Pew asserts itself in peculiar ways. A Canadian Court has just decided that a pew-owner has a right to sleep in church and to snore should he see fit, without being molested in these privileges. An American Court recently decided that a man had a right to put his feet upon the back of the next pew to that owned by himself if he felt so disposed.

THOMAS PARGETER'S (OF FOXCOTE) CHARITY.—The annual meeting of the trustees of this Charity was held at Messrs. Harding and Son's offices, Birmingham, on March 20; the Rev. W. Carey Walters in the chair. The other trustees present were the Revs. C. Clarke, W. Cochrane, H. Eachus, M. Gibson, D. Maginnis, H. McKean, and James Taplin. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—The Rev. W. Carey Walters, Chairman; the Rev. M. Gibson, Vice-Chairman; the Chairman and the Rev. H. Eachus, Auditors; Mr. Joseph Beattie, Treasurer; and Mr. Charles Harding, Secretary. The business was principally formal. The vacancies which have occurred since the last annual meeting from deaths, and in one case owing to an annuitant having voluntarily relinquished her annuity in consequence of her improved circumstances, have from time to time been supplied. The number of annuitants is one hundred, ninety-two of whom receive £20 a-year each, and the remaining eight, being sisters, £16 each. No vacancy exists. The number of applicants on the books is large. It is interesting to add that the trustees placed on their annuity list Miss Alice Bronte, aunt of Charlotte Bronte, of more than eighty years of age, who was recently found by the Dean of Dromore in a most destitute condition. Attention was drawn to her case by a correspondent of the Christian World, and it was warmly taken up by the Rev. David Maginnis, one of the trustees.

WALSALL.—In September last we reported the improvements and alterations in the interior of the Unitarian Chapel, Stafford-street, Walsall. These were accomplished at a cost of about £85, towards which, after the school debt had been paid, £50 had been left by the bazaar held last summer, leaving £35 still to be obtained. For the reduction or extinction of this debt a sale of work was held in the school-room on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. On Tuesday night there was a sacred concert in the chapel. All the pieces were remarkably well executed, and several of the soloists received encores. At the conclusion of the concert the sales at the stalls began, and were continued for the rest of the evening. On Wednesday evening the attendance was much better, and an excellent miscellaneous concert was given. The gross receipts of the sale was about £30, which is fully as much as any of the friends were expecting to reach. Thus this little working class congregation, with the generous assistance of friends outside them, have, during the last year and a half, expended about £225 upon their school and chapel, and raised it all, with the exception of about £10.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.—A numerously attended evening party and conversazione in connection with this society was held on Thursday evening, at the Freemasons' Tavern, and was preceded by a meeting under the presidency of Mr. Burt, M.P. In opening the proceedings, the Chairman referred to the resolution about to be submitted to the House of Commons by Mr. Howard, affirming the advisability of opening the public museums and galleries on Sunday. From the opinions he had heard expressed on every side he felt justified in anticipating that the present House would adopt the resolution, and he did not believe that in such a case the House of Lords would reject it. He believed that the spread of education and the prevalence of broader views would enable them speedily to achieve success.—A resolution in support of Mr. Howard's motion was then adopted, on the motion of Mr. Westlake, Q.C., supported by Mr. James Heywood and Mr. S. C. Evans Williams, M.P.

AMHERST COLLEGE, MASSACHUSETTS, was destroyed by fire on Wednesday. The loss is estimated at 250,000 dols.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The following is a list of the Delegates to the National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian, and other Non-Subscribing Churches, to be held at Liverpool on the 18th, 19th and 20th April, 1882, so far as it is yet complete. Any errors and omissions will be made good on application to the Secretary of the Conference, the Rev. A. W. Worthington, Old Swinford, Stourbridge. The names of ministers are not inserted, unless appointed as sole delegates by some congregation or Association. It may be understood that the ministers of almost every congregation mentioned, and many more, will be present:—

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD at their weekly meeting on Thursday resumed the debate on higher elementary education. After voting for an amendment referring the matter back for the School Management Committee to draw up a scheme for the establishment of higher elementary schools, another amendment was proposed, and the debate was again adjourned. The Board adjourned over Easter, till the 20th April.

THE Wyclif Society is now fairly started. Its object is to publish for the first time in history the complete works of John Wyclif at subscription of one guinea per annum.

Reviews.

The Religions of India. By A. Barth. Authorised Translation by the Rev. J. Wood. London: Trübner and Co. 1882.

English readers owe Mr. Trübner a debt of gratitude for including this volume in his Oriental Series. In its original form, M. Barth's treatise appeared as an article in M. Lichtenberger's "Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses." It was then issued as a separate work, enriched with numerous and valuable notes; and is now presented in an English dress, to secure, we hope, the interest of a larger circle than the special students of comparative religion. M. Barth has taken the opportunity of a fresh edition to prefix a useful introduction, defining more explicitly than was possible, under previous conditions, the scope and conception of his design. In this preface he partly disposes, by anticipation, of certain criticisms which his title might excite. For instance, he confines himself to an exhibition of the successive phases of the Aryan religions. Here is at once an immense limitation. It excludes the whole question of the popular religions among the races occupying different parts of India, whose beliefs and usages are still living in the village communities of the present day. These have had no literary expression; their history, therefore, remains unknown; but it can hardly be doubted that they often influenced the forms of Aryan faith and worship which were introduced among them. Of this, however, M. Barth can give only an occasional hint; and it would have rendered his exposition, we think, in every way clearer, if he had more distinctly enunciated from the beginning (by way of historical preamble beyond the remarks in p. xix.), the broad difference between the religion of the conquering Aryans and the religions of the peoples they subdued. His preface, however, contains a valuable hint as to the probable existence outside what may be called the literary religion of the Aryans, of a wider range of popular superstitions shared by the tribes whose priests may have produced the Vedic hymns. M. Barth implies that on this subject he has somewhat repressed the statement of his own belief, in deference to the consensus of opinion among modern scholars. It is the misfortune of studies so special as Vedic lore that they have tended to shut the larger considerations of anthropology out of view. M. Barth, however, comes to his task with the equipment of a broad general culture as well as of technical scholarship, and we regret that in such a matter as this he should not have given his philosophical instincts free play. Again, a treatise on the "Religions of India" might have been expected to contain some account of Indian Mohammedanism. The circumstances of its introduction, the causes of its spread, the nature of its triumphs over different forms of native faith, their mutual influence and interaction, would have furnished abundant material of the highest interest. But for this subject, likewise, we look in vain. We have, indeed, sketches here and there of the efforts made by occasional prophets, such as Kabir or Chaitanya, to preach a religion which by its doctrine of Monotheism and its high moral purity might embrace both Hindu and Mohammedan alike. The larger theme, however, is untouched. M. Barth may, perhaps, assume in his readers a sufficient knowledge of Indian history to enable them to supply such a want. But with respect to the average Englishman, such an assumption is grievously wide of the mark.

These omissions, however, do not prevent this book from taking rank at once as in every way the best treatise on religion among the Hindus within such short compass. In the enormous range which it traverses—from the Vedas to Keshub Chunder Sen and the Brahma Samāj, it is possible that one movement or another may receive less attention than specialists may claim for it. In particular, the chapter devoted to Buddhism appears to us disproportionately cramped, considering the immense part it played for nearly a thousand years in the Peninsula, and still plays among the faiths of Asia. But M. Barth's work has this conspicuous merit: it is penetrated by the sense of the unity of the story which it has to unfold. It recognises the roots of different phases of belief and practice deep in human nature; and it discerns that the systems of successive ages are not elaborated out of nothing, but prevail only because they seem more or less to correspond with facts. Each fresh development springs out of the conditions that preceded it, as new minds introduce new thought to operate on the scene presented to them. So M. Barth passes from the Vedas to the Brāhmanas, from the Brāhmanas to the Upanishads, and from the Upanishads to Buddhism, without ever letting go the clues which link them each to each. In the same way, when he comes to describe the rise of the great Śaivite and Vishnuite religions after the decline of Buddhism, he suggestively remarks that something akin to these had probably existed all along among the people: or that at least their fundamental elements were far older than the late period at which they acquired predominance. The vast number of different movements which come successively upon the scene, their intricate relations and their manifold divergences, are thus to a great extent harmonised and combined; and it is this quality in M. Barth's book which so well fits it to serve as a general introduction to the study of the separate episodes of the great drama of Hindu faith. Further investigation may modify this or that conclusion; suggestions here or there may turn out unsupported; but, meantime, a conception of the subject as a whole has been offered to the reader's mind, and supplies the necessary framework for the readjustment of details.

Among the lines of interest which such a book opens up few persons will fail to note the extraordinary parallels which Indian thought continually presents to European. When first its treasures of speculation were revealed, historians were not slow to discover among its philosophical schools counterparts to the Platonic and Aristotelean types. The resemblances between the legends of Gotama Buddha and incidents of the Gospel story have led over and over again to positive assertions of the ultimate obligations of the Evangelists to the great teacher of the Ganges; while in the figure of Krishna critics have seen the reflection of Christ. The parallels of miracle and myth are in the highest degree instructive, though in M. Barth's book they can receive but scanty elaboration. But it is perhaps more surprising to find among the religious sects of Hinduism controversies precisely analogous to those which have again and again agitated Christendom. Yet our surprise vanishes as we remember that the elements of the soul's life can nowhere greatly vary, and that corresponding realities of experience must constantly tend to shape themselves in corresponding forms. Dr. Hunter, in his delightful work on Orissa, pointed out the resemblance of the teachings of Chaitanya (born 1485 A.D.), concerning the love of God to the Quietism of Madame Guyon; and M. Barth supplies an even more remarkable instance à propos of the doctrine of grace.

"We have already seen the opposite interpretations to which this doctrine was subjected in the metaphysics of givism. We meet with the same diversity of view, only still more pronounced, among the adherents of Vishnuism. All Vaishnavas ascribe in the main" the initiative in grace to God. In incarnating himself the Deity anticipates human weakness, and the theory of the Avatāras presupposes that of exterior operations of grace, or preventent grace. But on the question of interior operations of grace they are divided, some recognising here only the irresistible and free action of God, others admitting the co-operation of man in the work of salvation. It was especially among the sects that arose out of the reform of Rāmānuja that this controversy assumed such importance. Agreeably to Hindu habits of thought, each opinion was formulated in a figurate argument. Those on the one side appealed to the argument from the cat; God, they said, seizes the soul and saves it, just as a cat carries away its little ones far from danger. Those on the other side appealed to the argument from the monkey; the soul, they said, seizes hold of God and saves itself by him, just as the young of the monkey escapes from danger by clinging on to the side of its mother. These questions gave rise to many others: How can God, if he is just and good, resolve to choose? How, if he is all-powerful, can there be an action outside of his? Are faith and grace, when

* We cannot think this a happy rendering of the French au fond. Surely the meaning is not that the initiative in most cases lay with God, while there were some in which it did not, but that in all cases the initiative lay ultimately with him, no matter what secondary channels it might pass through.

once obtained, capable of being forfeited? From these questions, but for the tinge of local colouring, we could sometimes fancy ourselves transported into the heart of the Western world, and in the midst of controversies between Arminians and Gomarists. But we are very soon brought back into India when we see that this grace is immediately personified in Lakshmi or Rādhā, and that the very theologians who discuss these positions are often in close affinity with the gāktas."—P. 226 sq.

This striking passage must speak for itself; but to the student of the Christian schools it is assuredly an impressive fact that beneath the often grotesque shapes of Indian religion the same spiritual needs should clamour for fulfilment, and the same problems of the inner life demand solution which he has encountered under conditions so remote. It can hardly fail to add fresh interest to disputes which we are too apt to look upon as barren, to find them thus turning up in unexpected forms.

Many other topics offer themselves for remark; but we must take leave of M. Barth, grateful for the completeness with which he traces his main theme through the reforming sects of the last five centuries down to the present day. The English translation reads sufficiently easily, but is not free from occasional awkwardness; for instance, on the very same page (125) one sentence ends with the words "had only to practice its," and another clause begins "it was it which in all probability," &c. The book is admirably printed, great care having been taken with the transliteration of Hindu names. An excellent index has been added, for which we are probably indebted to the translator; perhaps in another edition he may supply some clue to the progress of the story by more varied page-headings. The appropriate dedication to Dr. Muir reminds us how serious a loss the investigations of comparative religion have just sustained by his death; for where will students find another friend so enlightened and generous in the bestowal of time and means on the promotion of large knowledge and free thought? Aus den Besten Lebensstunden Eigenes und Angeeignetes. Von Daniel Sanders. Stuttgart: Abenheim'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung. 1882. [Original Poems and Translations.]

We sometimes think of a lexicographer as a Dr. Dryasdust, picking the bones of the Muses and Graces, but alien to their life and spirit. If the skit on the "Judenhetze" by Dr. Sanders, of which a translation recently appeared in the Inquirer, were not sufficient to dispel this illusion, we should suppose the present volume from the same hand would, at all events, have this effect on any one who opened its pages. To give the English reader, especially the readers of the Inquirer, a notion of Dr. Daniel Sanders in his lighter literary moods, when brushing aside for the nonce the dust of dictionaries, he courts the presiding fairies of the Castalian spring, we should call him a German Sir John Bowring. His volume consists partly of original pieces, "Eigenes," and still more largely of translations, "Angeeignetes," from English, Arabic, Swedish, Servian, Persian, Bohemian, Polish, Lithuanian, Russian, Turkish, Low German, French, Modern and Ancient Greek, and other sources. Were we conversant with one-fifth part of the languages laid under contribution by this almost universal polyglott, we might be in a position to pronounce an opinion worth reading upon the merits of the whole. Such is, unfortunately, not the case; but to the excellence of his rendering of Greek and English poetry we can bear willing and emphatic testimony. The peculiar felicity with which Dr. Sanders manages to reproduce in his own language without any violence to its idiom the exact ring and the precise meaning of his originals, in those cases where we can check him, enables us to surmise that in his versions of more recondite tongues he will not be found wanting by any one who is competent to test his work.

As a fair sample, we give the first two stanzas from a translation of Southey's well-known "Battle of Blenheim," and we leave it to those of our readers who are acquainted with the German language to say whether they ever saw anything in the way of rendering at once more faithful and less strained. It is a positive delight to see the mastery success with which Dr. Sanders turns each line and sentence:—

It was a summer evening,
 Old Kaspar's work was done;
 And he before his cottage door
 Was sitting in the sun:
 And by him sported on the green
 His little grandchild, Wilhelmine.
 An einem Sommerabend sass,
 Nach schwer vollbracht'm Thun
 Alt Kaspar vor der Hütte Thür
 Im Sonnenschein zu ruhn.
 Und bei ihm auf dem Rasen hin
 Spielt Minchin seine Enkelin.
 She saw her brother Peterkin
 Roll something large and round,
 Which he beside the rivulet
 In playing there had found;
 He came to ask what he had found
 That was so large, and smooth, and round.
 Sie sah, ihr Bruder Peterchen
 Rollt' etwas gross und rund:
 Beim Spielen an dem Bächlein dort
 That er den schönen Fund.
 Nun kam und fragt'er nach dem Fund,
 Der war so gross und glatt und rund.

In the Arabian legend of the intolerant Abraham, given in Conway's "Sacred Anthology," the guest is a sun-worshipper. In Dr. Sanders's version he is an Atheist, or, at all events, an Agnostic.

In his rendering of some of the modern Greek ballads Dr. Sanders has been anticipated by Arnold Passow, and even Goethe himself; but we do not hesitate to say that he does not suffer by comparison as a translator, even with the greatest of his predecessors. As for the original pieces, they are full of grace and sprightliness, and permeated by the spirit of the lyrical and ballad poetry of other lands, which seem to have so fascinated the mind of Dr. Sanders. For those acquainted with German (and their number we are glad to know is growing) we can think of no more suitable present than this volume, which is as beautiful and tasteful outside as its contents are charming and delightful.

We should add that the book has, as a frontispiece, a portrait of the author. E. M. G.

Short Notices.

Confessions of a Medium. Griffith and Farran. 1882.

The weak point about this book is that the anonymous author seems to have continually played upon the credulity of silly people as a spiritualistic medium after he had ceased to believe in the system, and had discovered not only the folly but the baseness of many of his confederates. He justly says that the pictures of fraud and faith—or, as we should rather say, folly—revealed in this book are not pleasing. "The first indicates the depths to which a man may sink; the second that though there are more generous people in the world, of whom the world has little or no conception, it is easy for faith to degenerate to folly." He has endeavoured to reproduce the various scenes in which he took part as faithfully as is consistent with personal reasons, and the result is an exposure of one of the most unwholesome systems of combined fraud and folly that has ever led weak-minded people astray. Mediums as a rule are knaves and impostors, as has been proved in more than one notorious case here and in America, and we confess to holding so strong a feeling on the subject that if anyone we knew professed to be a medium we should think it a duty at once to drop his or her acquaintance, and to regard them as unfit for any post of trust or confidence. We should say the same of their credulous dupes, were it not for the fact that many of them are persons whose motives and character are above the slightest breath of suspicion, and who are sane on all other questions. The writer, who has devoted a considerable portion of his life to the subject, adds:—"If there is any truth in Spiritualism, if there is in it anything worthy of living, it will live; but in my experience of the subject I have never discovered the smallest particle of truth in its professional mediums; and furthermore, my observations force me to believe that the germs of utter ruin are contained within itself, that is as now practised." The revelations he makes amply confirm this strong censure, and show how the spiritualistic phenomena which so often perplex even cool observers are the result of trickery and ingenious machinery. The book has no literary merit; but it is worth reading, especially by those who are inclined to dabble in "necromancy" from its impressive warning of the inevitable consequences upon the nervous system, and, what is much worse, the gradual deterioration of the moral character. The writer strongly advises those wishing to investigate the subject to have nothing to do with it; and if that sound advice is rejected he very sensibly warns them "never to sit with a professional medium, and never by any chance to sit in the dark, but in the fullest light." It is, after all, only the good old Apostolic rule, "He that doeth truth cometh to the light that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God."

Our Contemporaries.

ATHEISM IN FRANCE.

The Spectator, in an article on "The Hatred of Religion in France," writes:—

It is simply incredible that if the Christian religion had been presented truly to the French people—as truly even, as it has often been presented by genuinely Roman Catholic teachers of the higher type,—the popular hatred of it, the popular craving for a worship even of mud, as an alternative for it,—could be what it is. We find it impossible to believe that Paganism could be passionately preferred to Christianity by a large proportion of the people of a great race and great country, if the teachers of Christianity had not mistaught and travestied it, and disfigured it by habitual association with mischievous allies. To the practical man, it is all but certain that the evil popular odour in which Christianity appears to be in France, must be more or less due to the evil odour of the sentiments, words, and actions of a great number of so-called Christians. France is the last country to be regarded as incapable of a high ideal enthusiasm. And if France has really revolted so far as she appears to have revolted against Christ, it must be because Christ has been more or less generally belied by those who have felt, and thought, and spoken, and lived in his name. It is, at least, permissible to hope that Republicanism may succeed in disillusionising France as completely in relation to that belief in mud which the most thorough-going Republicans take as the basis of their system, as the Catholic Church has succeeded in disillusionising France with the doctrine of that Church.

But though we sincerely believe that a great deal of the passionate hatred of religion which we see in France, and which takes such hideous forms in some of the Government schools, must be in a great measure due, in the last resort, to the shortcomings of French Roman Catholic priests and laymen, it is hardly possible to doubt that there is something left in the religious, or rather, irreligious phenomena of the present day in France which this hypothesis, even if true, will not adequately explain. Nowhere else,—neither in Italy, nor in Spain, nor in Germany, nor in Switzerland, nor in any other Catholic or Protestant country,—do you see anything at all approaching to the violent propagandist spirit which Atheism appears to have assumed in France.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN'S MINISTRY.

The Liberal of Calcutta writes:—The Ministry of the Brahmo Somaj has been of a very gradual growth. The minister was quite young when he was elected to the pulpit in 1869. He was only thirty years old. He was chosen for the Veda not because he had studied to qualify himself for it. His rhetorical acquirements in Bengali were of a poor description. And everything which the minister had to do was in Bengali. He was younger than a great many in his congregation, and not a few considered that he was inferior to them in theological scholarship. These were vain men. In fact there was not much theological scholarship in any Brahmo in those days. However that may be, it is sure he was not raised to the pulpit by universal consent. We young men heartily rejoiced over his appointment, which was virtually made by the venerable Debendra Nath, the Bishop of the Brahmo Somaj. The young minister's great claim was the devouring zeal for God's cause, which consumed him. His great claim was his noble, sincere, pure character that was everybody's admiration. His mighty claim lay in his ardent faith, which feared no difficulties, and surmounted all obstacles. These undoubted claims made him everybody's superior, and hushed all clamour against his election. The occasion was signalled by an event. The minister from early age always burnt with a desire to see the spiritual regeneration of his little wife, who at this time could not be more than twenty years old. He never commanded, but always persuaded her to join the services of the Brahmo Somaj. And when on the first of the Bengali month of Baysakh he was to be made the minister of the Brahmo Somaj, he desired his youthful wife to come out of the orthodox heathen family house, and witness the glad-some ceremony which Devendra Nath, our spiritual father, wanted to make very grand and imposing. She consented. And their joint wish was brought to the notice of the head of the family. This man most strenuously objected, and so did every senior member of the household. They said they would oppose this step by force. But the young aspirant after spiritual office had taken his resolution. He heard that his intention of taking out his wife on the auspicious day was to be violently put down. He wanted to apply to the police authorities. I remember the short letter he wrote to the police. I do not remember whether he sent it. But it ran somewhat to this effect:—"Some parties are going to obstruct me by force when I take out my wife to-morrow morning to a religious service. I want the assistance of the police." But the assistance of the police was not required. Sometime before the sun rose in the horizon, while it was yet dark, the courtyard of the old house was filled with the members and servants. He came out with his wife. He, tall, upright, and strong, unflinching and unfaltering in his resolve, she a mere girl, timid, tender, shrinking, and almost trembling. He took her by the hand, and walked through the thronging courtyard, the crowd retreating as he advanced. The door-keeper hesitated to open the outer gate, which he flung open with his own hands. He and his wife stepped into the street, got into the carriage, and drove away. This was indeed the emancipation of woman! But he had to pay dearly for it. That very evening he got a message from the senior members of the household forbidding him to enter the house again. He was expatriated and ostracised from the home of his parents for a long period of time. Such was the occasion of his appointment to the ministry.

ASHFORD.—The members of the congregation belonging to the Unitarian Chapel in Hempstead-street assembled on Wednesday week for the purpose of presenting to the Rev. J. Moden, upon his relinquishment of the ministry of the chapel, owing to his departure from Ashford, a testimonial of their personal regard and appreciation of his zeal and fidelity as a religious teacher during the six years he has discharged his duties among them. The proceedings, which were prefaced by a social tea, took place in the schoolroom attached to the chapel, which was well filled. The testimonial consisted of a breakfast-cruet-service of silver, and was accompanied by an album containing photographic likenesses of the greater number of those forming the congregation. The presentation was made on behalf of the chapel committee, to whom the matter had been entrusted, by Mr. Saunders, who has filled the office of chapel secretary during the whole period of Mr. Moden's ministry, and who, in a few unpretending yet well-chosen remarks, expressed the feeling of all present, both in respect to the personal friendship they entertained for Mr. Moden and their estimation of the work he has performed in Ashford as a pioneer of Liberal Christianity. Mr. Moden acknowledged the presentation in a speech of affectionate earnestness, in the course of which he reviewed the events of his ministry, and expressed his deep acknowledgment of the steadfast and zealous support he had received from the members of his congregation, who, he was conscious, endeavoured to make up in unanimity and fraternal feeling what they unhappily lacked in numbers. He besought them, as a parting word, to show to his successor the same cordiality and singleness of purpose they had manifested towards himself, so that he might have the satisfaction of feeling that his labours had not been thrown away, and of finding in the future, should he have the pleasure of coming to preach their anniversary sermons at any time, a growing and prosperous congregation. The meeting, which was also addressed by other gentlemen interested in the movement, the speeches being interspersed with excellent music, was of a very earnest character, and was pervaded by extreme cordiality.—On Sunday last the services were conducted by the Rev. T. L. Marshall, whose subjects were—in the morning, "Life Worth Living;" and in the evening, "The Universality of the Gospel." The services will be regularly conducted by ministers sent by the Unitarian Association until a permanent appointment is made. The mortgage of the chapel has been purchased by the Committee of the Association.

FREEWILL AND NECESSITY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I thank Dr. Travis for his letter, and am sorry that my presentation of his views on the Free-will question does not satisfy him. I still, however, think that he really means what I have all along understood him to mean, though my mode of statement is not that which he himself would choose. He does not approve of my description when I say, "Dr. Travis praises or blames a man for his conduct not because the man could have acted otherwise than he did in the moment of temptation, but because the man himself acted as he did, and as he was necessitated to do by his mental constitution and surroundings." It is to the word "necessitated" that Dr. Travis takes exception, and he adds, "I praise or blame a man for his conduct because 'I know he has a power of self-government.'" The point of my argument was that according to Dr. Travis this "power of self-government," or as I called it, "the action of a man's own personality," is strictly and entirely determined in its exercise by the mental constitution and environment of the person tempted; in other words, that the act of self-determination which we call a moral choice is related to previous mental conditions in just as certain and definite a way as all other phenomena are related to their antecedent conditions. I believe I am correct when I say that whatever be the meaning which Dr. Travis attaches to the word "causation," in reference to the relation of consecutive phenomena in the physical world, he believes that the same kind of "causation" holds equally good of the relation between our previous mental states and our acts of self-determination in seasons of temptation. Now this is precisely what I meant by the word "necessitated," but if it seems to Dr. Travis that this word misrepresents his opinion, I have no objection to adopting his own phraseology, and saying that, according to him, the acts of self-determination by which a man attends to and keeps up certain thoughts, and thus modifies his own mental and moral condition, is influenced by his constitution and surroundings. But what Dr. Travis means by "influence" must be well understood, and I think the following passage from his little treatise on "English Socialism" will leave no doubt on this point:—"Man is what he is in his habits of thought and feeling and action (his character), because he has been influenced as he has been. . . . And he does what he does upon every occasion because his habits of thought and feeling and action are what they are, and because he is influenced at the time from without as he is influenced."

Why Dr. Travis should blame a man for choosing to keep up the lower thought rather than the higher one, when such quite omnipotent "influences" were brought to bear upon his action, I am utterly unable to see. And I am still more hopelessly perplexed by Dr. Travis's remark that "a man's merit or demerit is in all cases qualified very beneficially by the fact that his agency in the exercise of this power is dependent upon internal and external conditions, including the laws of his mental constitution."

If the good or bad character of the acts of self-determination is (as no doubt Dr. Travis means it) wholly "dependent upon these internal and external conditions," or, in other words, if under the circumstances only one line of conduct was possible, then I maintain that to talk about the "qualification" of our judgment of a man's merit or demerit is utterly unmeaning, seeing that by your theory you have completely cut away all foundation for any rational attribution of either praise or blame. Once admit that "causation" in the sense in which Dr. Travis uses this word, pervades our mental and moral constitution in the same way as it pervades our physical constitution, so that the relation between the mind's previous condition and its moral acts of self-determination is such as to inevitably exclude all sequences save one, then it seems quite clear to me that there is no escaping the conclusion that sinful acts and habits fall essentially into the same category with bodily ailments and deformities; and though, even on Dr. Travis's theory of human nature, what used to be called "the sword of Justice" would still have to be keen and to be deftly handled against criminals, it should, if his view be correct, be handled in precisely the same spirit as that in which the surgeon plies his operating knife; and all idea of moral disapprobation as applied to the criminal's past acts and present character would be as absurdly out of place as to blame the Swiss for his ugly goitre, or the gipsy for his sunburnt complexion.

It appears to me quite futile to reiterate, as many Determinists do, "we call a man a sinner and blame him because he made a choice, because he performed an act of self-determination," unless you are also prepared to admit that it was competent for him under those particular circumstances to have made another choice, to have performed a different act of self-determination; for it is only in this latter consideration, and not in the mere act of spontaneous self-determination, that the sentiments of praise and blame find their real source and their rational justification.

If Dr. Travis's theory be sound, and man's self-determinations in times of temptation are related to previous mental conditions, as he thinks they are, it might of course be still regarded as a rational and justifiable device (though it would seem to me, I must confess, somewhat Jesuitical), to keep on applying to people the language of praise and blame with the view of providing them with new motives which might beneficially influence their future conduct; but I hope it will be quite evident to your readers that what I have meant throughout by praise and blame is an inward sentiment directed upon the past actions of ourselves and others; and this inward sentiment is, I must still contend, wholly incompatible with such a view of human nature as Dr. Travis seeks to uphold.

OLD MEETING HOUSE, BIRMINGHAM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As you inserted in your paper of last week a statement relative to the retirement of the Rev. C. Clarke as minister of this chapel, copied from the Birmingham Daily Post, you will, perhaps, in fairness to the congregation, insert the following denial of the accuracy of that statement, which appeared in the same newspaper a few days later.

A MEMBER OF THE CONGREGATION.

(To the Editor of the Daily Post.)

SIR,—In our notice of the closing services held on Sunday last in our "Old Meeting House," which appeared in Monday's Daily Post, it is stated that Mr. Clarke's resignation as minister was a "formality," for the purpose of completing certain legal arrangements, and that his thirty years' pastorate came to an end "abruptly."

While regretting the necessity of mentioning the affairs of our congregation at all in the columns of a public newspaper, we yield to a request to state, in the shortest manner possible, that no such "formality" was necessary for any purpose whatever, but that Mr. Clarke's retirement was understood, from first to last, to be absolute and final. And the termination of his ministry can scarcely be called "abrupt," seeing that the arrangements for his retirement were completed as far back as January, 1881.—Yours obediently,

JOHN PICKERING,
EDWARD TOWNLEY, } Wardens.

GLASGOW.—A social meeting of the South St. Mungo-street congregation and friends was held on Wednesday, the 22nd ult., for the purpose of bidding good-bye to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson on their departure to America, the former being late secretary, and the latter one of the visitors of the congregation. An unanimous and hearty vote of thanks, coupled with kind wishes, was given to both. The Dramatic Association added much to the evening's enjoyment by their representation of the trial scene in the Merchant of Venice. The Sunday evening services were closed for the season on the 26th ult., by a service of praise, with organ and orchestral accompaniments. There was a crowded attendance, and the whole service was highly appreciated. On Sunday, 2nd April, a meeting for conference on theological and religious subjects is to be held in the forenoon in the Church, which, it is hoped, will meet a want in the city.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & CO., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

CHURCH CREEDS.

BY THE REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

The following discourse was preached in the Church of the Messiah, Chicago, on Sunday morning, Feb. 26, in reply to a plea for Creeds, by the Rev. Dr. Ryder, the distinguished Universalist minister of the same city:—

Galatians v. 1:—"Stand fast therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free."

Every good thing has its drawback. Truth itself sometimes involves you in awkward consequences. There are emergencies in which it would save a world of trouble to put conscience on one side and forget it. You cannot adopt any principle and try to live up to it, but there will inevitably arise occasions when it seems particularly inconvenient. Political liberty is a grand thing; we are all enthusiastic for our free, popular institutions. But at times when thoughtful citizens are outvoted by the mob, or the institutions have been captured by rings, I have known very sincere advocates of liberty regret that the suffrage is quite so wide, and even wish for a little beneficent despotism. But they are wrong. Popular government may often work poorly and awkwardly, but it is the true, strong, lasting thing that carries in it the future of the world. And as it is with political liberty so it is with religious liberty. Why, a dozen years ago, I wrote an article on "The Inconveniences of Unitarian Liberty." I pointed out the disadvantage of our not having some clear-cut little statement of doctrines to exhibit to inquirers, and how the absence of this enables crudities and extravagances to be put forth under our name, and makes it difficult for us to clear ourselves from them, however little they may really have to do with us. But I said then that these were, after all, only incidental drawbacks; that our position, of free congregational churches, without any binding creed or uniform statement of faith, was the true position, and that we must "stand fast" in it.

Well, we are experiencing what seems to other people one of these inconveniences of our liberty just now. I need not go into the details of the Unity Church case. You know them, and you know how they are being very generally taken by outsiders to prove not merely that our liberty is inconvenient, but that it is altogether an illogical blunder; and that, in fact, Unity Church, in the way in which it got out of its difficulty, simply violated its professions of liberty—threw its liberty overboard in order to save its religion. You have probably most of you read the sermon in which my good friend Dr. Ryder last Sunday set forth this very view. It was a perfectly natural view for him to take. Our Universalist brethren have always held that our refusal to have any creed was a mistake, and that it exposed us to these very difficulties; and it was not in human nature to keep from saying "We told you so." I should have said it were I in Brother Ryder's place, and I am sure I could not have said it more fairly and courteously. I am glad it has been so said, because it lifts the matter out of all prejudice and personality; and it really is an important question, which wants to be understood better than I think it is throughout the churches.

Now, let me begin by stating clearly what the question at issue is. It is not a question as to the necessity of religious faith, but as to whether it is necessary or best to have the main points of that faith drawn up in a definite statement or creed. Religious faith, of course. It is as impossible for there to be a Unitarian church without religion as a Universalist church. The idea of keeping up a church when the religion is all gone strikes me like a proposition to keep up an old-established dairy where the cows have all gone and there is nothing left but the pump. No one who watches the real life of our Unitarian churches as it goes on decade by decade; the names, such as Channing and Ware, and Bellows and Freeman Clarke, and Martineau, which win our most universal and unchanging reverence; the service books and psalmodes which find the widest circulation among us, because they best express our average thought,—no one can note all this without feeling that there is no doubt as to our churches standing for religion, nor as to what kind of religion they stand for. The only question is, as to whether this religion, or at least its essential ideas, shall be formulated in a creed. On this the Christian world in general, including our Universalist friends, says: "Yes," says Dr. Ryder: "I believe in a creed—short, explicit, relating to the essentials; I consider that the fairest for all parties." On the other hand, our Unitarian churches have, almost as uniformly, said, "No." They have been altogether distrustful of such attempts to define even the essentials. Religious history is against such definitions. The form of words which, when it is first agreed upon, seems the most natural expression of great religious convictions, in a few years does not express them so naturally, and in a few generations can only be taken in a non-natural sense. What is really wanted for a united and effective religious society is a number of people agreeing sufficiently in their general faith and in their way of looking at religion to be able to worship and work happily together, and to be able to agree upon the same man to be their minister—that is, their religious leader and teacher. Such general agreement and sympathy may seem a vaguer thing than a specified agreement on particular doctrines, but we believe it to be quite sufficient, nay the very best basis for association in a church.

See what this practically means, what it has been meaning, how it has been working. It is no new thing. It is no recent experiment. It is the basis upon which the churches which group together under the general name of "Unitarian" have been quietly going on for over two centuries in England, and for over half a century in America. In all those churches there is no test of membership. The doors are wide open. Any one can join them who will. We do not ask a man "Do you believe in this" and "that?" even of the most essential things. We do not examine him at all. We simply say, "Here is our Church; you hear our services, you hear the way in which the great subjects of religion are spoken of and looked at among us; if you feel enough in sympathy with us to come in with us and count yourself in among us, do so." The societies thus formed are independent of each other. We are absolutely "Congregationalists." We have large associations and conferences for such purposes as we can carry on together, but these have no authority over the several congregations. This larger fellowship of congregations is, again, constituted of congregations which are left free, which unite together from a general feeling of having a common object, though no two of them might define that object exactly alike. Now the same principles condition the choice of our ministers and the education of our ministers. A young man entering our colleges is not examined as to his doctrinal opinions, or required to subscribe even to three or four essentials. There is an effort made to find out if he is a really earnest, religious-minded youth and of good ability. That is all. And in his training in the divinity school the views of learned men of different churches come before him, and he is encouraged to think for himself. In our English college, in which I was trained, I remember the student telling the professors that he had changed his views, and could not be a Unitarian minister, had become orthodox, and he offered to leave. Their answer was, "Why should you leave? Stay right on! Nobody will interfere with your views. Complete your training for the ministry here, and then go and be a minister wherever you find you will be most at home."

And it is the same in the actual choice of ministers. The candidate for the ministry of one of our congregations is not asked to sign any creed. He is not shown any list of doctrines which he will have to preach, and if he rejects any of which he will have to leave. That is not because our congregations care nothing about a minister's faith; but because they feel that the really important thing is, not whether he can assent to certain specific doctrines, but, whether his general feeling and way of looking at the subject is such as to make them glad to have him as their religious teacher and the leader of their worship. I can not put it better than in the sentence of my "charge" at Unity Church. I said:—"For a minister and people to work happily and usefully together there must be a certain amount of agreement as to what they both mean, a certain unity of conviction and aim."

This is what we mean by the liberty of the minister in our Unitarian churches. That there is no exact line he must toe; no exact schedule of doctrines which he is expected to preach; no creed by which any querulous member can bring him to book, and on the clauses of which he can be charged with heresy. And to those who know how the doctrinal articles and statements of other churches actually work, how they give occasion for complaints, how they place it in the power of the smallest section of the people to charge a minister with heresy, even where the bulk of his people are happy and satisfied in his ministrations—to those who know this, this utter freedom from any such petty doctrinal espionage, is a large, substantial, and noble liberty. If other churches have as much, why I can only say, I am thankful to hear it. It must be because they have begun to treat their old creeds as the "interesting relics" Dr. Ryder terms them—only if it is so, we would like them to say so plainly, that all the world may know it.

This, then, is what we mean by the freedom of our Unitarian churches and the liberty of the Unitarian pulpit. And this is what Dr. Ryder protests against as impracticable and insufficient.

Well, let us look into this. And the first thing I have to say about it is that, in leaving the relation between minister and people to be one of general agreement, and not of explicit creed, we are simply taking for religious teaching the ground which is universally taken in other branches of teaching. Take chemistry, for example. The trustees of a college do not ask their professor of chemistry to sign a creed, not even the smallest. What they do is to assure themselves by inquiry and conference with him that he knows his subject and is the right sort of a man for a teacher, and then they engage him, leaving him, as they would say, entire liberty in his lectureship. And yet if he were suddenly to announce that he had come to believe in the non-existence of matter and the delusiveness of phenomena, and that henceforth he should only use the laboratory as a gymnasium or a smoking-room, certainly the trustees would say that they must look out for another man, and nobody would cry out that they were not allowing him that free lectureship on chemistry which they promised him! Or take medical science—and here the parallel is closer, for there are two sects, at any rate, among physicians. Suppose an allopathic college wants a professor. Its managers certainly look out for one of their own school; but they do not ask him to sign a little list of medical propositions. They inquire about his abilities and his general views so as to make sure that he is on their side in the matter, and then they leave him free—unless, indeed, he should go completely over to the other side and begin to teach that their whole system is wrong, and then he would have to go, and no one would think his liberty infringed. Now we think that in engaging a man to be a teacher of religion in our churches and a leader of their worship, it should be the same.

Mark another thing. In taking this ground, we are only taking the same position with regard to a man's religious fitness for the ministry that all churches do for his moral fitness. Those churches which are most particular about having a theological statement to test a minister's religious fitness never think of submitting to him an ethical statement to test his moral fitness. Yet moral fitness has even more to do with a minister's usefulness than theological fitness. Why not have the leading principles of morality formulated into a moral creed, such as "I believe in not getting into debt, and in keeping to one wife, and"—say the ten commandments? Is the reason that this is not done because churches are indifferent to these things, or wish them to be considered open questions? Not for a moment; but because it is universally felt that these are matters on which no definition is so effective as a congregation's general sense of whether their minister believes in righteousness and is a good teacher of it. Now we simply take the same ground about a minister's fitness to be a teacher and helper in religion.

But it may be said that this general feeling of agreement, without any specification of essentials, might be sufficient for engaging a minister, but that it is quite too vague to afford any basis of action in terminating the engagement. That is the special moral which Dr. Ryder draws. If you engage a minister without binding him to anything, or imposing any limitations on his preaching, how can you dismiss him, even if he overthrows everything? Why, precisely by the same principle on which he is engaged. He is engaged without formal doctrinal stipulations, not because his people do not care about their own views, but because they have ascertained, as they think, that he is near enough to where they are to make him an acceptable teacher of religion, and, simply, if he get so far away from where they are as to be no longer an acceptable teacher of religion, and especially if he get so far away as to be no longer a teacher of religion at all, the very same principle will necessitate his leaving. This is no new interpretation of the matter, propounded to meet a new emergency. In the very charge which Mr. Miln heard on coming to Unity Church, and of which I happen to know that he expressed strong approval, this inevitable limitation of liberty was laid down just as plainly as the liberty itself. After speaking of a general agreement, and not a specific creed, as the necessary requirement for a minister, and people to work happily and usefully together, I said:—"This kind of general agreement has to exist in a Unitarian church as in any other, and where the minister and the people in one of our churches find that they have somehow fallen hopelessly out of this necessary concord, they will have to part." That is the principle of the matter, and certainly no one can say that when exactly such a contingency arose it proved clumsy or ineffective. Instead of regarding this recent change at Unity as revealing the weakness of our plan of general agreement instead of specific creed, it really shows its strength.

But Brother Ryder cannot get over this dismissal of a minister who had not had any line of essential doctrines given to him. He thinks it was a violation of our professed position, that the congregation only saved their religion by throwing over their liberty. They had bidden their minister preach freely, and he cannot see why they should feel that the general religious agreement necessary for the continuance of such ministry should have so suddenly fallen through. He implies that it was the sudden but real bringing to bear of a creed, after all. But in all this my good friend leaves one most important factor entirely out of the count. I mean worship. A minister is not merely engaged to preach; he is engaged to lead the worship of his people. Our churches, all churches, stand primarily for worship. Mr. Miln not only suddenly preached views which seemed to cut away all religion in the future, but he abandoned prayer, even the chanting of the Lord's Prayer. A good deal has been said of the suddenness with which the church took action. Surely the suddenness was all on the other side, in the way in which a whole congregation found themselves, without even three months' notice, without a day's notice, without the slightest expectation of it, with all prayer cut out of their Sunday services!

Now in reality this was the matter which, more than anything preached, brought right home to the congregation that their minister had "somehow fallen hopelessly out of concord" with them. And here is the point I want to emphasise. This was exactly a matter which no creed provides against, which even the Universalist creed does not provide against, which even the Universalist church leaves to general understanding as completely as our Unitarian churches do. And I do not know that we could have a better illustration of how we are practically, as well as theoretically, better off without a creed than with one.

I put the matter thus: Suppose the minister of some Universalist society should come to hold views inconsistent with public prayer. It is a perfectly possible case. It is exactly the view which the Quakers hold, and a Universalist might come to hold it without infringing a single article of his creed. The Universalist creed, which is called the Winchester profession, is as follows:—

Article 1. We believe that the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

Art. 2. We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

Art. 3. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected, and that believers ought to be careful to maintain order and practice good works; for these things are good and profitable unto men.

You see there is not a word about prayer in it. A Universalist might come to Quaker views of public prayer, on the ground of Christ's words about praying in the closet, and so he might suddenly discontinue prayer. What would the Universalist congregation do? I suppose they would say:—"Brother, we respect your conscientious scruples, but you have got too far out of harmony with us to continue usefully as our minister." But would their Winchester creed help them in this? The very contrary. They would be just where Unity Church found itself. No! They would be worse off; because Unity Church professed to leave the whole relation to general working agreement, while the Universalist society had professed to be above such vague understandings, and to have specified its essentials. The minister might say—if he had the spirit of some of the early Quakers, he would be very likely to say:—"See; I came into your Church in preference to joining the Unitarians because I was so impressed with Dr. Ryder's statement of the value of having essentials defined. Now show me where I violated those essentials!" And there I think, to take my friend's own words, "the logic would be on the side of the minister."

But I should be doing our whole position, and our whole life as a Church, great injustice if I were to treat this absence of any formal statement of faith in our Unitarian churches as a mere matter of difficulty or otherwise in terminating a ministerial connection when it ceased to be useful and happy. Even on that score—for such an emergency as this very one that is being so widely commented on—I have shown that it is quite sufficient; nay, the simplest and best; for who shall say when a man has gone beyond the creed; but who cannot say whether he feels his minister able to give him real help? This absence of a creed, however, has a far larger and nobler aspect.

What it means, what it has been steadily meaning in our churches from the beginning, is that we feel these great relations between man and God and the eternal future, and between man and man in seeking to realise them, are not matters capable of exact definition and formula. Our best words, our most careful definitions, are only hints at realities above all mere words. So we decline to attempt to formulate religion in any authoritative summary. We are glad for any man to shape its great thoughts into words, and in proportion as he seems to our people, here and there, to do so in a way which touches deep religious truth, his words will find acceptance, and even acquire a sort of representative value. They will become representative words, but not authoritative. That is the sense in which, when people come to me to ask what Unitarianism is, I refer them to Channing and Parker, and other writers of various casts of thought. That is the sense in which I and other ministers give lectures from time to time on Unitarianism, not to try to persuade the public that we all hold just this or that precise belief, but to let it be known in a general way what our Unitarian churches are standing for, and whereabouts they mainly are. Such statements are all the better for not being authoritative—for many such a statement has in it helpful lights of truth, which offered as the expression of personal thought, make religion more clear; and yet if even the best of them were proposed as a binding summary for all to stand by, it would infallibly awaken criticism of its terms, and instead of bringing men together, send them apart.

And lastly, there is this other great advantage in this open position of ours, that it enables many to join us who could not subscribe to any statement even of essentials. There are many such in these days. All this keen inquiry and investigation that is abroad in the world as hardly ever before, has unsettled men until there are many to whom all religious things have become dim, perhaps invisible. If they should be asked to sign the shortest creed, they would have to refuse. They do not feel sure of anything. And yet they feel some interest in churches; they would like to believe; they like to go, and like their children to go, where other men feel sure of something, and can help them a little with their stronger faith; and I for one am thankful that the openness of our Church enables us to find a home for such men, a church-home, into which they may come without a question asked, just as close into its innermost fellowship as their own general sympathies enable them to do. Do you remember what George H. Hepworth said when he left our Church in New York and joined orthodoxy? He complained that our churches were too open to such men. I think he used these very words: "I have known men admitted into the Unitarian Church who would not have been admitted into any other Christian Church on earth." What he announces as our shame I have ever cherished as our glory. There are men to-day who though having very strong and earnest religious faith, shrink from even the Christian name. Some of them have seen how through so many centuries that sacred name of Christ was trailed through blood and brimstone, till they feel as if it had become a piece of "damaged phraseology," hopelessly identified with superstition and un-Christlike things, and to be no more used. Others have come to believe that Christ's own purpose was simply to lead men to the Father, and that all this putting of the Christian name and symbols to the front is the mistake of a later generation who have wronged his own real purpose. I do not share their views, but I know these men; and some of them, such as William Gannett, of St. Paul, are men of the intensest, purest faith, a faith which at once shames and helps my own—men whose writings I cannot read for ten minutes, in whose presence I cannot be for an hour, without feeling that they have caught the very spirit of the master whose name they yet decline to take. Would Christ have separated these men from him? I cannot for a moment believe it, and so, so far as they will come with us and be of us, I give them welcome; and if there be congregations that feel such men can help their religious life, I will welcome them with all my heart even as minister, among us. Yes! Standing myself among the more conservative members of our body, holding about as near as any one to-day to what is sometimes called Channing Unitarianism, and believing that the extreme radicalism in our churches is a temporary oscillation of opinion from which men will return, I have yet always pleaded, and I hope I ever may, that even that extreme radicalism, so long as it has any sympathy with our religious position and religious work, shall have a full and brotherly place among us. This is our Unitarian freedom. If it is indeed true, as has been said, that other churches are just as free as ours I am thankful to hear it; for it is in such reverent freedom, and in the gradual drawing together of men of different views, that I see the hope of Christ's religion. Thus may there come at last that unity of spirit in which the old divisions of sect shall quietly pass away; and thus, too, by the brotherly comparison of varying thoughts, may all the narrowness and superstition, and restless human speculation which have so long obscured the truth of Christ be sloughed away, and his great revelations of the definite Father and the eternal home come out in their simplicity to be the light and power of man.

Religious Intelligence.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The Spring Conference of this Society was held on Saturday last. The Conference was preceded by a religious service held in Little Portland-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, LL.D., who preached an excellent discourse from the text "Feed my Lambs." There was a very fair attendance. After the service tea was served in the Portland-street British Schools, and then the conference began. Among those present were the Revs. Dr. Sadler, J. Drummond, Professor Estlin Carpenter, W. C. Bowie, Pope, Wooller; and Dr. Blake Odgers, Philemon Moore, Hugon Tayler, Miss Tyrrell, Miss M. Martineau, Miss Preston, Miss Teschemacher, Miss L. Sharpe, Miss F. Hill, and representatives from nearly all the London Sunday-schools. The chair was taken by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, M.A., who at once called upon Miss Anna Swanwick to open the Conference by reading a paper on "The Aim of the Sunday-school, and how best to attain it." This paper will be found on another page. At its close the Chairman thanked Miss Swanwick for her admirable paper, and then invited discussion on it.

Mr. C. L. CORKRAN was very pleased that the reader had especially emphasised the teaching of poetry. He had long thought that we ought to make our children well acquainted with the grand poems of Milton and Shakespeare. He should like to see our boys taught the old ballad poetry, as it would cultivate a spirit of chivalry, which was much required. He advocated, as an entertainment, the illustration of some of the great books of the past, such as the Iliad, or Dante's immortal work, by means of large wall pictures, to be accompanied by readings from those works descriptive of the scenes depicted. He also thought that if the boys and girls in our board schools were allowed to meet once a week for dancing it would help to train the former in more courteous habits towards the latter.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD (Newington-green) referred to a passage in the Visitor's report presented last year, condemning the use of "Gil Blas" and "Oliver Twist" as reading books in the school, and dissented from the view expressed by Mr. Wade. He thought that it was necessary to make the time pass pleasantly, and condemned the application of the moral to any tale or story used in addresses to scholars.

MISS MARION GREEN (Kentish-town) maintained that it was not the duty of teachers simply to interest their children, but whatever we had to teach we should try to give them the very best.

Mr. I. M. WADE considered that in Sunday-school teaching the religious element should be kept very prominently in view. He condemned the use of works of fiction as class books, though in the hands of a good teacher they might be very useful by way of illustration. He feared very much that the time was coming when class teaching would have to be discontinued, and collective lessons take its place. In choosing a superintendent the teachers ought to select a religious-minded man; he also should be methodical. In the work of the Sunday-schools the congregations must render help. He concluded by calling attention to and recommending the use of the recently published "Short Sermons for Children."

The Rev. F. W. SUMMERS held that the children were to be thought of first. Teachers should feel that they are engaged in the salvation of their children. It was teachers that were wanted far more than the tools. He pointed out that the Bible is not taught in the day-school, and that we are therefore bound to teach the Bible. Parents sent their children to Sunday-school to be taught religion, and if they were not taught that they were being invited to come under false pretences.

Mr. HOWARD CLARKE maintained that religion can sometimes be taught better out of other books than the Bible. A teacher ought to get to know his children, as by that means a bond of mutual love would be formed. He should go to their homes, and have them to his own.

The Rev. R. SPEARS said we wanted to make the children feel that they have to help others. He did not want the congregation to help in the school-work; the children should be taught that they would some day become teachers themselves. He had found that doing this was a great assistance to him in preserving order.

Mr. ROBINSON (Manchester New College) considered that the great thing wanted was sympathy. He approved of teaching by parable.

Mr. BARTRAM urged more attention being given to the Sunday-school libraries, which were often formed without sufficient care. It was no use having good books in use in the school if during the week the literature in the hands of the children was antagonistic to the teaching in the school. Teachers should interest themselves in the books their scholars read.

MISS GERTRUDE MARTINEAU desired to put in a word for the younger teachers. She had often found at meetings like these a too high ideal was pitched, and that teachers went away discouraged. Such expressions as "we had to seek the salvation of the children," "we ought to teach the Bible and religion," though she did not know what the latter meant, ought not to be used. If young teachers were told that they were to do their best to help their children they would not feel such a deep sense of responsibility as the high-sounding phrases to which she had referred led them to feel.

MISS CONSTANCE MARTINEAU, referring to some remarks that had fallen from a previous speaker as to a very large percentage of juvenile prisoners having been at Sunday-schools, expressed her belief that on inquiry it would be found that religion had been presented to them in a very perfunctory manner. An industrial schoolmaster being once asked whether a boy under his care was getting on, and whether he told the truth, replied that that was hardly to be expected yet, but he had nearly learnt the creed.

Mr. W. H. DRUMMOND mentioned that a good way to carry out Mr. Bartram's suggestion was the use of library cards, such as were issued by the Sunday School Union. This had been found useful in the Hampstead School.

MISS MARIAN PRITCHARD ("Aunt Amy") thought that teachers could not begin too early. She began when six years old, and recollected how proud she was to have a pupil younger than herself to show some pictures to. She would like to see a teacher to every two scholars, if possible, and hoped that the class system would long continue. In answer to a question from the Chairman, Miss Pritchard stated her experience as to the answers to her "Aunt Amy" questions. She certainly was surprised and somewhat shocked to find children of well-known Unitarians using expressions that might have been expected only from the rigidly orthodox.

Mr. F. ALLEN maintained that the main object of the Sunday-school was to teach religion, and this should be kept prominently in view.

A vote of thanks to Dr. Drummond for his sermon and to Miss Swanwick for her paper was proposed by the CHAIRMAN, and seconded by Mr. F. W. TURNER, and suitably acknowledged, and with this a lively and interesting conference closed.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

The annual meeting of this Union was held on Monday at Oldbury. The proceedings commenced with a sermon, preached by the Rev. W. C. WALTERS, of Kidderminster, in the absence of the Rev. W. H. Channing through illness. In the evening a public meeting was held in the school room, when delegates were present from the various churches connected with the Union, viz., Birmingham, Oldbury, Dudley, Coaseley, West Bromwich, Whitechurch, Tamworth, Kidderminster, Stourbridge. Mr. C. HARDING (Birmingham) presided. There was a large attendance.

The Rev. W. C. WALTERS read the annual report, which stated that the reports from all the churches spoke of improvement in one or more branches of Church work. Assistance had been rendered to Walsall, West Bromwich, Whitechurch, and Tamworth. At Walsall a large amount of money had been raised for renovating the chapel and rebuilding the school room, and the debt incurred was now nearly cleared off, and the efforts of the congregation would be next directed to lessening the burden on the Union. At West Bromwich a good work had been done. A commodious school had been opened, and since its opening the number of scholars had been more than doubled. At Whitechurch, where the Rev. A. Lancaster had recently settled, the congregation, although poor, had raised for its own congregational purposes nearly £100, and a special effort was being made to clear off a debt of £180 on the school buildings. Tamworth was perhaps the most signal instance of success which the Union had to report. At the commencement of 1881 the committee of the Union had a balance of £57 due to the treasurer. By the end of the year this had increased to £106. Some outstanding subscriptions would slightly reduce this. The contributions during the year amounted to £123, which was a smaller amount than had been received since 1869. A canvass made by the treasurer had resulted in donations to the amount of £106, which would free the Union from debt, and increase the subscription list £20.

On the motion of the Rev. Dr. COLLIER, of Birmingham, seconded by the Rev. R. E. BIRKS, of Tamworth, the report was adopted.

Mr. W. P. Greenway, of Dudley, was re-elected president for the ensuing year. The other officers and committee were afterwards elected.

Addresses were delivered by the Revs. H. McKEAN, J. HARRISON, Dr. LAIRD COLLIER, W. CAREY WALTERS, and H. EACHUS.

Votes of thanks were passed to the retiring officers, to Mr. Walters for the sermon, and to the Oldbury Society for entertaining the members of the conference at tea.

HACKNEY.—On Thursday evening last a large congregation assembled in the New Gravel Pit Church to celebrate the opening of the new organ, generously presented to the church by Mrs. Joseph Bateman, widow of the well-known Dr. Bateman, of Walthamstow. The organ was built by Messrs. Booth and Hepworth, Otley, Yorkshire, having compass of manuals, CC to G in alt., 56 notes, and a compass of pedals, CCC to tenor F, 30 notes. The recitals were well rendered by the organist of the church, Mr. William Tate, and the singing of the airs by Miss Agnes Rawson and Mr. R. Williamson left nothing to be desired.

SHEFFIELD.—The Sheffield Telegraph gives the following interesting account of great improvements in our chapel here:—"There remains nothing 'upper' about the Upper Chapel. The roof has gone. There will soon be nothing 'lower,' as the floor is going, too. When the trustees have done their work, the chapel will remind one of the Highlander's gun, which had a new lock, stock, and barrel. To my intense sorrow I see the cosy old pews, which were so many reserved compartments in which the worshippers could do as they liked, have all been turned out, and brand new cut-down pews, in which you are compelled to be seen of all men (any others), are to take their places. Perhaps, after all, it matters little. Since the Rev. Eli Fay came to the place five and a-half years ago there has been very little sleeping at the Upper Chapel. He has an inconvenient way of saying things which make people listen, and think, and listening and thinking are not conducive to comfortable repose. They are a good congregation at the Upper Chapel, and they are likewise rich in this world's goods. They have given Sheffield more Mayors and Master Cutlers than any other church or chapel in the town, and I believe they have also given Sheffield more magistrates and found them less work to do. Mr. Fay's pastorate has been an energetic one. When he came to Norfolk-street neither the inner nor the outer temple at all resembled the gate which was called beautiful. But under his ministry the congregation has very greatly increased, and the Channing Hall was but the beginning of a series of improvements upon which the trustees had determined. Now but little besides the walls of the chapel remain. It is to have a new roof and a new floor, and to be repewed and repainted. The ceiling is to be panelled in wood, and to be decorated by Mr. Hugh Stannus, of London. The pews are to be of the best pitch pine, and to be upholstered in crimson rep. The organ is now in Manchester undergoing complete restoration and considerable enlargement. The old school building is to be converted into class-rooms for the use of the Sunday-school. In short, everything in and about the chapel is being put in thorough order, and all this, as Scotch parsons say, is the practical outcome of the new life and the steady growth of the congregation. Mr. Fay, by his intellectual vigour and remarkable ardour, has won for himself a distinctive position in the town; and it does not imply any endorsement of his theological views to admit that he deserves the recognition he has attained. There is something about the American minister to which the English instinct does not take kindly. Mr. Fay, perhaps, has fewer of these unlikeable points than others, and he is never so happy or so popular as when he keeps his energy fixed on "Upper" affairs, and ceases to oppose his ordinance to our ecclesiastical canons.

Obituary.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

We deeply regret to announce the death of this eminent man, at a quarter past three p.m. on Friday, March 24.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the most popular of all living poets—not excepting even Mr. Tennyson—was born at Portland, Maine, February 27, 1807, "in an old square wooden house upon the edge of the sea." He was a son of the late Hon. Stephen Longfellow, and a descendant of William Longfellow, of Newbury, Massachusetts. This last-named gentleman was a native of Hampshire, England. He was born in the year 1651, and emigrated to Newbury, Massachusetts, where, at the age of twenty-five, he married Annie Sewall. He ended his career by being accidentally drowned in an estuary of the St. Lawrence, in 1690. The poet is descended on the mother's side from John Alden, who went over to America in the Mayflower, and was the first man that landed at Plymouth.

Entering Bowdoin College at the age of fourteen, Mr. Longfellow graduated in 1825, and subsequently devoted himself for a short time to the study of the law. When only eighteen years of age he received the appointment of Professor of Modern Languages in his Alma Mater—an appointment that is probably unprecedented in the annals of literature, but for which the young student appears to have been well and amply qualified. In 1826 he proceeded to Europe, and spent three years and a half in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Holland and England. The results of this tour are apparent in his early works, the traveller having become thoroughly imbued with the spirit of various European literatures. In 1829 Mr. Longfellow returned to his native country, and two years afterwards married. In 1835 he succeeded Mr. George Ticknor as Professor of Belles Lettres in Harvard College, and the same year he paid a second visit to Europe; Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Germany, the Tyrol and Switzerland were all visited in succession. During his stay at Rotterdam Mr. Longfellow had the misfortune to lose his wife, and this event invested "the ancient city with an undying interest in his memory." Some years later he visited Europe for a third time, and in 1843 he again married. In 1854 he retired from his professorship in Harvard College—which he had held for twenty years—in order to devote himself exclusively to literary pursuits. For upwards of forty years he has occupied the Craigie House, Cambridge, the headquarters of General Washington after the battle of Bunker's Hill. The history of Craigie House (which has been the residence of many distinguished Americans) is agreeably narrated in the "Homes of American Authors," by Mr. G. W. Curtis.

The mere mention of the works of this author would occupy a considerable space. Very early in life we find him a contributor to the North American Review, and two of his papers in that well-known periodical, entitled respectively "An Essay on Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy," and the "Moral and Devotional Poetry of Spain" attracted great attention. But original poetical composition also early engaged his attention, and before the age of eighteen he had written "Woods in Winter," "An April Day," and other popular short pieces. Alike in matter and style these poems must be pronounced remarkable as the production of a mere youth. One who was no mean poet himself wrote of Longfellow in 1840: "The poetry of Mr. Longfellow is marked by a very vivid imagination; great susceptibility to the impressions of natural scenery, and a ready perception of the analogies between natural objects and the feelings of the human heart. But, besides this, he possesses an extraordinary command over the powers of language, and turns it into any form at will—

'Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.'

Mr. Longfellow's "Outre Mer: a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea," the first of his prose works, appeared in 1835, and was followed two years later by "Hyperion, a Romance." So popular was the latter work that fifteen thousand copies of it were sold in twenty years. An English critic, the late George Gilfillan, interpreted the general feeling in regard to this work when he described its charm as lying "partly in the 'excelsior' progress of the hero's mind, partly in the sketches of the great German authors, and principally in the sparkling imagery, and waving billowy language of the book. Longfellow in this work is Jean Paul Richter, without his grotesque extravagancies, or riotous humour, or turbulent force." It was undoubtedly a most successful effort in romantic fiction. "The Voices of the Night," a series of poems containing some of the most pathetic utterances of the poet, were published in a collected form in 1839. Who has not been moved by the solemnity which pervades the "Hymn to the Night," "The Reaper and the Flowers," "The Light of Stars," "Footsteps of Angels," and "The Midnight Mass for the Dying Year?" In all these poems the author directly appealed to the human heart, and awoke in it responsive chords. The sale of this and other works appears almost fabulous. In 1857, that is, only eighteen years after the first publication of the "Voices of the Night," forty-three thousand copies had been disposed of, and it is not too much to assume that since that time the number of copies has been doubled.

In 1841 Mr. Longfellow published his "Ballads and other Poems," a collection including those favourite lyrics "The Village Blacksmith," "The Skeleton in Armour," and "The Wreck of the Hesperus." Edgar Allan Poe, with a personality to be regretted as coming from a brother poet, attacked this volume on the ground that the writer regarded the inculcation of a moral as essential. The highest morality is taught by the greatest poets, and it is somewhat extraordinary to find this objected to. To the manner of teaching morality objection may frequently fairly be taken, but this is another matter. The same critic adversely reviewed the "Poems on Slavery" and "The Spanish Student," alleging that "a man of genius has no business with these hybrid and paradoxical compositions." Poe, however, stood alone; Mr. Whipple representing the popular sentiment when he observed that in "The Spanish Student" Mr. Longfellow most strikingly manifested the affluence of his imagination in images of grace, grandeur and beauty. "None of his other pieces so well illustrate all his poetical qualities—his imagination, his fancy, his sentiment and his manner. It seems to comprehend the whole extent of his 'genius.'" In 1846 appeared "The Belfry of Bruges, and other Poems," and in 1847 "Evangeline: a Tale of Acadie." This picture of life in primitive Nova Scotia is charged with tenderness, and distinguished for the intensity of its local colouring. The historical incidents upon which this beautiful legendary poem are founded are now matter of almost universal knowledge. The inhabitants of Acadie, or Nova Scotia, having been suspected of giving assistance to the French (their ancestors) by the British Government, were exiled from their homes under circumstances of great hardship, and distributed over other English colonies. Out of the sufferings of some of these expatriated people the poet has woven a touching narrative, interspersed with passages of exquisite description of natural scenery. The story of Gabriel and Evangeline, with its tragic ending, is told with genuine pathos, and the poem remains one of the best monuments of its author's genius. A distinguished English painter, Mr. T. Faed, R.A., gave an admirable representation of Evangeline, and Mr. Longfellow, in acknowledging the excellence of the picture, wrote:—"I am delighted with the work, both in conception and execution, and have written to Mr. Faed to express my acknowledgment for this mark of his consideration and my appreciation of the very great beauty and feeling of his illustration."

After the publication of "Kavanagh," a story of New England life, Mr. Longfellow devoted a considerable portion of his learned leisure to the compilation of "The Poets and Poetry of Europe," embracing biographical notices and translations from the earliest period to the present time. No fewer than three hundred and sixty authors are laid under contribution in this work, and Mr. Longfellow—whose linguistic powers are well known—has himself translated poems from the Anglo-Saxon, Swedish, Dutch, German, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese. In 1855 was published "The Song of Hiawatha," a poem which has enjoyed an almost unprecedented run of popularity. It is not unworthy of the designation which has been claimed for it of an Indian Edda. In indicating its origin, the author states that it is founded on a tradition prevalent among the North American Indians, of a personage of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing grounds, and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among different tribes by the several names of Michaboa, Chiabo, Manabozo, Tarenawagan, and Hiawatha. Into the old tradition were woven other curious Indian legends. The scene of the poem is among the Ojibways, on the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the region between the Pictured Rocks and the Grand Gable. Within a month after the publication of this poem ten thousand copies had been sold, and in two years and a half the number had risen to fifty thousand—figures to which we can offer no parallel in the sale of works by our English poets. "Hiawatha" exhibits much picturesque grandeur in its descriptions of river and mountain scenery. A charge was made against the writer that in its production he had borrowed "the form, spirit, and many of the most striking incidents of Kalevala"—the great national epic of the Finns—but the groundlessness of this allegation was conclusively proved. The English and American critical journals vied with each other in commending the striking poetic merits of this production, and by many persons on both sides of the Atlantic it was regarded as the poet's most original work. Not long after its issue the poem could be readily procured in London, Paris, Rome, Vienna, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Brussels, Basle, Turin, Trieste, Venice, and Verona. Mr. Bright, in a speech at Manchester, after making some references to Mr. Tennyson's war lyrics, said:—"I have had the opportunity lately of reading a poem from another country, written by the American poet Longfellow—a poem which treats of the legends of the Indian tribes—and, while I have turned from the poem of our poet Laureate ('Maud'), in which I find him descending to slang of almost the grossest character, I turn with delight to the exquisite poem which has come to us from the other side of the Atlantic." Another eminent man, superior as a critic to Mr. Bright, viz., Cardinal Wiseman, also confessed his high admiration for this poem.

Another narrative poem by Mr. Longfellow, which acquired great popularity, was "The Courtship of Miles Standish," published in 1858. Written in the hexameter measure, it is concerned, like others of its predecessors, with American history, in the "long-ago." Miles Standish is a fine, stalwart soldier, but while he gives the title to the work, the main interest centres in the history of the Puritan maiden, Priscilla. Though the strong warrior is not afraid of the perils of the field, he quails before a personal courtship of the modest and beautiful Priscilla. He accordingly woos by proxy, but with disastrous results. Sending as his representative, John Alden, a handsome, attractive youth, the latter wins the maiden's heart ere he is aware of the fact, but Priscilla archly reveals the state of her own feelings by the question, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" He improves his opportunities accordingly, and Standish afterwards puts the best and most graceful face upon the affair that he can. In all probability this story would have been more popular still but for its setting. Both this and other works of the poet have been admirably illustrated by English artists. In 1864 Mr. Longfellow again appeared as an author with "The Tales of a Wayside Inn," a volume which "connects the nature of the New World with the pathetic romances and stirring Northern legends of the Old." Some of these tales are exceedingly quaint, and all are tinged with a spirit at once elevated and practical. The "New England Tragedies," issued in 1868, consist of two dramas, entitled "John Endicott," a tale of the persecution of the Quakers, 1665; and "Giles Corey of the Salem Farms," a tale of the witchcraft times, 1692. These tragedies excellently reflect the manners and spirit of the old Puritan days. They were succeeded in 1870 by "The Divine Tragedy," a volume consisting of the leading passages of the life of Christ, pictured as a dramatic poem—in effect, a poetic version of the chief events of the Gospel, arranged in the order of time. Not long afterwards came "Christus: a Mystery." Three dramatic poems, hitherto detached, were now grouped into a unity of poetic effort, in the following order—Part I. "The Divine Tragedy;" Part II. "The Golden Legend;" Part III. "New England Tragedies." Prologues and interludes furnished the connecting links between these poems, and the author added a concluding section, wherein he epitomised the teachings of the whole. Mr. Bayard Taylor, in reviewing this volume, observed that "the publication of the 'Divine Tragedy' marks the most important period of the life of its illustrious author, and thus becomes an event of special significance in American literature. The theme, so old and so often attempted, is in itself almost a challenge. As no sect can specially claim, so none can reject, the Christ he has transferred from the Gospels. What Mr. Longfellow has not done in the work is even a more striking evidence of his genius than what he has done."

In 1872, "Three Books of Song" appeared. The first part of this work consisted of a second series of the "Tales of a Wayside Inn." Again the legends are distinguished for their high moral purpose. The second book is the drama of "Judas Macabæus," which deals with the struggle of the Jews for the religious independence of their nation. Part third consists of translations from the Persian, French, German, and Italian. "The Hanging of the Crane" was published in 1874, succeeding a volume of miscellaneous poems entitled "Aftermath;" the "Masque of Pandora" was published in 1875, also a graceful poem, "Morituri Salutamus," written for the fiftieth anniversary of the class of 1825 in Bowdoin College, and forming a touching remembrance of departed days; and "Kéramos" appeared in 1878.

We have already referred to the popularity of Mr. Longfellow's works, but it may now be stated that up to the year 1857 the American editions alone reached a sale of three hundred and twenty-five thousand copies. Since that time the sale in the United States, taking a most moderate computation, must have touched at least half a million of copies, and if we include the sale in England, and the Colonies as well, we should have, no doubt, a total number of upwards of one million copies of the works of this one poet in circulation. Amongst modern writers, only Dickens, in fiction, can equal the favour with which he is regarded.

Mr. Longfellow is the Psalmist amongst modern poets, and the union of so much music with sweetness, strength, and simplicity, has rarely been witnessed. He is the poet of the poor and the illiterate as well as of the learned and the wealthy. His language is of the clearest, and there is probably not one passage in his works which cannot be readily understood by the most casual reader, even if his allusions cannot always be traced. The reason why he has such a hold upon mankind must be sought for chiefly in his earnestness, and in his faith in man and the Divine. His poetry is soothing and elevating; and no one can lay down his books without feeling that the writer has done something towards alleviating the burden of humanity. As one who best understood him remarked:—"The secret of his popularity as a poet is probably that of all similar popularity—viz., the fact that his poetry expresses a universal sentiment in the simplest and most melodious manner. Each of his most noted poems is the issue of a feeling common to every mind in moods into which every mind is liable to fall. Thus, 'A Psalm of Life,' 'Footsteps of Angels,' 'To the River Charles,' 'Excelsior,' 'The Bridge,' 'The Gleam of Sunshine,' 'The Day is Done,' 'The Old Clock on the Stairs,' 'The Arrow and the Song,' 'The Fire of Driftwood,' 'Twilight,' 'The Open Window,' are all most adequate and inexpressibly delicate renderings of quite universal emotions. There is a humanity in them which is irresistible in the fit measures to which they are wedded. If some elegiac poets have strung rosaries of tears, there is a weakness of woe in their verses which repels; but the quiet, pensive thought—the twilight of the mind, in which the little facts of life are saddened in their relation to the eternal laws, time and change—this is the meditation and mourning of every manly heart, and this is the alluring and permanent charm of Longfellow's poetry." Into every part of the habitable globe Longfellow's lyrics have penetrated. The spirit which permeates them all is excellent and pure, and calculated to lift humanity out of its misery and degradation. They bear the message of hope for the whole human race.

That singular peculiarity of his mind by which he is able to assimilate alike the lessons of the past and the present has been well defined by a living critic. "It is at once his aid and his merit," says this writer, "that he can reproduce the choice pictures of the past and of other minds with new accessories of his own, so that the quaint old poets of Germany, the singers of the past centuries, the poetical vision and earnest teachings of Goethe, and the everyday humours of Jean Paul, as it were, come to live among us in American homes and landscape. This interpretation in its highest form is one of the rarest benefits which the scholar can bestow upon his country. The genius of Longfellow has given us an American idyl, based on a touching episode of ante-revolutionary history, parallel with the 'Hermann and Dorothea' of Goethe; in the exquisite story of 'Evangeline' has shown us how Richter might have surveyed the higher and inferior conditions—the schoolmaster, the clergyman, the lovers, and the rustics of a New England village in his tale of 'Kavanagh'; has reproduced the simple elegance of the lighter Spanish drama in his play of 'The Students'; and in his 'Golden Legend' has carried us, in his ingenious verse, to the heart of the Middle Ages, showing us the most poetic aspects of the lives of scholars, churchmen, and villagers; how they sang, travelled, practised logic, medicine, and divinity, and with what miracle-plays, jest, and grim literature they were entertained. His originality and peculiar merit consist in these felicitous transformations. If he were simply a scholar, he would be but an annalist, or an annotator, but being a poet of taste and imagination, with an ardent sympathy for all good and refined traits in the world, and for all forms of this objective life of others, his writings being the very emanations of a kind, generous nature, he has succeeded in reaching the heart of the public. All men relish art and literature when they are free from pendency. We are all pleased with pictures, and like to be charmed with thinking nobly and acting well by the delights of fancy." This criticism, nevertheless, admirable and searching as it is, still leaves something to be desired in estimating Longfellow's influence. Many poets have shown similar qualities to those enumerated, but they have failed to acquire a permanent hold upon men. We must go deeper, and come to the moral force, amongst other qualities, so conspicuous in Longfellow. We see him take the deeper, softer emotions of the human heart, and play upon them at will. In such poems as "Resignation" he touches the pathetic chord, and few have shown an equal mastery over the "music of sorrow." He teaches us that the lessons of death are full of a hidden meaning instinct with hope, and demonstrates that it is the office of the poet to bring these lessons forth, and set them strongly in the light on behalf of his fellows. He is, moreover, the foe of war, as his noble verses on the "Arsenal at Springfield" testify. He anticipates the time when the world shall be lapped in peace, and when

"Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter, and then cease,
And, like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear once more the voice of Christ say 'Peace!'"

"Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
The blast of war's great organ shakes the skies;
But, beautiful as songs of the immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise."

He is also a patriot, as witness the lyric, "The Building of the Ship." But not confining himself to an affectionate regard for his own country, his sympathies are cosmopolitan; and his Christianity and his natural sentiments alike revolt from the practice of slavery. Longfellow laboured energetically with Channing and others to sweep away the nefarious traffic in human lives. His poems upon slavery are full of moral indignation, and gleam with the electric current of sympathy with the oppressed. Perceiving the danger of the traffic to the Commonwealth, he compared the poor, despised slave with Samson, who might one day rise and avenge himself upon his enemies by pulling down the pillars of the State. The champions of human freedom have fortunately lived to see the curse of slavery removed from the States.

Longfellow is successful in three kinds of poetic effort—the descriptive, the dramatic, and the lyrical. Facile in depicting the moods of Nature, he has also considerable power in the delineation of human passion. This will have been gathered from what we have already remarked in mentioning his various works in their chronological order. The dramatic faculty, however, is not so strong in him as the lyrical. A comparison between "The Spanish Student" and such stirring lyrics as "Victor Galbraith" will clearly show this. He is emphatically a poet of the people, and, as one writer has remarked, there is no greater lack in English literature than that of such a poet—"one who shall be to the labouring classes of England what Goethe is to the peasant of Germany. He was a true philosopher who said, 'Let me make the songs of a Nation and I care not who makes its laws.' There is one writer who approaches nearer than any other to this standard; and he has already gained such a hold on our hearts that it is almost unnecessary for me to mention his name. Our hemisphere cannot claim the honour of having brought him forth; but still he belongs to us, for his works have become as household words wherever the English language is spoken. And, whether we are charmed by his imagery, or soothed by his melodious versification, or elevated by the high moral teachings of his pure muse, or follow with sympathising hearts the wanderings of 'Evangeline,' I am sure that all who hear my voice will join with me in the tribute I desire to pay to the genius of Longfellow." In our admiration for his original poems, we must not omit to mention the many masterly translations which Mr. Longfellow has executed. His first published work was a translation of Don Jorge Manrique's fine ode on the death of his father. His latest is an admirable selection, entitled "Poems of Places." The two volumes devoted to England and Wales take a very wide range, and form as pleasant reading as can well nigh be conceived. Mr. Longfellow states that this collection has been made partly for the pleasure of making it, and partly for the pleasure he hopes it may give to those who shall read its pages. "It is the voice of the poets expressing their delight in the scenes of nature, and, like the song of the birds, surrounding the earth with music. For myself, I confess that these poems have an indescribable charm, as showing how the affections of men have gone forth to their favourite haunts, and consecrated them for ever." The collection teems with descriptions of the natural beauties of the mother country.

Many of Mr. Longfellow's works have been translated into continental languages. Mr. J. T. Fields, an intimate friend of the poet, furnishes some interesting details respecting his methods of composition. The famous lyric, "Excelsior," was written late one autumn evening, in 1841, when the word happened to catch his eye upon a torn piece of newspaper. Longfellow's imagination was at once kindled; he seized the first scrap of paper at hand, and immediately penned the stanzas which have since become "familiar in our mouths as household words." The "Psalm of Life" sprang into being one bright summer morning in Cambridge, as the writer sat between two windows at a small table in the corner of his chamber. Several of his poems were composed at one sitting, and in a brief period, his inspiration coming not by single lines but by whole stanzas. That powerful ballad, "The Wreck of the Hesperus," was written during one night after a very violent storm, and the clock was striking three as he finished the last stanza. His writings have not been the productions of protracted labour. It may be mentioned here that a short time ago the "spreading chestnut tree," immortalised in the "Village Blacksmith," was cut down, and that the children of Cambridge subscribed to have an arm-chair made from it, which in due course was presented to Mr. Longfellow. He returned his thanks for the well-timed present in a beautiful and touching poem.

Some years ago Mr. Longfellow had the misfortune to lose his second wife by a very painful death. A muslin dress which she was wearing having accidentally caught fire, the flames could not be extinguished until she had sustained fatal injuries. The poet has a family of three sons and two daughters. One of his sons, Mr. Ernest Longfellow, who is an artist of repute, has recently made the tour of Europe.

Ten years ago Mr. Longfellow once more visited England, when the honorary degree of D.C.L. was conferred upon him by the University of Oxford. This was in July, 1869, and a few years later he was elected a member of the Russian Academy of Science. In 1874 he was nominated to the Lord Rectorship of the University of Edinburgh, and although he was defeated by Mr. Disraeli, the large number of votes he received attested his popularity in the Modern Athens. In religion he was a Unitarian, but he delighted in a high liturgical form of worship. As may be gathered from his writings, he was a passionate admirer of art, and of the beautiful in every shape. His brother is a Unitarian minister still living, the Rev. Samuel Longfellow, himself a sacred poet and hymnologist of no small reputation.

The funeral ceremony took place at Mount Auburn Cemetery on Sunday last, and large numbers of Americans were present to pay the last tribute of respect to their distinguished countryman. Among these were Ralph Waldo Emerson, J. Greenleaf Whittier, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Alexander Agassiz, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, President Eliot (Harvard College), Bronson Alcott, Richard H. Dana, and George William Cortis. The funeral address was pronounced by Professor Everett (Unitarian), but it took the form, not of an elaborate eulogy of a world-renowned poet, but rather of a brief and simple memorial of a neighbour, a townsman, and a friend, who was also a poet. The arrangements altogether were studiously simple, a single spray of passion-flower laid across the plain coffin, symbolising the fervent affection and unity of thought towards the departed, which could not have been more suggestively conveyed by the utmost profusion of wreaths and immortelles.

PROFESSOR THOMAS HILL GREEN, M.A., died at Oxford on Sunday at the age of forty-five. After a brilliant career as an undergraduate at Balliol, where he took his B.A. degree in 1859, and after writing the English Essay (1862), Mr. Green was made Fellow and Tutor of his College, and for many years undertook more especially the philosophic teaching of the Honour students. His great and recognised success in his work, as a teacher mainly of the Hegelian School of Philosophy, brought him not only the affection and esteem of a large circle of pupils, but also led to his appointment as Whyte's Professor of Moral Philosophy, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Wilson, the late President of Corpus Christi College. Relieved by this of the main part of his college duties, Professor Green was now able to give more time and attention to political and social questions, especially as they affected the welfare of the city of Oxford. A strong and sound Liberal, he took an active part in the political education of the citizens, and his speeches, whether as an advocate of Liberal opinions or of temperance, of which he was a warm supporter, will long be remembered in Oxford. The respect felt for his high character and abilities led the citizens to desire his presence in the Town Council, to which he was elected six years ago for the North Ward, and in this double and unique position of University Professor and Civic Councillor he exerted all, and more than all, his strength in advancing and developing education. His liberality dwelt harmoniously with a strong personal piety; as Fellow of Balliol, though a layman, he claimed and exercised his right of preaching in the College Hall; a sermon of his on the Holy Communion was privately printed and circulated among his friends. Otherwise Professor Green has not left behind much to give evidence of his high literary powers. His edition of Hume's Essays has taken a place among standard textbooks.

THE LIBERAL SOCIAL UNION.—The monthly meeting of this Society was held on Thursday evening, at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, which were hung with the pictures of the Exhibition just opened. Mr. Alfred Preston occupied the chair, and there was an unusually large attendance. A paper was read by Mr. Moncure D. Conway, M.A., on "Carlyle, and Hero-Worship." Mr. Conway's address chiefly related to Carlyle's "Reminiscences," a book which he thought an unfortunate manifestation of irritable temper and cynical personal criticisms; and of the "Heroes and Hero Worshipers," which greatly exaggerated, as the Essayist maintained, the characters and influence of his "heroes," and ignored their defects and limitations. In the course of the discussion that followed Mr. Wade expressed his disappointment with the paper, which he regarded as lowering Carlyle's character by dwelling on the small personal matters in the "Reminiscences" and the defects of his genius. Mr. Cullis expressed his concurrence with Mr. Wade, and thought that while Mr. Carlyle might say "Save me from my friends," he would probably add that it was best that the whole truth should be thought and said about him. Mr. Reed vindicated the Essay, and maintained that Carlyle's teaching on hero-worship was exaggerated and distorted. At the same time, the earnest love of truth which he breathed into an age of idolatry and shams was his essential characteristic that made him an inspiring influence in this modern world. The Rev. Slade Jones expressed his regret at some of the views expressed by Mr. Conway, especially when he spoke of Christ as partaking of the limitations of his age. Mr. Eiloart disapproved of many of the views of the Essayist, and spoke feelingly of Carlyle's worship of his wife. Mr. Rees and one or two other speakers added a few remarks, and Mr. Conway's reply, explaining and vindicating some of the views he has expressed brought to a close an unusually interesting and animated discussion.

MR. SAMUEL JOHNSON died recently at his home in North Andover, Massachusetts. Mr. Johnson was a scholarly writer on Oriental religions, and was engaged on his third volume, "The Religions of Persia," when overtaken by the illness of which he died. Mr. Johnson was a prominent advocate of Abolitionism, and a member of the Free Religious Association, and was formerly a Unitarian minister.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Weak Stomachs. The distressing symptoms arising from enfeebled digestion are almost numberless, and all of them can be readily dispelled by these admirable Pills. They clean the furred tongue and remove all unpleasant tastes from the mouth, with flatulency, and constipation. Holloway's Pills rouse the stomach, liver, and every other organ, helping digestion to that healthy tone which fully enables it to convert all we eat and drink to the nourishment of our bodies. Hence these Pills are the surest strengtheners and the safest restoratives in nervousness, wasting and chronic debility. Holloway's Pills are infallible remedies for impaired appetite, eructations, and a multitude of other disagreeable symptoms, which render miserable the lives of thousands of our fellow-creatures. These Pills are approved by all classes.

THE DECAY OF PREACHING.

DEFECTIVE TYPES.

RETURNING once more to the Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY'S interesting book, to which we have referred in two preceding articles, we have to consider now some "defective types" of preaching. Here our author speaks with all the experience of an old theological lecturer, although many of his remarks apply more particularly to the somewhat exceptional position of the Irish Episcopal Church, with its intensely narrow dogmatism, which has banished Broad Churchism to the more congenial soil of England, than to either the Established Church or any of the more cultured Nonconformist Churches of this country.

Defective types of preaching are due rather to defective training than to want of ability. Men fall into extremes, and are guilty of exaggerations because, according to our author, they have not been carefully warned to maintain the balance of Christian doctrine. Mr. MAHAFFY himself, we presume, is a divine of unimpeachable orthodoxy, but it is not a little significant of the altered tone of some of the leaders of thought in even the old strongholds of the Evangelical faith that he deprecates in almost as strong terms as we could use the general types of exaggeration to be found in the average doctrinal preaching of the day. Take, for example, the two instances he gives of errors in preaching.

One is to be found in the numerous discourses still to be heard in most of the popular pulpits, both of the Established and Nonconformist Churches, which "profess to explain the Atonement of CHRIST as a sort of bargain or equivalent offered to GOD for the sins of mankind. The demands of the Creator are set down with painful precision, as if they were those of an exacting creditor; and we are told that the magnitude of the payment must be exactly proportioned to that of the debt." No severer indictment, Mr. MAHAFFY justly says, can be brought not only against the mercy but against the justice of the Deity than this account of vicarious punishment; and it is no wonder that the doctrine in its harsher form is vanishing from the real creed of thoughtful persons.

The next "defective type" is the old argument, not to be heard only in remote country places, as Mr. MAHAFFY, seems to imagine, but often in the popular preaching of metropolitan Boanergeses, that the eternal punishment of sinners is to be explained and justified by the fact that sin against an infinite Being is an act of infinite enormity, and therefore necessitates infinite punishment. In the earlier preaching of the Church, as our author reminds us, there was no subject, which obtained more painful prominence than the punishment of the wicked. "Harrowing pictures were drawn of the eternal miseries of the damned, and art was summoned to aid by horrible illustrations the language of the pulpit. It was considered that the terror of hell-fire would be a potent incentive to turn men from vice and heresy, and lead them to embrace orthodoxy and pursue virtue." This reason is still alleged by those who preach their gospel of terror and damnation. The doctrine is profitable and expedient, they say. Whether it is credible or not is quite another matter. Whether it does not create a fearful reaction against all religion is a deeper question still, which they often seem to be incapable of understanding. Mr. MAHAFFY testifies without any reserve that in our day even the orthodox have become undecided about this once cherished dogma; and that "in any educated congregation the majority regard it as a sort of obsolete appendix to their creed, which they lay aside and forget, but which they will not positively deny unless they are pressed."

Akin to this error in preaching is another referred to by our author; the propounding of that Calvinistic side of religion which insists upon the small number of the elect, and the great number of those who will fall short of the kingdom of heaven. The day is gone by when even so great an orator as MASSILLON could terrify a congregation by a sermon on this subject, or when a JONATHAN EDWARDS could make a whole congregation start to their feet with the anxious inquiry trembling on every lip, "How shall we escape the infinite wrath of GOD?" The doctrine of election may be felt a great privilege by many true Christians, adds Mr. MAHAFFY with scarcely veiled sarcasm, and yet to preach it, he says, with special insistence upon its corollary—the multitude of the damned—is an excess of orthodoxy which discredits a modern preacher. He adds that even attacks on extreme Calvinism are now out of date, and that most people regard it as a waste of energy to combat a doctrine so little in sympathy with the temper of modern society and the belief of most Christians. All this, although it contains no lesson or warning for us, is especially satisfactory as indicating that Liberal thought is permeating the Orthodox world, and in various quarters is fast converting the once popular dogmatic theology into a series of dissolving views.

It is a very suggestive remark that if a modern Protestant and a Christian of the second century met in the flesh they would be astonished at the mutual divergence in their spiritual views; that an absolutely unmodified return to what existed centuries ago is perfectly impossible, since any restoration must contain much that is new, infused into it by the spirit of the age. Hence there is such a thing even in the extreme Protestant forms of religion as "a development of doctrine," or a drifting of public sentiment into changed forms of religious thought and life.

We may pass by what our author says of the Emotional extreme and of Sentimental appeals, because preachers in our own Churches, whatever faults they may have, are not in the slightest danger of excess in that direction. Our tendency is quite to the opposite extreme of cold propriety and frigid moralising. We seem to have thought that religion was to be acquired only by way of cold argument, and have regarded with suspicion all appeals to the heart as savouring of mysticism. Rational persuasion is, we grant, the noblest and gravest kind of eloquence, and all true preaching is based upon it as the fundamental substratum, but there is no reason whatever why the persuasion which is primarily addressed to the understanding should not be combined with appeals to the emotions and to those deeper sympathies which form the true uniting band of our common humanity. And this kind of preaching when free from artificial rhetoric and mere verbiage will always gain attention and respect, because it is the genuine appeal to the judgment and the affection and the conscience by earnest men speaking with competent knowledge and power on subjects of universal human interest.

DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY.

IV.—THE SEPARATE PERSONALITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

NOT the above, but "The Doctrine of the Spirit," is the heading given by the Rev. JOHN HUNTER to his fifth discourse on Evangelical truths re-stated. It confirms in a striking manner what we have said before in the course of these criticisms. The distinctive feature of the old Orthodoxy—that which prominently distinguished it from Unitarianism on this subject—is wholly absent. We mean the separate personality of the Holy Spirit as the third person of the Trinity equal in power and glory to God the Father, and God the Son, and called God the Holy Ghost. This, as every one knows, is the orthodox doctrine, and this there is no attempt in Mr. HUNTER's lecture to prove. This also is the doctrine which Unitarians reject as without valid ground in Scripture, and inconsistent with the doctrine of the Divine Unity. What Mr. HUNTER really gives us is a spiritual interpretation of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit—an interpretation which he might hear given in many a Unitarian pulpit, and in nearly the same terms. We do not wish to imply that our author does not believe in the separate personality of the Holy Ghost as the third divinity in the Godhead, we only say there is no reference to it in the discourse of which a tolerably full report is now before us. But to omit this view is to leave out the distinctive feature which separates the current theology on this point from spiritual Unitarianism. The ordinary Unitarian believes in the Holy Spirit as God himself in communion with the human soul, enlightening, sustaining, blessing, inspiring the open receptive spirit at all times. This doctrine of Divine influence is as firmly held by us as by our orthodox brethren. What we cannot accept is the notion that this Divine influence proceeds from the third personal division of the Godhead. This we reject as an ecclesiastical fiction.

The doctrine of the Spirit, Mr. HUNTER says, in substance is this—that God is a living personal spirit, in direct immediate communion with the souls of men, dwelling not only without us, but within us, not only in the immensities of the universe, but in the minds, hearts, spirits, consciences of his children—the Life of their life. In matter and its forces and forms God is immanent, renewing every day the miracle of creation, giving to nature that mysterious power which makes its sights and sounds so quickening to our awe and reverence, and so soothing and uplifting in their influence on the weary heart; but the Spirit which moves on the face of the waters and fills heaven and earth with his glory is present in a special and unique sense in man. We have a nature which makes possible the closest union with God, a nature which is essentially His nature; hence no relation can be so intimate and immediate, and no being so near as God may be to us, so perceptible, apprehensible, accessible. Because we are spiritual beings we are open, as insensate nature cannot be, to “the tides of the Spirit,” and our growing spirituality is a growing revelation of the indwelling God.

What is there in all this inconsistent with Unitarianism? What is it but a fine exposition of the more spiritual side of our belief? It may be that some Unitarians have not given sufficient prominence to this doctrine, but that was not because it did not accord with Unitarian theology. And we think we may venture the opinion that this spiritual Unitarianism is more common in our pulpits to-day than it was a generation or two ago. Under the influence of Dr. MARTINEAU and others a spiritual school has sprung up amongst us which has become the prevailing aspect of modern Unitarianism. By all who belong to this school Mr. HUNTER's exposition would be not only approved, it would be most welcome and acceptable.

In the first part of his discourse Mr. HUNTER speaks of the Holy Spirit as “a natural and universal influence in humanity, the ground of all power, the inspiring breath by which all intellectual and moral energy lives.” This, we believe, is the just view to take. It is also noble and catholic in a high degree, and regards a great subject in the broadest aspect possible. It rises above all sectarianism, all exclusiveness, all narrow partialities. “The guardian Deity which SOCRATES always felt had directed his course in life was the Spirit of God; and that love of truth and right which constitutes the grandeur of our humanity is to be traced to the Divine inspiration.” Thus inspiration is perpetual and universal, operating in humanity to-day, Mr. HUNTER implies, as immediately and directly as in the olden time. We do not think it is possible to form a nobler conception than this of the doctrine of the Spirit.

“In the Old Testament,” says our author, “the Spirit is represented as endowing man with knowledge, wisdom, and accuracy, prescience and insight; it lifted the veil from human life, and permitted us to see God as the originating power of all human excellence, the inspiration alike of artist, poet, lawgiver and prophet.” Very true, but the doctrine of the Spirit in the Old Testament knows nothing of the doctrine of the Trinity. It is not a separate personality in the godhead, but is perfectly consistent with the Hebrew monotheistic faith. The prominence of this doctrine in the Old Testament is quite sufficient to show that it is altogether independent of the dogma of the Trinity as Unitarians have constantly maintained. And how is the gift of the Spirit to be obtained? Mr. HUNTER points out, and his exposition seems to us eminently reasonable and just—“The gift of the Spirit is not arbitrary, coming and going according to no fixed law; obedience to all higher impulses lays open our nature to its tides; while all selfishness, worldliness, and wilfulness, by narrowing, hardening, and corrupting our nature, make us more and more incapable of receiving spiritual influences.” This we believe is the true view to take, and it could not be expressed in simpler or better terms; but this is not orthodoxy. The orthodox doctrine is that of the total depravity of human nature, that divine influences are foreign to it, that the gift of the Spirit is a supernatural influence brought to bear on our depraved nature, where effectual correcting its depravity, and bringing about what is called our conversion. How essentially this view differs from that given by Mr. HUNTER in the passage quoted above is obvious at a glance.

In the second part of his discourse, Mr. HUNTER proceeded to show that the doctrine of the Spirit, the indwelling God, was the very heart of the Christian faith, and the most sacred fact of Christian experience. “The Gospels and Epistles are full of the idea of God, as an immediate, quickening, inspiring, illuminating presence in the heart and life. They are the history of the Spirit, of a new manifestation of the Spirit, differing, not in kind but in degree, from the universal manifestation he had just described. CHRIST's work of revelation and reconciliation had made possible a larger outpouring of the Spirit; it had removed barriers of ignorance and sin which hindered the free action of God in man, and so long as the early Christian believers remained in sympathy and fellowship with CHRIST they possessed that power from on high which more than compensated for the loss of his visible presence.” Now, observe, the new manifestation of the Spirit differed not in kind but in degree only from the universal manifestation which Mr. HUNTER had described in these forcible terms:—“The indwelling Spirit is the fountain of moral life in man, the universal conscience, and all righteous living, all forms of moral and spiritual goodness are the voluntary and original manifestations of this Spirit.” Again, according to Mr. HUNTER, it was only “a larger outpouring of the Spirit” that CHRIST's work of reconciliation made possible. We are of opinion that the great majority of earnest orthodox believers would not be satisfied with this qualified statement. They would regard it as utterly inadequate, if not altogether misleading. We might quote other passages from this discourse conceding in principle what has hitherto been the distinctive teaching of Orthodoxy on this subject. But enough has been given for our present purpose, which is to show that in this re-statement of evangelical Orthodoxy the distinctive points which in past time have been stoutly maintained by its champions are ignored in a manner which amounts to their practical surrender. Here, then, we submit, under Mr. HUNTER's most able and ingenious manipulation, we are presented with another dissolving view of Orthodoxy.

THE CORONER AND THE ATHEIST.

LAST week Mr. ST. CLAIR BEDFORD was about to hold an inquest when a Mr. JOHNSON, who had been summoned on the jury, refused to take the oath, and being asked why, replied, “because I am an Atheist”; whereupon Mr. BEDFORD, according to the Daily News, exclaimed that “it was a terrible announcement for any one to make, and it would have become the man better had he said he objected to be sworn on religious scruples.” From this it appears that the Coroner would have preferred the sham decency of hypocrisy to the frank, and apparently quite honest avowal of an unorthodox opinion. If Mr. JOHNSON had professed to entertain religious objections to the oath without giving any description of their nature he would have been understood to mean that he held some kind of opinions which would be generally regarded as religious. This would not have been truthful, because, although Atheism is not necessarily without a peculiar religion, it is certainly destitute of what is usually meant by that word. If a follower of COMTE claims to be influenced by a “religion of humanity,” it is not for other people to deny the statement, though they may feel that in their own minds there could be no religion without a Deity as the object of its worship. As a fact of human history, the religious sentiments of awe, reverence, and aspiration have existed, and do exist, among people who are not believers in a Divine personality, and who cannot be ranked as Theists of any kind. There are coarse, vulgar forms of Atheism, just as there are coarse, vulgar forms of the Orthodox mythologies which are mistaken for Christianity, and there are reverent forms of Agnosticism and of positive disbelief in the existence of any Supreme Being. We know nothing about Mr. JOHNSON, and it is evident Mr. BEDFORD was equally misinformed concerning him, and surprised at his profession of unbelief. It was no part of the Coroner's business, and he had no right to impute any kind of blame to him for making a statement that offered the shortest and most complete explanation why he could not go through the customary ceremony. If Mr. JOHNSON belongs to that school of Atheism which claims to have a religion, his objection to oath-taking would yet be founded upon moral, and not upon religious scruples; and if he is one of those who profess no religion, still less could he without falsehood have acted as Mr. BEDFORD advised.

We regard Atheism as philosophically a mistake. The difficulties of Theism are far less, to our minds, than the impossibility of Atheism; and although we give conscientious doubters full credit for the high morality which many are known to exhibit, we do not believe that an Atheistic nation could do other than tumble into confusion and crime. But amongst the chief causes of Atheism must be reckoned the bad character which the Orthodox have usually assigned to their Deity. In many old mythologies there was no pretence about the matter. MOLOCH was not complimented for absolute benevolence, and then supplied with live victims in his dreadful fires; but many who think themselves Christians after ascribing, in words, every perfect quality to the Deity, represent his deeds as exemplifying the moral opposites to their laudations. An eternal Hell for the unbeliever is what they imagine he provides. Even men like Mr. SAMUEL MORLEY, who ought to reason upwards from their own benevolent nature, fancy that GOD will be angry with them if they do not try to keep an Atheist out of Parliament. What a poor and low conception of Deity is involved in such an idea!

Judges and magistrates who act like Mr. ST. CLAIR BEDFORD are practically encouragers of Atheism when they make their Theism the cause of rudeness and intolerance. A being who could act as they imagine would be a long way from Divine. The greatest difficulty of the Orthodox is to have a firm belief in the perfections of the Deity. It is idle to admit them in set phrases of worship, and then deny them by the ascription of qualities and conduct quite incongruous with them. The jealous, vindictive God of Hebrew priestcraft, never pacified without the shedding of blood, was as different as possible from the God of the enlightened Prophet to whom vain ceremonies were an abomination, and who demanded purity of heart, and loving-kindness in conduct. CHRIST's teaching was a continuation and expression of the highest thought of the Jewish prophet. Such a Being would punish no one for the misfortune of not knowing him, and for the ultimate conversion of the doubter would make him feel the sunshine of eternal love rather than consign him to the fires of Hell.

DUDLEY.—A social meeting of the Old Meeting congregation and their friends was held on Tuesday, the 28th of March, at the Public Hall of the Mechanics' Institute, when the number present at tea and during the concert was very nearly four hundred. The evening was spent most pleasantly in listening to the instrumental music and songs. The Rev. M. Gibson presided, and delivered an address, in which he gave some interesting details in connection with the formation of the congregation after the ejection of the two thousand ministers, nine of whom lived in the immediate district, and conducted the services. They continued meeting in private houses and other places till the passing of the Toleration Act, and some years afterwards the chapel was built, the trust being an open one, and their successors could thus follow whatever light God might send them. A band from Birmingham, chiefly composed of members of the Newhall-hill congregation, kindly gave their services on the occasion, which were much appreciated.

PORTSMOUTH.—On Wednesday week a bazaar and sale of useful and ornamental work took place in the upper schoolroom attached to the High-street Chapel, and it was continued on Thursday and Friday with gratifying results. The opening ceremony was performed by the Mayor (Mr. Alderman Whitcombe) shortly after two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, his remarks being kindly and appreciative, and followed by a handsome donation.

Mr. MUNDELLA will, after the Easter recess, reintroduce his Bill for dealing with Educational Trusts and Bequests in Scotland, so as to bring their management and operation more into harmony with the national system established under the Education Act.

ON MIRACLES.

Towards the end of last year, a well-known Unitarian minister, having delivered a lecture on some points of Unitarian belief, was asked by one of the audience what was the general belief among Unitarians concerning the resurrection of Jesus. In reply he stated, in effect, that while it was an open question among them, he considered that the majority of Unitarians, including himself, did not believe in the story of the resurrection as told in the New Testament. For my own part, I should say that this minister was right, and for the reasons to be given presently. And certainly this view of what Unitarians believe about the resurrection is corroborated by the opinion of those outside the denomination. An orthodox monthly publication recently said, "It is only a small minority of the present Unitarian ministers who believe in our Lord's miracles, in his resurrection, or in his being anything greater than an exceptional religious genius, wonderfully endowed, and with a wonderful personal influence."

But now by way of comment on these two statements there come two facts. A wealthy member of the congregation to which the minister referred to belonged, has withdrawn his subscription on the ground, among others, that the minister does not believe in the resurrection of Jesus. Another fact is, that the editor of a Unitarian journal states in reference to the criticism quoted above that "the minority is a far larger one than even Unitarians themselves generally suppose it to be. It includes, we believe, the majority of the Unitarian ministers of London." I make no pretension to speak positively as to the belief of the London ministers on the miracles, though I cannot help thinking that the statement is inaccurate. That is, however, a minor matter; what it is important to consider is, that if the question of belief or disbelief be an open one, it is regarded by some Unitarians as being so essential to his position, that a minister's disbelief in the resurrection is sufficient to justify the withdrawal of all support, and further, it is considered by a person holding the responsible position of editor of a Unitarian journal, that it is somewhat of a slur upon the denomination to assert that such disbelief prevails to a large extent.

It is a favourite reproach which orthodox believers cast at Unitarians that the latter do not believe in the supernatural, and, of course, if they consider that the truth of Christianity is attested by the miraculous events recorded in the Gospels, and that such truth must stand or fall with the belief that those events are historically true, the orthodox are right in reproaching the disbelievers. It may be worth while, then, even at this period, to consider (1) what is the evidential value of the miracles recorded of Jesus, assuming them to be true; and (2) what is the character of the evidence we have to support a belief in them.

On the assumption that the Gospel records of the miracles are historically true, what do they prove? They may be said to prove that Jesus was possessed of powers which may be properly termed "superhuman;" that he was able to do things that no man can do now; that as these powers are not, so far as we know, natural to man, he must have obtained them from that power outside nature which we call God. Do they really prove more than this, or does anything logically flow from what may be said to be proved? It seems to me that both these questions must be answered in the negative. Granting that Jesus was possessed of these superhuman powers, the fact does not prove that his moral teaching was true; that teaching can only recommend itself to reasonable beings by the fact that it corresponds with and answers to their own moral perceptions. No amount of superhuman power, nor the repeated displays thereof, could convince a good man, whose faith was based on reason, that immoral conduct was right and righteousness was an error. But it may be said that you do not convince reasonable men and unreasonable men in the same way; indeed, the argument which will convince one thoughtful man will not have the same influence upon another equally thoughtful. If this be so, may it not have been that the miracles which are recorded of Jesus were done to convince some persons that what he said and taught must be true? This is of course possible, but it is improbable, because it involves the suggestion that a false argument may be used to induce a true belief, and that is just what those who believe in God, or the moral perfection of Jesus, cannot conceive to be probable. But if Jesus did perform these miracles, as for the present it is assumed he did, must it not be further assumed that he, or God through him, had some object in view? Surely these wonders were not done for nothing. What was that object? Was it to convince the Jews that he was sent from God, and that therefore they were bound to obey him? If so, they signally failed; and this of itself casts a doubt upon the truth of the narratives of these miracles. A man who aims to be a leader of men, no doubt has to give some sort of evidence of his fitness for leadership before he can inspire faith. But the evidence must be applicable to the particular claim. For instance, the fact that a general is generally successful in battle, in conditions under which his great powers are called out, will inspire faith in him as a military leader; but the evidence thus afforded of his capacity as a soldier is no evidence that he is fitted to guide the destinies of a state. The useful and successful character of the works of a great engineer inspires us with confidence in his engineering skill and capacity, but they do not afford any evidence of his being able to act as a great moral teacher. The power of being able to walk on the sea, to raise the dead to life, to cure organic diseases, may prove that the possession of those powers can apparently overcome certain natural laws, but it cannot prove that he is capable of propounding the most profound spiritual and moral truths. The teaching of the Sermon on the Mount is wholly independent of the power of Jesus to work miracles.

It is said by some that the miracles recorded of Jesus attest his power to save men not only from sin, but from the effects of it. But not one of the recorded miracles shows that he ever did save a man from the effects of sin, and the mere possession of a superhuman, or, if you will, supernatural power manifested in one way, does not prove the capability to use it in another. It may be said that the performance of a miracle proves that the performer is specially favoured by the source and sustainer of all law, and that he therefore deserves our respectful homage as a messenger from the Most High, if, indeed, he is not the Most High himself in human form. This, however, does not carry the argument much further. If Jesus were God himself, then there was no miracle, because God, in the opinion of the orthodox believer, can do anything, and to thoughtful persons the Gospel miracles are but child's play compared to the far more wonderful occurrences of every day life, which we attribute to God. And if Jesus were a messenger specially sent by God, he differed only in a degree from others whose credentials are recorded in the Old Testament, but who are not regarded as equal in authority to Jesus. The raising of the widow's son from death by Elijah, or of the Shunamite's son by Elisha, his causing the iron to swim, the restoration of a man to life by the simple process of letting his body touch the bones of Elisha, the carrying up to heaven of Elijah, find their counterpart in several of the miracles of Jesus. At the same time, I can see that these latter, assuming their actual occurrence, convince some minds that Jesus had a special divine mission. Now, if the end to be gained is really attained, does it matter how? My answer to that is that it does, because, if a man bases his belief in God, or in a future life upon a line of argument flowing from a false premiss, he is likely to have the whole fabric of his belief shaken to pieces, if you demonstrate to him the worthlessness of the evidence in support of that premiss. And in these days, when the tendency of modern thought and criticism is almost entirely towards a disproof of the miraculous, this is an argument which cannot afford to be lost sight of. Can any one doubt that much of the prevailing scepticism owes its origin to the overthrow of the foundations upon which beliefs true enough in themselves had been mistakenly based?

But now let us consider the question. What evidence is there that the miracles recorded in the Gospels did occur? Apart from the miracle of the resurrection there are thirty-seven of these wonder narratives, though some of the accounts said to be miracles are indeed quite natural, and only serve to prove the anxiety to provide a wonder where none exists. For instance, there is what is called the miracle of providing tribute which is peculiar to the Gospel of Matthew, and is to be found there in the seventeenth chapter. As a matter of fact, the story is incomplete; the tribute is not provided. Then in the Gospel of Luke (chap. 4) the passing of Jesus unseen through a crowd, a similar event narrated in John's Gospel (chap. 8); the draughts of fishes told of in Luke (chap. 5) and in John (chap. 21) are all spoken of as miracles, though if they are attentively considered it will be seen that they are simply the records of by no means uncommon events. Even the casting out of the demons and their transfer into the herd of swine does not, when carefully studied, necessarily involve a miracle, rather it betokens a mistaken notion of cause and effect. In this view the thirty-seven miracles are reduced to thirty-one, a matter important only in this sense, that it reveals a tendency to attribute unnecessarily to Jesus miraculous powers, and weakens the testimony borne by the same persons as to other similar stories.

Of the other miracles there is only one which is common to the four Gospels, i.e., the feeding of the five thousand by the shore of the Lake of Galilee. It is true that a similar story is told in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark of a rather less number, but that has always seemed to me to be really the same story, with the simple variation of four for five. Otherwise it is wholly incredible that the disciples, having witnessed the one, could have found it necessary on a second occasion to interrogate Jesus as to how the multitude should be fed. It may be useful here to note the number of miracles recorded in each of the Gospels, and the following table will show it at a glance:—

Matthew narrates altogether	20
Matthew narrates alone	3
Matthew and Mark narrate	3
Matthew and Luke narrate	2
Matthew, Mark and Luke narrate	10
Matthew, Mark and John narrate	1
Matthew and the three other Evangelists narrate	1
Mark narrates altogether	18
Mark narrates alone	2
Mark and Matthew narrate	3
Mark and Luke narrate	1
Mark, Matthew and Luke narrate	10
Mark, Matthew and John narrate	1
Mark and the three other Evangelists narrate	1
Luke narrates altogether	21
Luke narrates alone	7
Luke and Matthew narrate	2
Luke and Mark narrate	1
Luke, Matthew and Mark narrate	10
Luke and the three other Evangelists narrate	1
John narrates altogether	9
John narrates alone	7
John, Matthew and Mark narrate	1

The evidence therefore that we have of the miracles is the account given by four writers, two of whom at least were not eye witness of the events they record, and all of these do not tell the whole of the stories. It is admitted on all hands that most of these events are contrary to the course of nature, so far as it is understood by us, and therefore, as it seems to me, very strong evidence is required to establish a belief that they really occurred. Does such evidence exist? We have what are said to be the statements of four persons as to one event, of three persons as to eleven events, of two persons as to six events, of one person as to nineteen events of this character. Indeed, this is putting the matter rather higher than truth really allows. We have not the direct evidence even of those who purport to be eye-witnesses; we are not quite certain that we know who the real writers were, and are dependent on tradition to a large extent to guide us in the matter. As to the identity of one of the writers, there is a controversy yet undecided—in one view he had peculiar facilities for speaking on the details of the life of Jesus, in another he had hardly any. Allowing the former view to prevail, we find that he is the narrator of the fewest number of miracles, and yet only two that he tells are also told by others. He tells also one of the most remarkable of the stories, viz., the raising of Lazarus, of which not a syllable is breathed by the others, which considering the nature of the miracle is simply astounding. But as I said just now, we have not got the direct evidence, because the original record is not, so far as is known, actually in existence. We have what purport to be copies, the oldest of which was in all probability not made till two hundred years after the original. These copies do not agree altogether; by whom they were made, when exactly they were made, from what they were made, we are unable to do more than hazard a guess. The contemporary testimony, too, does not corroborate these stories. It cannot be stated with precision when the original narratives were written, though it is generally believed by those competent to give an opinion that the earliest was not written till many years after the events they profess to describe; time enough for stories such as these to grow around the memory of Jesus, especially in an age when it was believed that such stories added to the weight and influence of a great man rather than detracted from them.

Hitherto I have referred to the miracles said to have been effected by Jesus during his ministry. That which is regarded by some as the crowning miracle of all—the resurrection—remains for consideration. The remarks I have made as to the evidence in support of the other narratives of course apply with the same force to this. There is this, however, to be noticed about the story, and that is that the four evangelists differ very widely in their accounts, so much so that it is difficult to escape the conclusion that they were not narrating what was personally known to them, but were relying wholly on tradition. I have said the four evangelists, though it might be more correct to omit Mark and say three, because in the two oldest MSS. of that Gospel now in existence the narrative breaks off at the eighth verse of the sixteenth chapter, and omits the appearance to Mary Magdalen and the other incidents told in the subsequent verses of the same chapter, as it stands in the Authorised Version, leaving the matter to be explained in a wholly natural way. The differences that strike us are not simply such as we should expect from four persons telling the same story. They read as if they were the work of four different persons desirous of supporting the same story by a different state of facts.

Now let it be assumed for a moment that the fact of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead is proved; what is the value to us of that fact? It seems to be considered by some that it proves the existence of a life beyond the grave, that it confirms the truth of the doctrine of immortality. But does it? Granted that according to the orthodox notion Jesus died and was raised from the dead, and ascended to heaven, or, in other words, that he was restored to a conscious existence, which has never again been taken from him, how does that prove that all other men will be similarly restored, or that when the bodies of men die the essential spirit we call soul still exists? It was scarcely wanted to prove the possibility of such a thing happening, and it in no way demonstrates the probability. Given a belief in God able to do anything, the possibility, and, I may add, the probability of a future existence granted or provided by him flows quite naturally. Assuming, on the contrary, the existence of a Being limited in power, the very fact of that limitation throws a doubt on the possibility of His being able to carry out His designs, however beneficent they may be, and suggests that while in one instance He may have been able to do what he wished, He may not have power to do so always, and therefore the resurrection of Jesus is no sure guarantee of a future life for all men. Surely the doctrine of a life beyond the grave stands on a firmer basis than the record of an event of questionable authenticity said to have occurred some eighteen hundred years ago.

It may be said that the evidence in favour of the miracles is equal in value to that relating to the teachings of Jesus, and that if you succeed in proving that the records of the miracles are not to be relied on, you are equally bound to discard the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount or those derived from the Parables. It does not seem to me that this naturally follows. The evidence in support of the truth of a doctrine differs from that which you ask for in support of a fact. Subsequent experience, or the response it gets from our moral perceptions, confirms the truth of a doctrine; contemporary testimony is required to convince of the actuality of a reported occurrence. It is because the doctrines taught by Jesus appeal to our highest sense of right, and because where they have been fairly and loyally applied they have stood the test of the application, that we are convinced of their truth. But, it may be objected, that would make it of no importance whether or not such a man as Jesus lived at all. Scarcely so. Moral teaching implies a teacher at least, and the effect of that teaching cannot but be marred if we suppose for one moment that the life of the teacher was not consistent with the doctrine he taught. We are compelled, therefore, to inquire somewhat as to the character he bears. If, as Pilate told the chief priest, we can find no fault in this man, then can we say he bore his testimony to the truth he taught, then can we feel that we have an additional reason for regarding his teaching as true. But it may well be that there is much difficulty in getting at this real vision of him, especially when we apparently weaken the existing testimony, such as it is, by discrediting portions of the narratives. There is, however, this fact, which is an overwhelming one, and that is that for the last eighteen hundred years the influence of Jesus has not only been maintained but has spread, and that where it has been distorted or misapplied it has failed, and only where it has been most faithfully and loyally followed has it succeeded. Now, as it is impossible to conceive of an effect without a cause, we may fairly attribute to the existence of him, of whom tradition tells us much, the credit of initiating the new life, and of testifying to the highest truth we wot of, even though we may be compelled to put aside part of what is told of him.

To the objection that to refuse credence to the Evangelists' accounts of the miracles is to credit them with direct misrepresentation, it may, I think, be answered that a man need not be wilfully telling an untruth because he repeats the stories that he has heard. But some one must have lied, it will be said. Not necessarily. It is evident that his disciples frequently failed to understand Jesus's meaning, and often when he was using words in a spiritual, they regarded them in a literal sense. It is easy to see therefore how some of his sayings became changed into statements of fact. From such an expression as "I am the bread of life," for instance, it is not difficult to see the foundation of the story of the feeding of the five thousand. But it is not alone to the sayings of Jesus that we may look for the beginnings of some of the miracle stories. If Jesus made what was dark and difficult clear, if he opened their eyes to the truth; if he raised some poor soul from the depths of despair, worse than death itself, we can have little difficulty in discerning how in the accounts given by these people we have the germs of some of the stories current many years after his death. I do not say more than that this may account for the miraculous element in the gospels.

It is said by some that this is giving up a belief in historical Christianity, and that those who no longer believe in the miracles have no title to the Christian name, and no right to a place in the pulpits of chapels devoted to Christian worship. To myself this is a matter of no importance; but on behalf of many ministers and laymen I claim that the right to be called Christian does not depend on a belief in the accuracy of the records of certain events said to have happened many years ago. Something far higher than any belief of this kind attests their title to be regarded as followers of Jesus Christ; saintly lives, loyalty to truth, noble endeavour, all combine to prove the brotherhood they hold to Jesus. And as to the prophet of Nazareth himself, does not his character gain by the loss of the miraculous element? Jesus clothed with gifts and powers which are denied to other men, is no longer an example to men, his virtues no longer shine resplendent, but are dimmed by the consciousness that his goodness was easy, that temptation was to him a mockery. But picture him, as I believe he was, a real being of flesh and blood, tempted as men are tempted, resisting temptation as men can resist it when they try, loving, hoping, helping, sorrowing, as men and women still do, and we recognise in him our brother, the son of his father and ours, our exemplar, teacher, helper, comforter and leader. Strip from him the halo of miracle with which his personality has become shrouded, and we have a being we can love, a soul which can fill ours with sympathy.

RICHARD BARTRAM.

A BROWNING READING CLUB, in connection with the Browning Society, is being formed at Bradford.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXVIII.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

162. JAMES YATES, Esq., M.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., &c. (1831-60).—A scholar and a friend and patron of learning; possessed of varied and exact knowledge and refined tastes, and withal an ample fortune. Born at Toxteth Park, Liverpool, April 30, 1789. Graduated M.A. at Glasgow in 1812, having studied three years at that University and one year at Edinburgh, and previously at York College. Elected a Fellow of the Geological Society in 1819, of the Linnaean Society in 1822, and of the Royal Society in 1831. At the age of thirty-eight he entered the University of Berlin as a student for the purpose of obtaining a more intimate knowledge of the classical philology of the Germans. In 1826 published "Thoughts on the Advancement of Academical Education in England," and in 1832 "Outlines of a Constitution for the University of London." With one exception he was the largest contributor to Dr. Wm. Smith's "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," having furnished for that work one-half of the woodcuts, and written one-eighth of the text. Author of "Textorium Antiquorum" 1843, being an account of the art of weaving among the ancients, and numerous papers on various subjects in the journals of learned societies, or published separately. Mr. Yates was one of the founders of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and at the close of its first meeting at York in 1831 was appointed Secretary to the Council. He took a special interest in the Glasgow and Divinity scholarships of Dr. Williams's Trust, and in the scholars themselves, corresponding with them, inviting them to his house, and encouraging them to excel. To him chiefly the Trust was indebted for the introduction of competitive examinations for the scholarships, and for the high efficiency to which this branch of the Trust was brought in his time. He resigned the Trust in 1860. In his earlier life Mr. Yates was a minister, first in Glasgow (1811-17), when, at the age of twenty-five, he engaged in a famous controversy with Dr. Wardlaw, and wrote his "Vindication of Unitarianism," a work which has passed through four editions; then at Birmingham (1817-25) in the pulpit once occupied by Dr. Priestley; and, lastly, at Carter-lane, London (1832-35). From that time he devoted himself almost exclusively to those scientific and literary pursuits which were more congenial to his disposition than controversy, and made it his study and his delight to pursue truth, to honour science, to admire taste, and to love virtue wherever found. He died 7th May, 1871, aged eighty-two years, having by his will left numerous legacies to charitable institutions and learned societies, including Endowments for a Professorship of Geology and Mineralogy, and a Professorship of Archæology at University College, London.

163. REV. EDWARD TAGART, F.S.A. (1832-58).—Minister of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich (1825-28), of York-street Chapel, St. James's-square (1828-33), and of Little Portland-street Chapel (1833-58). Author of "Remarks on Mathematical or Demonstrative Reasoning," 1837; "Sketches of the Lives and Characters of the Leading Reformers of the Sixteenth Century," 1843; "Locke's Writings and Philosophy Historically Considered," 1855; and other works. For many years Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In 1844 he was presented by his congregation with a service of plate, on the chief article of which was engraved an inscription from the pen of the late Charles Dickens, who was then a member of the Society. He died at Brussels 12th October, 1858, on his return from a visit to the Unitarians of Hungary. A portrait of him was kindly presented by the Misses Tagart to the writer's collection, being a photograph from a daguerreotype taken in September, 1853, at Klausenberg.

117. JOHN WANSEY Esq. (1793-1820).—The following account of this trustee has been furnished by one of his descendants:—"A man of singular piety and large benevolence. He was born at Warminster of an old and highly-respected family, which had been in the town since the time of Queen Elizabeth, always standing forward for the education of the people and for civil and religious liberty. During his long and active life in London he was the intimate friend of Dr. Abraham Rees, and afterwards, when he removed to Walthamstow, he helped to support the smaller chapel there. He took pleasure in inviting young men from London who were all the week engaged in business to spend the Sunday with him in the country, as well as pupils from Higham-hill, the well-known school of Mr. Cogan. Harriet Martineau was also an honoured and acceptable guest at his house, and felt privileged to appropriate to herself the little Prophet's Chamber, as she called the small upper room." Mr. Wansey was for many years (1788-1820) a member of the Presbyterian Board, and for a short time the treasurer. He died at Walthamstow, May 2, 1820, in his seventy-second year, being then one of the oldest members of Jewin-street Chapel. There are two half-length portraits of him by T. Phillips, R.A., and a smaller one by the same artist in the possession of the family.

152. JOHN WANSEY, Esq. (1820-32).—Son of the preceding Trustee. "He was a man of literary tastes, deeply read in Shakespeare, and left behind him paintings by many good artists." He was a member of the Presbyterian Board (1820-26) as a representative of Jewin-street Chapel. He died in 1832. There is a portrait of him in a family group.

164. WILLIAM WANSEY, Esq. (1833-67).—A first cousin of the preceding Trustee. He was one of the founders of the London Domestic Mission, in which he ever took great interest; one of the original members of the Reform Club; and twice Prime Warden of the Fishmongers' Company. On Dr. Williams's Trust he was a very valuable member, especially on the Estates and Audit Committees. He resigned the Trust in 1867, and died on the 27th of April, 1869, in his eighty-sixth year. There is an excellent likeness of him in the possession of the family, a fine copy of which has been contributed by Mrs. William Colfox, of Bridport, and her sisters to the collection made by the writer, and since presented to the Library.

165. REV. GEORGE KENRICK (1833-60).—A descendant of the Rev. John Kenrick, of Wrexham, mentioned in Dr. Williams's will; fourth son of the Rev. Timothy Kenrick, of Exeter, author of "An Exposition of the Historical Writings of the New Testament;" entered Glasgow College in 1808, and York College in 1810; minister at Chesterfield (1813-15), at Hull in (1815-22), and at Maidstone (1822-25). After leaving Maidstone he paid a lengthened visit to Italy (see his contributions to the Monthly Repository for 1827-28). Minister at Hampstead from 1829 to 1845 in the pulpit formerly occupied by Mr. Merrill (No. 7 supra). In 1860 he retired in ill-health to Tunbridge Wells, where he died Dec. 2, 1874, aged eighty-two years. A photograph of him, kindly contributed by himself in 1873, is in the collection. His brother, the late learned and venerable John Kenrick, of York, wrote:—"All who knew him will bear testimony to his benevolence, his simple rectitude of purpose, and his earnest zeal for the diffusion of religious truth."

LEICESTER.—The Rev. J. Moden has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the Free Christian Church in this town, and will commence his ministry on Sunday next, the 9th inst.

THE REV. A. B. CAMM, who retired from the ministry at Blackpool to put himself under eminent surgical skill in London, has in a great measure recovered tone to his injured foot. We understand Mr. Camm is now prepared to take occasional Sunday duty or supply pulpits during ministerial interregnums.

KIDDERMINSTER.—For the present winter the services for the people, which have been held on eight Sunday evenings in the Town Hall, are concluded. The total attendances have been about 7,600, hundreds of whom each night have been of the non-churchgoing-class. The offertories have amounted to nearly £34, covering the expenses of the services. A presentation of a gold brooch, a pair of gold bracelets, and an illuminated address has been made by the congregation to Miss Carrie Badland, their organist, as a slight recognition of her valuable services. A silver bracelet was also sent to Miss M. Isaacs, of Sidmouth, as a token of gratitude for services rendered during the illness of their organist. The Rev. W. Carey Walters has also received from his young men's class a testimonial, accompanied by an address expressive of their affectionate regard.

THE Deceased Wife's Sister Bill has passed the second reading in the Dominion Senate of Canada, by 40 to 18.

Occasional Notes.

THE Secretaries of the National Conference have received the following letter in reply to their request that the American Unitarian Association should be represented at the meeting at Liverpool on the 18th to 20th April:—

Rooms of the American Unitarian Association, 7, Tremont place, Boston, Mass., March 17, 1882.

Dear Sir,—Our directors have heard with great pleasure of the approaching gathering of your British National Conference. They judge from their own experience that it will prove to be a delightful coming together in sympathy to the increase of knowledge and the renewing of zeal. They believe that in your body it will be fruitful of good works and noble undertakings. Coming as this meeting does when our sense of the loss of Dr. Bellows is so fresh, it has a peculiar interest; for our National Conference, which we are proud to feel suggested yours, came from the mind and heart of Dr. Bellows.

We thank you for your invitation to be present by delegates. We hope to be able to accept it. It is our misfortune that Drs. E. E. Hale and James Freeman Clarke, who are about to visit England, and who would so truly represent us, are not able to leave for several weeks.

But permit us, whether present by delegates or absent, to express our deep interest in this your new enterprise, and to give our best hopes and wishes that the occasion may be all your highest desires could make it.—I am, very truly, GRINDALL RAYNOLDS, Secretary of the American U.S.A.

Mr. A. W. Worthington.

A MEMORIAL service was held on Sunday morning at South-place Chapel, Finsbury, at which various passages were read from Longfellow's prose and poetry, and some of his best known lyrics were sung. Mr. Conway's discourse contained some interesting personal reminiscences of the poet. Mr. Conway for two years attended Mr. Longfellow's literature class at Harvard, and pronounced him, as an expositor of Dante or Goethe, the ideal of a professor. Longfellow, he said, was the first literary American to espouse the cause of abolition, and it was at his instigation that Mr. Conway became minister of the Unitarian Church at Washington to fight slavery in its stronghold. The two distinctive notes of his poetry were moral elevation and broad humanity. New England in its earlier history had been the home of dogma and the tomb of legend and symbolism. Every week-day was a Sabbath, and the New England child if he laughed must laugh in Hebrew. The renaissance from this Puritanism was represented in comic literature by Lowell, whose humour seemed to Englishmen profane, and in serious literature by Longfellow, who transmuted theology into natural morality, and, as in his "Divine Tragedy" and "Golden Legend," gave to dead dogma a new life in dramatic art. Longfellow belonged to no creed, and the nearest approach to a confession of faith was to be found in his hymn for the ordination of his brother Samuel, now a preacher of freethought and liberalism, and the only minister who attended the poet's deathbed. The service was concluded by singing the "Psalm of Life," which Mr. Conway said had a special appropriateness. Mr. Conway was told by the poet in 1853 that many years before, when he visited London, he being then without any personal friends in the metropolis, experienced that sense of solitude which a stranger in London is apt especially to feel upon a London Sunday. He happened to walk into South-place Chapel, where Mr. W. J. Fox was then pastor. As he entered, the congregation were singing the poet's "Psalm of Life." The cheering effect upon Longfellow—the "thrill of joy" which he felt—was ever with him a cherished reminiscence of that visit to London. He had never before heard his poem sung.

THE following beautiful tribute to our English Bible, applies, of course, only to the Authorised Version, and we fear that it will be impossible to talk in the same way of the cadences and felicities of the new Revision. It has been often quoted but will bear quoting again:—

"It lives on the ear like a music that can never be forgotten, like the sound of church bells, which the convert hardly knows how he can forego. Its felicities often seem to be almost things rather than mere words. It is part of the national mind, and the anchor of the national seriousness. Nay, it is worshipped with a positive idolatry, in extenuation of whose grotesque fanaticism its intrinsic beauty pleads availingly with the man of letters and the scholar. The memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its verses. The power of all the griefs and trials of a man is hidden beneath its words. It is the representative of his best moments, and all that there has been about him of soft, and gentle, and pure, and penitent, and good, speaks to him for ever out of his English Bible."

Nine readers out of ten say that this passage was written by Newman, although they are not able to tell us in what particular work of his it is to be found. Nay, it is confidently quoted as Newman's by writers of repute, and only recently we were met with an incredulous smile when we stated with equal confidence that it is not by Newman. And now to confound all adversaries we say once more, and challenge contradiction, that it is by Faber, and will be found in the "Lives of the Saints," prefixed to his "Life of S. Francis, of Assisi." Faber ends this beautiful passage with the words "And all this is an unhallowed power!"

A TABLET commemorating Sir Walter Scott's residence at Rome in the Casa Bernini, at 11, Via Della Mercede, during the spring of 1832, was unveiled in that city on Monday afternoon, in presence of a large and distinguished company. The tablet of white marble bears the inscription, "In the year 1832, the last of his life, this house was the abode of the illustrious English novelist, Walter Scott, of Edinburgh."

It is proposed to erect a memorial window in St. Giles's Cathedral, Edinburgh, to the late Dean Stanley, as a tribute from his friends and admirers in Scotland. Subscriptions are now being collected throughout the Scotch Church.

THE sexcentenary of the Sicilian Vespers was peacefully and gracefully celebrated at Palermo last week, and as the climax of the festivities on Saturday night "Garibaldi's Hymn" was played alternately with the "Sicilian Vespers' Hymn." It was a stirring occasion, made memorable by the presence of Garibaldi, "the last of the old heroes." The historical incident must be familiar to most of our readers. The French, under Charles of Anjou, the brother of Louis IX., got possession of Naples and Sicily in 1266, and parcelled out those kingdoms into domains of their own. Their cruelty, tyranny, and oppressive taxation excited among the Sicilians the deadliest animosity. On the evening of Easter-Monday, 1282, the inhabitants of Palermo, enraged at the gross outrage which was perpetrated by a French soldier on a young Sicilian bride, suddenly rose upon their oppressors, and put to sword every man, woman, and child of them, not sparing even those Italians and Sicilians who had married Frenchmen. Where there was any doubt the hapless victims were invited to say Cecci e ciceri, "vetches and peas"; and if their Italian pronunciation was defective, they were at once put to the sword, an incident which recalls the Shibboleth and Sibboleth of the story in the Book of Judges. The example of Palermo was followed after a brief interval by Messina and the other towns, and the massacre soon became general over the island. The deed is not a pleasant one to recall, but it would be foolish for Frenchmen, who celebrate so many sanguinary episodes in their own history, to resent a patriotic commemoration of this kind.

SIGNOR GIULIO MINERVINI, of Naples, a well-known archaeologist in that city, has started the publication of an illustrated newspaper, giving fine engravings of the terra-cotta collection in the Campano Museum. The publication will comprise ancient and primitive terra-cotta works, Greek terra-cottas, and the finest specimens of more modern works.

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY, who is at present residing at Moscow, is at work on a commentary upon the New Testament. Unfortunately, the Censorship does not look favourably on productions of this kind, and the work will not be printed in Russia.

The Philosophy of Carlyle. By Edwin D. Mead. Boston, U.S.: Houghton, Mifflin and Co. London: Tribner and Co.

Among the crowd of papers and treatises which the public interest awakened by the death of Carlyle has called forth this book deserves honourable mention. Mr. Mead is a cultured American thinker, on whom the writings of Emerson have evidently exerted much influence; but his thought has also been powerfully affected by the German philosophers, from Kant to Hartmann, with whose systems some years of study in Germany have made him familiar. In this treatise Mr. Mead furnishes an introduction to the philosophy of Carlyle somewhat similar to Mr. Cooke's interesting introduction to the life and philosophy of Emerson. There is, however, this difference between the books, that while Mr. Cooke appears to be a thorough disciple of Emerson, and simply describes, without criticising, Emerson's philosophical views, Mr. Mead, on the other hand, though a profound admirer of Carlyle, is in still deeper accord with Emerson; and, accordingly, his essay is not only an introduction to the philosophy of Carlyle, but it is to some extent a criticism of that philosophy from the Emersonian, or perhaps we ought rather to say from the Hegelian standpoint. This adds much to its interest and value, for the careful reader, while gaining a very fair idea of the essential features of Carlyle's thought, will also be enabled to discern to some extent the not unimportant speculative differences which divided the prophet of Chelsea from his transatlantic friend.

The first section of the book is occupied with a vigorous attempt to explain and justify the tone of "the Reminiscences," but Mr. Mead joins in the general condemnation of Mr. Froude's "in decent haste," and adds, "these bristling personal allusions could not help angering and grieving a thousand people; a dozen years hence they would not have seemed so personal." Mr. Mead then proceeds to insist on the "earnestness" of Carlyle. One would have thought that earnestness was so conspicuously characteristic of the man that no question could be raised as to its genuineness and intensity. It appears, however, that another American writer of considerable ability, Mr. James, in a recent essay has represented Carlyle as "a harlequin in the guise of Jeremiah, who fed you with laughter in place of tears, and put the old prophetic sincerity out of countenance by his broad persistent winks at the bystanders over the footlights. . . . Picturesqueness in man and nature was the one key to his intellectual favour, and it made little difference to his artist eye whether the man were spiritually angel or demon." Well may Mr. Mead say, "This seems to me precisely the dreadfulness of all possible mistakes concerning Carlyle."

After inquiring what constitutes a "philosopher," and finding that "a philosopher is whosoever, doing his own thinking, speaks wisely upon first principles," Mr. Mead approaches the question "was Carlyle a Pessimist?" In the sense that Schopenhauer was a pessimist, it is certain that Carlyle not only was not a pessimist but was the very reverse of one. Carlyle was a pessimist only in the sense that Jesus was a pessimist when he said that the great cities would appear worse than Sodom and Gomorrah at the day of judgment, and that the generation altogether was wicked and adulterous:—"To use Carlyle's own words concerning modern England, the Judaean world was to Jesus a world in which men had closed their eyes to the eternal substance of things, and opened them only to the shows and shams of things, in which men cared only about the profit and loss in the universe, the pudding and praise of it." At the same time Mr. Mead thinks that the predominantly gloomy character of Carlyle's estimate of society was in some measure due to his own ill-health.

The matter of the bad stomach is certainly a very important matter in the study of Carlyle. Fichte said that the kind of philosophy a man will have depends upon the kind of man he is. It is true enough, too, that the world which appears to us takes its hue very largely from our own condition. The sun does not shine to the man who has a grumbling tooth, and when the nerves are tired we make mountains out of molehills, and suspect our best friends. The bluest of all blue spectacles is dyspepsia; and the man who for forty years has known no minute when he has not been conscious of a grumbling stomach, may well be pardoned for having less buoyant impressions than Louis Napoleon of the spirit of the age, and the progress of the species.

In general Carlyle, however, had no doubt about improvement and progress. The universe would surely justify itself. The bad in our time would somehow yield to something better.

That Carlyle believed, too, in ultimate justice to every soul of man there is no question. Every page of every book says that. Vindication and satisfaction to everything that is on God's side; while the bad will somehow or other be crushed and destroyed. This in general everybody must find in Carlyle.

The charge brought against Carlyle that he identified Right with Might, and which Mr. Jones expresses by saying that "the force of unprincipled will was the deity of Carlyle's unscrupulous worship," is discussed by Mr. Mead with great fairness and ability. He maintains that "if Carlyle for a time, in his impatience with indecision and shilly-shally and good-natured weakness, in the midst of chaos was willing to give almost any amount of rope to the man who could handle tools effectually and bring one thing or another to pass, even to the extent sometimes of almost seeming to reckon might right and success justice," we are bound to read all this in the light of the final verdict of Carlyle's thought, which is that the hero must not only do the work needed there and then in the best way, but with the best and deepest motives. Only the man of great moral depth can give Carlyle any large and lasting satisfaction; and it was just because he did not find this great moral depth in Frederick "that he never felt quite at home with him, as with Cromwell, and came at last to tire of his company altogether."

We come now to the main purpose of the volume, the philosophy of Carlyle; in reference to which Mr. Mead remarks at the outset that "we shall best understand Carlyle's general philosophy, its movement and its seeming contradictions, by considering it with reference to the German Idealism in which it has its roots." Among German philosophers Fichte is the one who most resembles Carlyle, and the parallelism which Mr. Mead draws between the two is true and striking:—

In his general mental constitution Carlyle was far more like Fichte than any other of the German philosophers—like him in his almost complete absorption in the ethical, and his interest in the speculative, only for its ethical bearings; like him in the predominance in him of the prophet and the preacher; like him in his arbitrary and uncompromising character; like him in his absolute confidence in justice and the omnipotence of the ideal, along with thorough discontent with the actual state of things about him.

But while Fichte was the German Carlyle, it was in the writings of Goethe and Schelling, especially of the former, that the English Fichte found the influences which most awakened and directed his thought. The favourite British psychology found little favour in the eyes of Carlyle, and in his essay on "Signs of the Times" he thus characterises it:—

Our whole metaphysics itself, from Locke's time downwards, has been physical; not a spiritual philosophy, but a material one. The singular estimation in which his essay was so long held as a scientific work will one day be thought a curious indication of the spirit of these times. His whole doctrine is mechanical, in its aim and origin, in its method and its results. It is not a philosophy of the mind; it is a mere discussion concerning the origin of our consciousness, or ideas, or whatever else they are called; a genetic history of what we see in the mind. The grand secrets of necessity and free-will, of the mind's vital or non-vital dependence on matter, of our mysterious relations to time and space, to God, to the universe, are not, in the faintest degree, touched on in these inquiries, and seem not to have the smallest connection with them.

Carlyle's deep aversion to a mechanical and materialistic philosophy of man and the Universe is a conspicuous feature of his writings, but Mr. Mead, while asserting that he would not in any way weaken the force of Carlyle's scathing exposure of this kind of philosophising, nevertheless by his qualifying remarks clearly reveals to the attentive reader that there is an impassable gulf between his views and those of Carlyle. Mr. Mead apparently believes that there exists a complete parallelism between the facts of brain and the facts of mind, and he emphatically endorses the statement of Leibnitz that "the Idealists, like Plato and Aristotle, are wrong when they conclude that there are phenomena which are incapable of mechanical explanation." This doctrine of Leibnitz, Carlyle, we strongly suspect, would have vehemently repudiated as being quite incompatible with that doctrine of man's free-will and responsibility which is one of the characteristics of Carlyle's philosophy. If the soul be a monad, and if all its higher developments are capable of mechanical explanation, then the Libertarian view of the freedom of moral choice becomes, of course, inconceivable, and an exclusively Deterministic theory of human nature is inevitable. It is a very curious circumstance in connection with Mr. Mead's able treatise that, whereas he shows by implication throughout his book that his own theory of moral action is a blending of Leibnitzian and Hegelian views, and is therefore wholly deterministic, yet he never calls attention to the very important fact that what Carlyle means by "free-will" is something entirely different from what Mr. Mead means by "freedom." Our impression is that it would be perfectly consistent in Carlyle if in speaking to a man who, under certain circumstances, had yielded to temptation, he were to say, "under those circumstances you could have acted otherwise than you did," but we hardly see how Mr. Mead's theory of the complete parallelism of the psychical and the physical could allow him with consistency to make any such statement. It would have been rather more profitable, we think, if Mr. Mead in this portion of his essay had expounded Carlyle's views on "the grand secrets of necessity and free-will," by references to passages in Carlyle's own writings. Instead of this he gives us an interesting, but in our view not wholly satisfactory disquisition on the serious mistakes which certain post-Kantian philosophers, such as Fichte, and Schopenhauer have made through not clearly understanding that Kant's doctrine of the freedom of the will involved of necessity a recognition of the intelligence of the will—a misunderstanding for which Kant's unsatisfactory mode of statement is largely responsible.

It was the freedom of the will (says Mr. Mead) which involves intelligence, the consciousness and rationality of the force, from which Kant made all his deductions and in which he found his principle of certitude. But the stress which he laid upon the practical reason as opposed to the cognitive, and the unfortunate distinction by which he declined to trust the validity of his own logic outside the moral sphere, led to a rapid over-emphasising of the practical in reason, till at last Schopenhauer and Hartmann drop the reason altogether, making the practical without the reason, pure will, or unconscious force, the first principle, and so give up precisely that factor in the will in which Kant found his principle of certitude. The process is simple enough, though fraught with such momentous consequences, and when it is finished it bringeth forth death. Hegel alone, of all the followers of Kant, grasped the problem on both sides, and developed the idea of will as practical reason in an adequate manner.

Fichte and Carlyle appear to Mr. Mead to have run a serious risk of falling into Schopenhauer's fatalism, because, under the influence of the above-mentioned misunderstanding of the Kantian theory of the practical reason, they were inclined sometimes to say, in the language of the former, "I know infallibly what I ought to do, and I know nothing else, and know that I know nothing." Though in Mr. Mead's view "this over-emphasising of duty as the only key to the great mystery" naturally tends to Fatalism, he explains that in the case of Carlyle it did not reach its natural goal, "because an immediate consciousness of freedom kept him from any fatalistic or pessimistic philosophy." With all due deference to Mr. Mead's judgment, we see no reason to suppose that the over-emphasising of the idea of duty (if such a thing were possible) would have any fatalistic tendency. It was not by this route that Schopenhauer reached his fatalism; nor is there the slightest evidence that Carlyle's "over-emphasising of duty" ever carried him at all in a fatalistic direction. Indeed, it seems to us that Leibnitz and Hegel, and those who, like Mr. Mead and Mr. James, have succeeded in grasping "the modern German idea," that humanity is an organism which is being developed to perfection by a kind of immanent dialectic, are in far more serious danger of coming under the influence of a morally enervating fatalism than Carlyle ever was. It is, we think, a misfortune that Emerson has to some extent caught this same "modern German idea;" and it is precisely this element in his thought which disqualifies the Concord sage for that highest rôle of prophet which Carlyle so grandly fills.

While Mr. Mead thinks that a certain one-sidedness in Kant's teaching tended to encourage such views as those of Schopenhauer, we, on the other hand, are disposed to maintain that Kant's account of the relation of Will to Reason has had great influence on the development of what we consider to be the false and mischievous side of Hegelianism, namely, its inability to recognise in human nature any such original source of causality in the matter of moral choice as is needed to furnish a metaphysical foundation for a satisfactory ethical theory. To us (and here Mr. Mead and ourselves are the antipodes of each other) Hegelianism seems as hopelessly unable to provide a rational ground for the ascription of praise or blame to moral agents as is the doctrine of Spinoza. The feature in the Kantian system to which we refer is the description of Will as Practical Reason. In thus making Will a function of Reason, Kant appears to us to imply a doctrine which is wholly irreconcilable with the existence of that free-will in man which his own moral consciousness compelled him to postulate. It is not by any process of the Reason, but by the original activity of the very essence of our personality, the choosing and self-determining Will, that in a case of temptation we, in the exercise of our delegated but independent causality, elect to take one of two possible lines of action, each of which is equally open to our free choice. Make Reason the genus and Will a species of Reason, and you at once commit yourself to an account of Will, which necessarily excludes every ethical theory which shall harmonise with the facts of our moral consciousness. Had Kant maintained that Will has two functions, the rational and the practical, and that Reason is the former of these, he would, we think, not have afforded, as he has done, justification to a line of philosophical speculation which was bound to issue at last in that thoroughly deterministic Hegelianism of which Mr. Mead appears to be a willing and somewhat enthusiastic disciple.

It is well worth noting that in Mr. Mead's own opinion "the modern German idea" (with which we think it fortunate that Carlyle was never fully inoculated) is apt to have a mischievous effect on unprepared minds. It is an esoteric doctrine, with which the less the vulgar have to do the better for them. "The danger," says Mr. Mead, "which besets the new theology is that, in denying that there is death for sinners, it weakens the conception of retribution for sin, and brings in an era of corrupting complacency." Never has Mr. Mead uttered a truer sentence! But he proceeds to say, "No man has a right to the new philosophy who has not a clear conscience and an inwrought, eternal sense of the sinfulness of sin—and just in proportion as a man is in earnest in his fight with the falsehoods and wrongs in the world will these assume independence and vitality over against him, and will he fall naturally into the language of Carlyle." If Mr. Mead had been willing and able to explain what intelligible meaning can, on Hegelian principles, be given to the word "sin," he would have performed a feat which seems to us at present quite beyond the scope of human possibility. In regard to this inability to give a rational account and justification of man's profound consciousness of Sin, the gospel according to Hegel, and the gospel according to Spencer, differing as they do in other most important respects, are in substantially the same predicament; and although the students and admirers of each of these new gospels are beginning to find their way at times into Christian pulpits, they cannot help feeling and making their hearers feel that their view of sin is fundamentally discordant with the view of sin presented in the Hebrew prophets and in the Christian Scriptures. What we complain of in this "new theology" is, that by its basal idea, by its representation of "the falsehoods and wrongs in the world" as necessary stages in the evolution of that immanent dialectic which is in the best possible way bringing the organism of humanity to final perfection, it cannot but tend to weaken "the sense of the sinfulness of sin," and to paralyse that very "earnestness in the fight" which Mr. Mead desiderates, and which Carlyle's teaching so mightily stimulates and sustains.

We have been compelled to enter into what may have seemed a digression in order to enable our readers to understand a very remarkable chapter in Mr. Mead's book, which begins with the somewhat startling remark, "Carlyle is a Calvinist." At first we were puzzled to make out Mr. Mead's meaning, as we thought that Carlyle had thoroughly broken off from the theology of his childhood; but after some little reflection, we found that Mr. Mead, in calling Carlyle a Calvinist, only meant that Carlyle was not an Hegelian, and had not succeeded in appropriating "the modern German idea." In other words, Carlyle believed that man possesses some measure of real freedom of choice in fashioning his immortal destiny, and, accordingly, he felt and taught, as prophets are wont to feel and teach, that the will of God and the will of man constitute a real dualism, and that the two members of this dualism are not necessarily and always in harmony with each other. Carlyle was by no means certain that much of the evil in the world ought not to be ascribed to man's causality rather than to the causality of God, and, therefore, notwithstanding the influence on him of German thought, and his warm admiration of Emerson, he declined to commit himself to that fascinating but enervating monistic optimism which complacently assures us that "man, though in brothels, or jails, or on gibbets, is on his way to all that is good and true."

Mr. Mead rightly teaches us that "a moral imperative, so strong as to demand the cancelling of life itself, is the absolute assurance that individuality really belongs to an ideal realm paramount to the phenomenal." Is he, then, so sure of the nature of the relation of this marvellous hyper-phenomenal individuality—the spirit of man—to the Eternal, that he can confidently assert that there can be no essential lack of harmony between them, so that even in the phenomenal world there may be evil acts and evil institutions that are wholly due not to the causality of God, but to the causality of man? If he has arrived at complete assurance on this point, the sources of his certitude are hidden from us.

We have occupied so much space in treating of this important section of the book, in which our sympathy goes much more with Carlyle than with his critic, that, to our regret, we must now content ourselves with just mentioning the contents of the later chapters of the work, and with saying that they seem to us very interesting and instructive as giving both a clear exposition of some of Carlyle's leading ideas, and also a discriminating appreciation of these ideas in reference to the objections urged against them by other critics. This concluding portion of the book falls into two divisions, the first treating of Carlyle's laudation of "Unconsciousness," and the second of his political views and theories. In the former of these Mr. Mead reproduces some of John Sterling's excellent criticisms of Carlyle's "Characteristics of the Present Age," and points out further the vital difference between the "Unconsciousness" that Carlyle desired, and that aimed at in the writings of Schopenhauer and Hartmann: "The unconsciousness of genius is simply the healthiest, freest, and most clarified consciousness, the condition of the highest activity, not the cessation of activity, nor Nirvana."

In estimating the character and worth of Carlyle's political ideas, Mr. Mead, with his warm Republican convictions and sympathies, finds himself far removed from the letter of Carlyle's teaching; but he endeavours to show that as one penetrates deeper to the true spirit of that teaching one finds that "the ends which Carlyle aims at through his 'despotism' are the ends of democracy." If he would have strong government, it is not, as the aristocrat would have it, to support himself, but because he believes that by a strong government the interests of the working-classes will be best served.

This last chapter of the volume contains valuable reflections on some difficult points of political philosophy, and forms a fitting conclusion to a treatise which, whatever may be thought of the author's agreement with Leibnitz as to the possibility of a mechanical explanation of spiritual phenomena, or of his devotion to "the modern German idea," must certainly be allowed to evince a careful and not unfruitful study of Carlyle's works, and to bear upon every page traces of earnest thought, refined sentiment, and high culture. C. B. U.

The Modern Review. James Clarke and Co.

The only objection we have to make to the Modern Review this quarter is that every article might just as well have appeared in the Nineteenth Century or one of the Quarterlies, and that except in some of the short notices there seems scarcely anything to justify its separate existence as a representative of liberal theology. But what we have called an objection the editor and contributors may possibly regard as a compliment, and we certainly mean it to be understood as a testimony to the great ability and high character of their work.

The first article, on "Ecclesiastes," is from the pen of a Liberal Independent minister, himself author of a valuable work on that remarkable philosophical romance which has always been a favourite book with sceptics like Frederick the Great and Voltaire, and is now attracting attention more widely than ever before. In the course of his paper Mr. Tyler discusses the three questions "When was the Book Written?" "What is the Meaning of the Name Koheleth?" and "Is the so-called Epilogue (xii. 9-14) an integral part of the Book, or a later addition?"

Mr. Justice Richmond, of Wellington, New Zealand, formerly well-known as a barrister in connection with London Unitarians, follows with an elaborate paper on "Materialism," discussing and comparing the theories of Darwin, Tyndall, Lange and others.

Dr. John Hunt gives an interesting Essay in Ecclesiastical history in the form of a review of "Dr. Michaud on the Seven Œcumenical Councils," and H. Schütz Wilson immediately follows with the first part of an historical Essay on the romantic and melancholy career of "Elizabeth Stuart, Queen of Bohemia," and "still titular Queen of Hearts"; daughter of James I. of England, and mother of the Princes Rupert and Maurice, and of the Electress Sophia of Hanover.

Dr. Kern, of Leiden, next reviews "Mr. Rhys David's Hibbert Lectures, pronouncing them in a high degree interesting and suggestive."

The three remaining articles—which are all very interesting in their way—are "Alfonso La Marmora," a biographical sketch of the famous friend, colleague and successor of Count Cavour, the "Bayard of New Italy"; "Poor Law Relief and Private Charity," a valuable contribution to the ethics of Social Economy, by the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, whose experience as a missionary to the poor gives his opinion great practical value; and "Jane Austen and Charlotte Brontë," a literary contrast, by A. Armit, with a decided leaning to the side of Jane Austen, whose genius, if not so brilliant, was more healthy, and her influence probably more enduring than that of the later novelist.

Under the heading "Notes and Discussions" the Rev. H. W. Crosskey has a brief article on "Darwinianism and Religion.—A Note on Mr. Graham's Creed of Science," in which he shows that the philosophy of Darwin, so far from dispensing with a God, demands a Creator who never ceases to create, and in whose unslumbering and unresting energy all things live and move and have their being.

In the "Notices of Books" are interesting contributions from the pens of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Dr. James Drummond, C. B. Upton, the Editor (the Rev. R. Crompton Jones), and others. The Review well maintains the high reputation it has won; but we should like to see more contributions from our own friends and fellow-workers.

The Magazines.

Fraser's Magazine is decidedly improving. Besides "Lady Maud," a pleasantly-told yachting story, and "Exchange no Robbery," a tale of German life, by Miss Betham Edwards, there are some articles of a graver kind, which are well worth reading. Sir G. W. Cox gives a highly appreciative review of Dr. Perry's recent work on "Greek and Roman Sculpture." In answering the question "How far is the present House of Commons represented in the Roll of the Long Parliament," Mr. C. W. Kennedy finds the old historical names still worthily perpetuated, although often on opposite sides, both in religion and politics. It is interesting to note that the ancestor of our Conservative chief, Sir John Northcote, fought on the Parliamentary side; and that the Russells, almost alone of the great houses, have remained faithful to Liberal traditions throughout their history. The other articles, which call for no special comment here, are "M. Léon Say on the Prosperity of France and the State Purchase of Railways," by F. R. Conder; "The Correspondence of Niccolò Paganini," by J. Theodore Bent, who shows that the great violinist was little better in character than a worthless profligate; "Among the Tors," a charming sketch of Dartmoor, by B. Burford Rawlings; "The French Privateers," a second article of a very attractive series, and "The New Coalition," a calm, weighty and able exposure of the tactics of the Tories in their new alliance with the Parnellites.

The Expositor (Hodder and Stoughton) opens with a rather feeble paper on "The Great Hyperbole" (John xxi. 25), by Almoni Peloni, whoever he may be. Another curious passage, "The sense in which St. Paul calls himself an Ectroma" (1 Corinthians xv. 8), is the subject of elaborate discussion by the Rev. Prebendary Huxtable; while the editor, Dr. Cox, follows in a simpler style of homiletic address on "The Heavenly Citizenship." We feel under the hand of a master in the two remaining papers, "The Style of the Revised Version," by the Rev. Dr. Sanday, and "Fidelity and Bias in Versions of the Bible," by Canon Farrar. Dr. Sanday, while acknowledging the scholarly merits and general accuracy of the Reviser's work, shows very conclusively its shortcomings as to style, and affirms that it is there especially that there is much that he should wish to see undone. "It is impossible," he adds, "to praise too highly the courage, the conscientiousness, the singleness of purpose with which the Revisers have accomplished what they felt to be their duty; but I could have earnestly wished that they had a gentler, and a lighter, and a more delicate and sensitive hand." And he sums up his counts against them in a single sentence, that "they have made a great number of needless and, on the whole, detrimental changes"—for which we must say there is abundant and some very damaging evidence. Canon Farrar in his paper gives several curious instances of deliberate bias in the famous Septuagint version of the Old Testament; and a few also in our own Authorised Version, arising from the "prepossessions of a dogmatic theology." He closes a very interesting and valuable paper with a well-deserved tribute to the courage and fidelity of the Revisers, and profound gratitude for their "patient, disinterested, and admirable labours."

Good Words is rendered unusually attractive this month by the charming pictures of Quebec, from the portfolio of the Princess Louise, who has also given excellent illustrative notes. We hope that we are above the suspicion of courtier-like flattery when we say that they would do credit to any professional artist, and give a quite lovely representation of the beautiful scenes spread before the Governor-General's windows. The Marquis of Lorne's poem on "Quebec" accompanying the illustrations is pleasing and correct versification, and but little more. Mr. Charles Gibbon continues his tale "The Golden Shaft," and Mrs. Oliphant her story of fashionable life, "Lady Jane," both increasing in interest. Among the other articles are "Cheerful Christianity," by Mrs. L. B. Walford; "Adventures on the Rovuma," a sketch of African exploration by J. Thomson, F.R.G.S.; "Lighthouses on the Eddystone Rocks," with illustrations, a striking story of skill and adventure at home, by E. Price Edwards, of Trinity House; "The Sacredness of Property," a sermonette by R. W. Dale, M.A.; "Man and the Gospel," the third part of the Bishop of Peterborough's eloquent homily vindicating the doctrine of the Atonement on the old orthodox lines; and "Artemus Ward," the conclusion of the Rev. H. R. Haweis's amusing sketch of the inimitable American humorist—altogether a number rich in variety and interest.

The Sunday Magazine opens with the continuation of George Macdonald's serial story "Weighed and Found Wanting," and there is also the continuation of Miss O. M. Birrell's interesting story of New England life in the old time, entitled "Justice Warren's Daughter." Among other papers are "Sir Christopher Wren," a biographical sketch by Julie Sutter, founded on the recent life of the great architect; "The Peabody Homes for the Poor," a satisfactory account of the steady progress of a noble Trust for the people of London; "The Threatening Comet," by E. W. Maunder, F.R.A.S., who shows that Mr. Proctor's recent prediction has been greatly misunderstood, and that there is no reason for alarm just yet; "Home for Lost Dogs," by J. Ewing Ritchie; "Barney's Neighbour," a story for the young by C. Birley; and the always charming "Sunday Evenings with the Children," by Alex. Macleod.

Teachers' Notes is improving in value and interest, if that indeed is possible. All the contributions in the number for April are full of interest, and we notice with pleasure that all but the brief "Answers to Questions" are from the pens of ladies who are experienced teachers. Miss Edith Martineau continues her anecdotal and eminently practical "Lessons on Seeds of Character." Miss F. E. Cooke contributes two charming little "Sermons for the Children" on conscience and building up a character; and Miss Harriet E. Higginson, under the heading "Some Upholders of Religious Liberty and our Debt to Them," sketches with graceful pen the well-known careers of Priestley, Belsham, and Mr. and Mrs. Newcome Cappe. Finally the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed gives a brief popular answer to the question "How may I distinguish between the writers of the Book of Genesis?"

The Journal of the National Indian Association contains the excellent paper read at the recent annual meeting of the Society, by Syud Mohammed Israel on "The Education of Mahomedan Ladies, as it is, and as it should be"; and among other articles, "The Second Daughter-in-law," a continuation of the tale illustrative of Indian domestic life, by Pandit Shiva Nath Sastri; and "A Native View of Lady Doctors for India."

Harper's Magazine for last month contains a brief contribution from Miss Phelps, the authoress of "Gates Ajar," entitled "Last Words from George Eliot." Miss Phelps "shares with the readers of this magazine" her "little portion of our now precious memories" of the great novelist, almost without further comment of her own. She makes, indeed, a few quotations from Mrs. Cross's letters, "such as it seems right or possible to share with the public." The following is, of course, a reference to Mr. J. S. Mill—"I never—to answer one of your questions quite directly—I never had any personal acquaintance with—"(naming a prominent Positivist)—"never saw him to my knowledge, except in the House of Commons; and though I have studied his books, especially his 'Logic and Political Economy,' with much benefit, I have no consciousness of their having made any marked epoch in my life." In thanking Miss Phelps for her tribute of feeling in respect to "Middlemarch," she says—"As to the 'great novel' which remains to be written, I must tell you that I never believe in future books."

... Always after finishing a book. I have a period of despair that I can ever again produce anything worth giving to the world. The responsibility of the writer grows heavier and heavier—does it not?—as the world grows older, and the voices of the dead more numerous. It is difficult to believe, until the germ of some new work grows into imperious activity within one, that it is possible to make a really needed contribution to the poetry of the world—I mean, possible to oneself to do it."

The Day of Rest is bright and attractive with its numerous highly-coloured pictures. Hesba Stretton continues her popular story, "The Lord's Purse-bearer," and Esmé Stuart contributes a complete tale, entitled "Herbert's Fortune." Mr. William Gilbert gives an account of "The Princess Mary's Village Homes," with an attractive coloured illustration; and besides papers of a religious character there is a pleasant sketch of "A Summer Holiday in Switzerland," by Mrs. May, and "Children's Pages," by "Prudentia."

The Magazine of Art, always bright and attractive, has for its frontispiece this month an admirable engraving of Millet's fine picture "The Angelus." Elise Paget gives a pleasant account of the famous artist "Old Crome," with engravings of three of his works. "More About Bells" is another delightful Essay on Campanology, by the Rev. H. R. Haweis, with illustrations of several old church towers. Among the other papers are "The Year's Awakening," by H. E. Ward, with engravings of Spring scenes in the country; "A Treatise on Wood-Engraving," by H. V. Barnett, with nine illustrations; "The Artistic Aspect of Modern Dress," by Alice Conyers Carr, with illustrations of costumes of different countries and periods; "The Art of Savages," by Andrew Lang, with curious sketches of Savage pictures; "The Decoration of a Home," with seven illustrations, by Cosmo Monkhouse, and "Pictures of the Season," which promise well for the present and future of British Art.

Cassell's Family Magazine, besides the two interesting serial stories, "No Proof," and "Ralph Raeburn's Trusteeship," has short and generally interesting papers on "The Tyneside Collier," a capital portrait from life, by Thos. Burt, M.P.; "The Life of a Private Soldier in Times of Peace," a rose-coloured sketch by one who has served in the ranks; "England's Balance Sheet," an economical article by J. T. Gale, F.S.S.; "How Women are Employed in Belgium;" "A New England Seaside Resort," a pleasant account of Pigeon Cove, at the extreme end of Cape Ann, Massachusetts; "A Few Words about Colour Blindness," by B. G. Johns, M.A., who calculates that there are four hundred and eighty thousand people in Great Britain who are colour blind, and that the infirmity prevails among Jews, Quakers, and deaf-mutes; "The Model Mistress of a House," the second chapter of the sketch of a well-ordered home; and "The Family Parliament," a new and interesting feature in the magazine, continued with marked success.

We have also received from Messrs. Cassell:—The Bible Educator, edited by Dean Plumptre. Part I. of a new edition, with a handsome frontispiece of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

The New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXV.

Cassell's Illustrated Universal History, Part VII. The Family Physician, Part XXVII.

And Cassell's Book of Sports and Pastimes; the first part of a new work treating of cricket, football, riding, and other athletic exercises.

Literary Notes.

MR. E. WALFORD is going to bring out a revised edition of his "Londoniana," with additional chapters. One of these will treat of the old breweries of Southwark, and of the Cromwellian Museum at Hackney.

MR. SPENCER'S new work, "Political Institutions" (Part V. of the "Principles of Sociology"), will be out before Easter. We are authorised to state that there is no truth in the report that Mr. Spencer is going to lecture during his tour in the United States. He has positively declined proposals made to him to do so.

MR. JAMES BRITTEN has undertaken to edit the volume of "Early Treatises on Plants and Herbs," which the Early English Text Society has long had on its list.

THERE has been a run on Serjeant Ballantine's book, and the first edition, although large, disappeared on the day of publication.

MR. CHARLES READE, whose labours have for three years been interrupted by bereavement and sickness, will return to fiction in the columns of Life on May 4. He promises a series of stories, which will be illustrated by several articles.

A COMPANION volume to "From Log Cabin to White House," by Mr. W. M. Thayer, will be speedily issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, entitled "The Pioneer Boy, and How he became President: The Story of the Life of Abraham Lincoln." The same firm will also publish in a few days a new work by the same author, entitled "Tact, Push, and Principle," a book for those who wish to succeed in life.

MR. BLYTH wishes to state that the serial entitled "The Romance of Love and Marriage," to be published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, and mentioned in the Academy for March 25, is not a "fiction," but a compilation dealing with the romantic attachments of celebrated men and women, and with remarkable marriages in all times and countries.

We learn from the Allgemeine Zeitung that a munificent donor, who is to remain anonymous during his lifetime, has presented to the Municipal Library of Berlin a collection of books relating to the March of Brandenburg, the value of which is estimated at about £7,500. Special works on this subject are becoming extremely rare in the book market, and the demand for them since 1870 has rapidly increased.

THE death is announced of Mrs. Adolphe Smith, daughter of Mr. Blanchard Jerrold, and granddaughter of Douglas Jerrold. Deceased was a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and, by a melancholy coincidence, one of the magazines for April contains an article from her pen, entitled "Death among the Veterans."

THE AFFIRMATION LECTURES.

The Church Times, in a short notice of the "Ten Lectures," writes:—

The writer of the preface, Dr. J. Martineau, explains the attitude of the lecturers as being not antagonistic to the faith of other Christians, but seeking to find the common standing-ground of all Christians. "To no one of the affirmations registered in the table of contents will contradiction be offered, whatever qualifications may be suggested, from any side of Christendom. The lectures stand forth in defence of truths which others also hold, but hold under conditions less favourable, it is conceived, to their clear exhibition and firm support." In some sense, therefore, we may regard this volume as an eirenicon, and upon examination we find what the preface leads us to expect, a studied moderation in language, credit given for honesty of purpose, even where disagreement is most complete, and a desire to arrive at truth. So far good; and from the point of view of the lecturers nothing could be more ably contrived and skilfully executed. But casual readers, who usually live just over the border of controversy, hearing the din of arms but quietly ignoring the direction of the strife, had need to be told that the positive beliefs on some points is but a residuum of what orthodox believers in all ages have held as necessary to man's well-being. For instance, it is well that men should claim for God all the best and holiest thoughts which occur in the pages of the writings of other than the Jewish and Christian Faith. This is only to acknowledge that the Word was ever coming and enlightening, the very claim which St. John makes for our Blessed Lord. But when whole parts of the Bible are removed from the category of substantially veracious books (although this is not insisted on by the lecturer, Professor J. E. Carpenter, M.A.), we should like to know upon whose authority we must receive the remainder. The position of the Bible in the world we take as a test question, and the lecturer sees its importance, admitting the constructive work of the Church in the formation of the Canon, although confusing the long-continued scrutiny exercised with reference to certain portions, with the absolute rejection accorded to other works. To admit the claims of the Bible upon our attention is to admit the authority who gave us the Bible. Is that authority living or dead? If it has continued to exist at all, it is clear that the teachings of the authors of this volume are, in so far as they differ from the article of universal belief, wrong. A great deal of time now wasted in controversy would be saved if men would only come to first principles; and amongst these we place the all-important question, "Where do you get your Bible?" If in the Bible we have the voice of absolute truth witnessed, first by those who heard that voice, and, secondly, by those who knew whether the first group were worthy of credence or not, we can rest satisfied, and then calmly survey the surrounding view, and trace here and there other remarks of the same enlightening power. Granted the sun and its action, we can explain the illuminating power of coal-gas and petroleum, but not otherwise. To one other lecture we should like to draw attention, that on the "Future Life," by Mr. Charles Wicksteed, B.A. It is a clever and well-reasoned application of Bishop Butler's argument from analogy, abounding in beautiful passages, and deserves careful study. Of the whole book we can say that it is a hopeful sign, and shows how very much of fundamental truth remains after all the attacks made on the Church and her teaching, even in the minds of those who are supposed to be furthest removed from her borders. What the lecturers do not see is that certain doctrines to which they object are the result of the action of truth upon groups of human beings containing lower and higher types than those we meet in the prosaic life of average Englishmen. They ignore the past, and we know that the tendency of such a course is to reproduce the past with all its errors and follies. The very heights which these men occupy are due to the victory which Athanasius won over Arius, and we for our part must decline to give up the very secret of success and progress. If any of our readers are inclined to read this work, let them remember that besides certain errors positions are taken for granted which need yet to be proved, and which, if the history of German rationalism be taken as an illustration, seem even already to be causing doubt in the truth of doubt.

THE LATE PROFESSOR T. H. GREEN.

The Spectator, speaking of the commanding influence which this eminent man exercised over both the speculative and the moral life of Oxford, writes:—

No teacher of his time at Oxford attracted to his lecture-room so large a number of mature students, of men who were themselves engaged in teaching others, and through whom his ideas, variously modified by the different media through which they passed, filtered down into the University at large. And whatever may be thought of the substantive value of his speculative creed, this, at least, may safely be said—that no man of average intelligence could listen to him without being emancipated, once for all, from the dominion of the crowd of shallow fallacies and anarchic sophistries which in these days masquerade in the time-honoured garb of Philosophy.

Although, perhaps, he lacked some of the conventional qualifications of a successful teacher, there was never a man whose force was less wasted, and of whom it could be more confidently asserted that he found precisely the kind of work which he was best fitted to perform. He was not naturally a very fluent speaker, and when he had once determined upon the words best fitted to be the vehicle of a thought, he could not easily expand or vary the form of expression. But the words chosen were always apt for the purpose, and his phrases were so vigorous and condensed, that there is reason to fear that they sometimes passed current as formulae among those who had very imperfectly grasped the idea which they crystallised. In dealing with ethical questions, his style had a terse and restrained eloquence, which was all the more effective for its resolute avoidance of rhetorical ornament. As was the language, so was the thought. In a lecture of his, there was an intense concentration of intellectual force, a severe economy in the method of treatment, a relentlessness in the tracking out of fallacies, a strenuous grappling with each difficulty as it arose, a gradual, but by no means effortless, mastering of the subject, which was to the listener at once exhausting and profoundly impressive. To lose a sentence was fatal, but those who followed the argument patiently from beginning to end felt that there was no more to be said. Rare, however, as were Mr. Green's mental and dialectical powers, the effect of his teaching would have been far less than it was, had it not been reinforced by the influence of a singularly noble and stimulating character. Nature intended him for a Puritan of the best type. Without the faintest affectation of superiority or separateness, he was one of those men who convey the impression that upon the moral side they are as impenetrable and immovable as though they were hewn out of granite. The spirit of the Kantian ethics, which he was so fond of expounding, pervaded and governed his whole life. There was another direction also in which it is impossible to over-estimate the value of his example. He showed, perhaps for the first time in Oxford—certainly in a more conspicuous way than any of his predecessors—how unfounded is the delusion that philosophy incapacitates its professors for the every-day interests and common-place struggles of municipal and political life. A man whose mind moved familiarly and habitually among the abstrusest questions that have ever occupied the human intellect, he was none the less an ardent politician, a frequent platform-speaker, and an energetic citizen. He had been for a long time one of the recognised leaders of the Liberal party in the town of Oxford, and during the later years of his life he was an active member of the City Council. He was not ashamed to take part in the humdrum work of committees and "caucuses," and he would turn aside from Kant or Hegel to attend meetings of agricultural labourers or temperance reformers. Such a man could ill be spared in any of our towns, and least of all in Oxford. In that home of intellectual dilettantism, with its worship of culture and its fastidious contempt for whatever is coarse and common-place, it was no small advantage that there should be found one whose intellectual pre-eminence all were compelled to acknowledge, and who was yet not afraid to take his share in the most ordinary duties and conflicts of parochial politics.

THE Committee of Gairner's Trust are about to found, in connection with the Royal Normal College for the Blind, musical scholarships to the value of £800 yearly.

DURING the present century a hundred and ninety-six Quaker meeting-houses have been closed, and only seventy-three new ones opened.

"THE AIM OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL, AND HOW TO ATTAIN IT."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The contribution of a few afterthoughts to the very interesting discussion reported in your last week's issue may not be unacceptable to such of your readers (and I believe they are many) as are anxious to promote improvements in Sunday-school teaching. It is indeed a most encouraging feature of the leavening work which Unitarians are doing that a paper so rational and a discussion so free as the one referred to should be possible, and one's hope for the future of Sunday-schools ought to be considerably brightened thereby. There is to my mind a deep significance in the recognition by the accomplished author of the essay read at the late conference of the claims of a more enlightened method to supersede the old, dull, unsalutary lessons which still form the bulk of Sunday-school teaching. I have but too often suffered pain at the spectacle of a number of lovely young faces shaded with unnatural gloom while the teacher was dealing out a worse than profitless (so far as concerned his class) lesson on a portion of Old Testament history. Surely there is enough outside the Sunday-school to sadden the children without the golden opportunity of the teacher inside to brighten the young life being more than lost! Surely, too, it were better far to lessen in any degree the appalling sum of human misery than to perpetuate a false esteem for degrading Jewish histories at the cost of the pleasant smile of a young child smiling in spite of woe! We boast of our love to man, but I wish I could see more of it. The Sunday-school teacher, if he but address himself to the task of fixing the sunny look of childhood "ere the sorrow comes with years," engages in a work of undoubted good. In these days, alas, and in London, the work must begin almost with infancy, because either "the sorrow" or else the irremediable degradation comes with very early years. I speak, of course, of that class to which Sunday-school work ought to be limited. No teacher whose aim is a true one would expend his time and energy upon children whose homes and parentage ought to warrant a better training than the Sunday-school can give, while children of thieves, drunken mothers, and cruel fathers remain unrescued in thousands. For these latter the dark ages still prevail in all their severity, and it is for these I specially appeal, while I urge the importance of a wider recognition of what Miss Swanwick advocates. "Flowers, like music, I regard as among the most precious gifts of Infinite Love," Miss Swanwick there supplies the text for my observations. "The injunction, 'Consider the lilies,'" she says, "might be urged to justify a botanical Sunday-school class." Well, now, botany has been taught in some of our Sunday-schools, as well as geology, and, I believe, physiology, and it is infinitely to the credit of Unitarianism that this is true. The broad truth, however, is disregarded, or looked upon askance and with suspicion, that the study of nature is more healthful than the study of books bound up with false ideas of the supernatural. There has been a craze in some quarters to teach the Greek tongue to Sunday-school classes—not that the magnificent epics of Homer and the splendid passages of Æschylus might be read, but that some wretched sentence in the "Apocalypse of St. John," perhaps, might be corrected in the Authorised Version.

I often wonder whether the people who squabble over the Greek article in their honest anxiety to arrive at the exact meaning of what they jealously guard as a Divine utterance are able to feel that awe of the Eternal Presence which the voices of Nature inspire. I once heard the observation of Nature depreciated by one who, before a religious assembly, rung the changes upon the word "protoplasm" (as typical of the study of life), and his sneers caused much laughter; but to me it was dire profanation. Dr. Lionel Beale found God himself in that very protoplasm which the preacher so heartily despised. The thunder, beneath which the savage trembles, does not terrify, and the superstition of a supernatural revelation, to which the unenlightened still bow down, does not strike with awe the man whose religion consists of deep reverence and silent worship in the presence of the forces of nature. The tendency of what Miss Swanwick advocates is much loftier than anything which can be reached by adherence to the orthodox system of identifying, in the child's mind, religion with the myths or histories of a semi-barbarous people. The invariable association of religion with the Bible is not only unfair, but it is positively injurious. It is a false association, and closes the mind to the real meaning of religion. "The aim of all true teachers will be to stimulate the minds of their pupils, to inspire a love for the good, the beautiful, and the true." And in order to achieve this end Miss Swanwick advocates the making of the schoolrooms beautiful with flowers.

"And thus was Beauty sent from heaven,
The lovely ministrant of Truth and Good in this dark world."

She urges, also, such subjects of teaching as are in harmony with this idea. Thus poetry has a foremost place in her system, and she relates the benefit which had been received by an old scholar from the study of Milton's "Comus." One of the speakers at the meeting maintained that the object of the Sunday-school was to teach religion, and another said that teachers should feel that they were engaged in "the salvation of the children." Neither of these had learned the lesson intended to be conveyed in these words of Miss Swanwick:—"One of the great lessons which I am anxious to enforce this evening, in opposition to the narrow Puritan notion of the antagonism subsisting between the natural and the spiritual words is, that religion will not exert her legitimate influence till she asserts her claim to direct every department of human life, and, consequently, till it is recognised that all knowledge may be hallowed by being devoted to her service." Some one urged that as the Bible was not "taught" in the day-school, it ought to be in the Sunday-school. Why so? There are better channels for the religious education of youth than the Bible. It is as baneful to associate religion with one book as it is to associate it with one day. Mr. Corkran, who always has a word of sound, practical, common sense, emphasised the best parts of Miss Swanwick's paper; and remarks made by Mr. Ion Pritchard showed that at Stoke Newington Green school the teachers were rather more free from conventionalities than at other places. It is hence no matter of wonder that the children at Stoke Newington-green adhere so well to the old school. It will be a happy day for the little ones when they are given flowers instead of catechisms, pictures instead of "salvation," and smiles instead of sanctimony. Such sunny rays as these will help to illuminate their lives.

Summer days are coming: some of the children only see the country when the school is taken out for the annual treat; why not give them this year two such treats? One day beneath the clear blue sky is worth many in the stuffy schoolroom, and if thereby young hearts are made to bound, that is better than much talk about "loving Jesus." I rejoice in the prospect of brighter and happier Sundays for the children.

W. MAWER.

THE OPIUM TRADE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The cultivation of the poppy and the preparation of opium in large quantities in China itself is a matter of the gravest importance, and one which very seriously affects the prospects of China's ultimate emancipation from the opium curse. Whether it affects our duty with regard to the only step practically under discussion at present is a very different matter.

There are three questions which we ought to keep perfectly distinct from each other, and which the defenders of the opium trade sedulously confound.

First. Are we justified in holding China under treaty obligation to admit opium at her free ports?

Second. Suppose China, relieved from foreign dictation, were to take vigorous measures to suppress the native production and the foreign importation, would it then be our duty to help her by restricting the cultivation of opium in India?

Third. Are we in any case justified in stimulating, for our own profit, the trade in a pernicious drug, and deliberately pandering to the besetting sin of another Power, while carefully guarding our own subjects against it?

Of these questions the only one now under practical discussion is the first, and I think it will be found that nearly all the arguments (such as they are) adduced by the Apologists for the trade refer to the third. It is a well-known manoeuvre to defend a position which is not assailed, and then turn round and say that the attack has failed.

I confine myself at present to the point actually at issue. Mr. Pease will move, as soon as practicable, for an address to her Majesty, praying her to relieve the Chinese Government from treaty obligation to admit opium, and the question before us is whether the extent of the native growth affects our duty in the matter.

That the poppy is largely grown in China, especially in the Western and Southern Provinces, admits of no doubt. The explanation of the fact is not so simple. Three theories seem possible. First. The Chinese Government may be insincere, or not sufficiently sincere, in the expressed desire to put down opium smoking. Second. They may be powerless to give effect to their wishes. Third. They may be encouraging the growth in pursuance of a deliberate design to drive out the foreign trade and then turn round and crush the home growth. These motives are not in every case mutually exclusive, and more than one of them may contribute to the actual result. Let us in the first place put the case in the most unfavourable possible light for China. Let us say that her object is purely financial, that she desires to get the trade or its profits into her own hands, and that if free to do so she would exclude all foreign opium, but would grow it freely herself. This is exactly what we do in India! We allow no one to import opium into our Indian dominions, though we grow it in enormous quantities ourselves. We do not wish our own subjects to be poisoned in India (the ghastly story of British Burmah I leave unnoticed), but we desire to drive our own trade in poison with the subjects of China. As an apologist of the trade put it in the House of Commons, "if the Chinese must be poisoned by opium, he would rather they were poisoned for the benefit of our Indian subjects than for the benefit of any other exchequer." Now suppose the Chinese Government really object to nothing but this. Suppose all else is sheer hypocrisy; and that what they really mean is this: "It is our subjects that are being poisoned, and it is only fair that we should have the profits. You have subjects enough of your own, and if you like to poison them you will make a very good thing of it, and we shall have no objection. But it is too bad to insist that we shall find the subjects and that you shall take the profits." Suppose all this were so, should we even then have the shadow of an excuse for insisting by force of arms on so shameful a division of the wages of sin? Would not China still be perfectly justified in saying, "What we do in China is our business, as what you do in India is yours. All we insist on is being allowed to keep your Indian opium out of China, just as you keep Chinese and all other opium, except your own, out of India?" That this is not what would really happen, even on the hypothesis of insincerity, we shall see presently. I merely put the case as the apologists of the trade seem to put it, and examine its bearings on our duty.

Now take the second supposition, that the reason why the Chinese Government do not suppress the opium growth is that they are not strong enough to do so. There may be some truth in this. Observe that some of the chief seats of the poppy culture are in provinces very remote from the central power. Our position in this case is, "because the Chinese Government cannot stop the opium evil everywhere, we will not allow them to stop it anywhere, if we can help it."

Now, thirdly, let us suppose that the native growth is deliberately connived at or even encouraged, in the hope that it may drive out the foreign trade and may then itself be effectually dealt with. I showed in my last letter that, improbable as this supposition appears at first hearing, there is much evidence to show that it is the true one. Sir Rutherford Alcock seemed distinctly to adopt it in 1871, and subsequent events have only strengthened the evidence for it. What our position is in this case it is terrible to think. We are driving China to enter upon this fearful competition with us, as a last resource, and she is committing herself more and more irrevocably to her awful course in the poor hope that when at last she has beaten us in the hideous race she may be able to retract her steps and recover the position in which she stood ere our hardened wickedness drove her to her ruin.

But now let us turn back to the first supposition and examine its consequences a little more closely. Suppose the Chinese Government have really no very strong desire to put down opium smoking. In that case is it conceivable that they would suppress the foreign trade if free to do so? It is universal admitted that there is now a highly efficient customs service at the Chinese treaty ports. It is admitted with equal unanimity that the internal customs service is corrupt and comparatively inefficient. Can we conceive that the central government would forfeit a large and certain revenue from the imported article in favour of the precarious chances of an equivalent from the home growth? Of what is it, then, that our financiers are afraid? If China is in earnest they admit that the trade is indefensible. If she is not in earnest the trade is safe even if no longer protected by treaty.

But here we come to another aspect of the matter, too often lost sight of. We not only insist on China's receiving our opium, but we insist on her receiving it subject to only a small import duty (levied by the efficient service), graciously allowing her to tax it as highly as she likes (or rather as highly as she can) when once it has safely passed the only really efficient barrier, and when smuggling has become easy. We have recently declined to sanction arrangements by which this smuggling would have been stopped, on the express ground (alleged by Lord Salisbury) that it would enable the Chinese to tax the drug as they liked.

Now suppose China to have no object in view except the purely financial one, and suppose her to be allowed to deal with opium as she chose. She would instantly raise the duty on the drug, and in order to keep it in the market we should have to surrender a part of our profits. At present we take at least four-fifths of the profits, and if the trade were allowed to settle itself on trade principles we may suppose that we should only get about half. This would involve a loss not of seven or eight millions a year, but of two or three.

This rectification of a gross commercial injustice is the most serious consequence that could befall our opium trade if the Chinese are not sincere in their desire to suppress it from moral considerations.

It seems to me, therefore, that if we allow the apologists of the trade to construct the hypothesis most favourable to their cause, in perfect disregard of evidence and probability, even then they can only urge that it is necessary to incur the shameful suspicion of corrupting the life and violating the conscience of a great nation, not in order to maintain our opium trade (which on this hypothesis is safe any way), but in order to maintain it on a commercially iniquitous footing.

These considerations lead me to suspect that even those who most vigorously denounce Chinese hypocrisy have an uneasy suspicion in the back of their minds that perhaps after all the Chinese are in earnest. I cannot see on what hypothesis, except that of Chinese sincerity, our opium revenue as a whole would be in any way threatened by the relaxation of existing treaty obligations.

For myself I believe and hope that the Chinese Government are in earnest, and that if China were free our opium trade would be doomed sooner or later to almost complete extinction. I hope the worst fears of the apologists of the opium trade as to the fall of the revenue would be realised—but this can only be so if their hypothesis of the insincerity of the Chinese Government turns out to be wholly untrue. If they believe in their own contention they ought to bid farewell to the first half of their fears.

THE LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to the Window Gardening Society connected with the Domestic Mission, George's-row, Lever-street, St. Luke's, E.C.? The Society is, we believe, taking root as one of the good agencies of the Mission; but the Committee must, as before, ask the aid of friends to carry on its work, and to hold the Annual Flower Show. Post-office orders may be made payable to the Secretary, Mrs. H. J. Eveleigh, or to the Missionary, the Rev. F. Summers. Gifts of potted plants will also be very gratefully received, and should be sent to the Mission as soon as possible.

PULPIT-TUBS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—There is a passage in your article this week on the "Decay of Modern Preaching" which must, I think, have been a slip on the part of the writer, and must have escaped your editorial eagle eye by inadvertence. The passage is:—"A pulpit, generally of the old tub-like form, where he (the minister) has no power of movement or action beyond that of thumping the pulpit cushion." Surely the most tub-like pulpit allows a minister the use of his arms, allows him to turn from side to side, to bend backwards or lean forwards, allows him, in fact, as much liberty of movement and action as a speaker at an ordinary public meeting has on a platform, where the space allotted to each individual speaker is but small.

I have heard Dr. Martineau, Mr. Clayden, and

Mr. Channing, in these often maligned tub-like pulpits, and I venture to say that neither of these representatives of very different styles of preaching found the form of the pulpit any restriction on their action. I have heard all three several times, and I never saw one of them thump the cushion. What would the writer of the article have? If a man has the gift of preaching, and has cultivated it, he does not need a platform, where he may prowl like a caged animal, in order to impress his hearers and gain influence over them.

The painfully low average of the salaries of ministers in our smaller churches has far more influence in deterring men of ability from entering our ministry than any other consideration, and I look forward hopefully to the establishment of something in the nature of a Sustentation Fund as one of the results of the coming Conference. Such a fund, properly administered, and I see no insuperable difficulty in it, would cure this evil.

THE LATE REV. D. DAVISON.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In justice to the memory of my father, the late Rev. David Davison, I feel bound emphatically to protest against the following phrase, contained in Mr. W. D. Jeremy's notice of him as a member of Dr. Williams's Trust—"as a minister he was not successful."

I can most distinctly assert, both from personal recollection and from numerous documents in my possession, that my father's career as a London minister was distinguished by great earnestness, conscientiousness, and eloquence—an eloquence constantly and successfully employed in the advocacy of religious freedom and of liberal thought, at a time when to advocate these things meant, indeed, "to fight the good fight." Quite as justly might Mr. Jeremy calmly set down the revered Thomas Madge as "not successful as a minister," because from causes beyond his control Essex-street Chapel was half empty during the latter part of his ministry, or the beloved Dr. Hutton as equally "unsuccessful," because from similar causes Carter-lane Chapel was given up as a place of worship.

"LECTURE ON TOBACCO."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am forwarding a copy of the "Lecture on Tobacco," advertised in your columns, to our ministers throughout the kingdom, and also to the Sunday-schools mentioned in the Sunday School Association Report, addressed to the Superintendent, or to the Secretary of the Congregation. If there is any omission I hope to be informed. Whether those who receive it agree with it or not, they will no doubt regard the subject as important. Even "Cope's Tobacco Plant" allowed that "few things could be more pernicious to boys, growing youths, and persons of unformed constitution, than the use of tobacco in any of its forms." I shall, therefore, be glad to forward copies gratuitously to any who have the care of the young, especially Sunday-school teachers. Residents in or near Manchester can be supplied, freely, at the office of the Anti-tobacco Society, 26, Corporation-street, Manchester; or an application can be posted to me, stating the number required.

Bridport, April.

P.S.—To our ministers I am enclosing an article on "White Slavery," for which I solicit their serious attention.

R. L. CARPENTER.

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.—On Sunday last the chapel was decorated with a fine show of beautiful and fragrant flowers gathered by the children of Lewes, and forwarded by a benevolent lady of that place. In the morning the Rev. W. C. Bowie discoursed on the beauty and charm of life provided by the Heavenly Father for every pure heart, taking for his text "Behold the lilies of the field, &c." In the afternoon the school children and those of the Blackfriars Mission assembled, with some parents, friends, and teachers, to the number of 500, and joined in a devotional service, and listened with much attention to an animated address by Mr. W. G. Tarrant, of Manchester New College. Mr. Noakes, a former scholar, played the organ, and the children raised their voices in good earnest in the hymns, and afterwards marched off each with a couple of bunches of flowers to decorate their dingy homes.

Religious Intelligence.

SOUTHAMPTON: FAREWELL PRESENTATION TO THE REV. D. AMOS.

On Tuesday week a meeting of the friends of the Rev. D. Amos was held in the Church of the Saviour, for the purpose of presenting him with a mark of their esteem, and of expressing their regret at his departure from Southampton, where, during his four years' residence, he has vigorously conducted the ministry of the church with which he was particularly identified, and has at the same time gained the respect and confidence of a large circle, embracing individuals of all shades of religious thought and political opinion. The Rev. gentleman, who has been appointed to the charge of the Unitarian Church at Scarborough, preached his farewell sermon on the previous Sunday evening to a large congregation, which included many members of other churches in the town. The meeting was presided over by Mr. Alderman R. PINNOCK, J.P., of Newport, Isle of Wight, and there were also upon the platform the Rev. R. Hodges, of Newport, Councillors Falvey and R. Chipperfield, and Messrs. C. J. Phillips, J. S. Pearce, and Duncan.

The Rev. D. Amos announced the receipt of several letters of apology for non-attendance. The Rev. C. E. Steward, vicar of St. Peter's, with whom, Mr. Amos said, he had spent many happy hours, and who had promised to be present, wrote that the vicar of St. Paul's (the Rev. G. C. White) had written to him very kindly, but so strongly, deprecating his proposed action to attend and address the meeting, that he could not now be present. Mr. Steward requested that the reason of his absence should be made known, and Mr. Amos added that St. Paul's being the mother parish it was necessary Mr. Steward should obtain the assent of the vicar before he could attend—(a laugh). Major-General Tryon, in his letter, wrote that he was happy in the belief that the barriers hitherto existing between Church and Dissent were fast crumbling away for it was to the mutual advantage of all to stand on the same platform. Mr. G. S. Coxwell, an old member of the Church, Mr. J. Bostock, Mr. C. Cox, and Captain Pifford also wrote, each testifying their regret at Mr. Amos's departure, and wishing him every success in his new sphere of action, and further apologies were announced from the Rev. H. Ierson, M.A., Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. Pond, Mr. Edwin Jones, J.P., Mr. R. Belben (Poole), Mr. T. Chatefield Clarke, Mr. Blesley (Portsmouth), and Mr. B. K. Spencer.

The CHAIRMAN, after some prefatory remarks, said Mr. Amos had been in the town about four years; he seemed to have made a great many friends of all denominations, and he had heard him highly spoken of by them all, and that gathering was to give to these friends an opportunity of publicly saying farewell to him.

The Rev. R. HODGES as one who had laboured in the same sphere as Mr. Amos felt considerable sympathy with him in the circumstances in which he was placed. While in Southampton he had been foremost as one of the reforming spirits, labouring not only in the denomination with which both of them were so proud to be connected, but also in other ways, in the cause of Liberalism as well as of Liberal Christianity. He hoped that the Unitarian cause would not suffer, and that Mr. Amos would be succeeded by one of at least equal ability with himself. He wished Mr. Amos God-speed in his departure, he trusted the Church at Scarborough would considerably profit by his ministrations, and that his settlement there would also be a very happy one to himself—(applause).

Mr. FALVEY said he appeared on that platform very greatly under the influence of two contending feelings. The first was one of very great pain and much personal regret that they were about to part with a gentleman whose friendship he had enjoyed, and he never remembered to have felt so much regret at parting with one with whom he had been on terms of friendship for so comparatively short a period—(applause). His next feeling was calculated somewhat to correct his feeling of pain and regret, because he sincerely hoped Mr. Amos was going to improve his position in his new home at Scarborough. Mr. Amos, in his intercourse with the people of Southampton, had been totally undenominational; he had never heard him from the pulpit—for he had occasionally heard him preach—make use of a word that could give offence to the most sensitive; in private he was always open to listen to a fair and critical examination of either sacred or secular subjects; while on the platform his services were not only recognised by people of all denominations, but by those of different political opinions—(applause). His genial and courteous manner, his kindness of heart, his tolerance and charity, his never-failing good temper and good humour, had made him a favourite with all who had had the pleasure of his acquaintance. One of our great poets had said—

"The thread of our lives would be sad, Heaven knows, Were it not with friendship and love intertwined;" and Mr. Amos in his every day conduct and life had fully illustrated these beautiful lines of Thomas Moore's; his ideas and views of human society and human happiness had not been limited to his own particular Church, or to any particular denomination, and he (Mr. Falvey) had often most sincerely wished that Christians would observe towards each other more of that freedom of thought and that kindness of intercourse which Mr. Amos had done both on the platform and from the pulpit. There were men and women in Southampton who did not agree with Mr. Amos in all his opinions; there were gentlemen on that platform who probably would not agree with all the opinions he entertained, but in a free country like this it was not necessary we should all agree in opinion. It would be a dull world, a very slough of despond, if all men and women were to be as one in thought; it was the clashing of opinion and a fair difference of opinion, and especially of difference of opinion upon speculative subjects, that had given so high a character to our country among the nations of the earth.

Mrs. GALTSMITH said that she wished to give expression to the regret which many of the congregation felt at parting with a minister whose pulpit services had given satisfaction generally to those who had regularly attended his ministry, and had followed the course he had taken in the improvement of his own theological mind as well as in the desire he had to improve theirs. They deeply regretted he was leaving them, and they sincerely hoped that in the North of England he would meet the success in his work, with success in pecuniary matters, and preside over a united church—(applause).

Mrs. WEBB said that as one of the oldest members of the congregation she had been asked to express towards Mr. Amos how deeply all his true friends felt his departure from Southampton, and at the same time to present him with a purse of gold as a small token of their appreciation of his ministry and character. They regretted his loss for many reasons, and they felt they were losing a good minister and a true friend. The amount in the purse would have been larger had more time and publicity been given to the testimonial, but wherever she had gone she had heard nothing but regrets at his leaving, and of the kindest wishes for his future happiness and prosperity. Mrs. Webb then read the names of the subscribers, and said it was with mingled feelings of pleasure and sorrow, joined in by the many contributors, that she had to ask his acceptance of the sum of £42 5s., sincerely hoping he would meet with the same sympathy in Scarborough that he had met with in Southampton—(applause).

The Rev. D. Amos, who was heartily applauded, said it was not possible for him under such circumstances to express what he should like to express towards them. He very heartily and sincerely expressed his thanks to the many kind friends who had contributed to this handsome gift; he had never expected it would reach such an amount, and it had come as a great surprise to him, though of course a pleasant surprise, for one could not but feel pleasure in a presentation of this kind. He was grateful, therefore, to his friends inside the church and out of it; he sincerely thanked Mrs. Webb for the interest taken in this matter, though he was sure it had been a labour of love on her part—(applause). For all the kind things said of him he was grateful. It had come upon him as a surprise, and he wished to know what he had done to deserve it? He had striven to do his duty, and endeavoured to express the honest convictions of his own mind, convictions not easily reached, but arrived at only after long and painful thought and anxiety. He only knew what it was to pass from darkness to light who had passed through the ordeal he had; passing from the narrow bonds of orthodoxy into the glorious liberty of the true sons of God, the liberty enjoyed by the men and women who thought honestly for themselves upon the great truths that lay about them. He thanked God he had passed through it. He came to them with a heart longing to give expression to opinions which he thought were going to convert the world; he came with great hopes that he should convert the Southampton people to Unitarianism, and that he should have a strong and united church here. Since that time he had passed through other mental changes, and they bore with him, many of them while he was passing through this extra battle, though perhaps but few of them knew what it really was. Some stood by him in his mental struggles and encouraged him by their presence. He trusted he had gone through his battles now, that he stood on firm and solid ground, and had been able to reach some truth; it was but a little bit God knew, but he hoped that little bit would not only help his own life, but the lives of those to whom he might minister in the future. He had striven to be here just a man amongst men; he had not assumed the dictator or the priest, but had simply endeavoured to do his duty as one called to speak to them about the things he thought upon and felt himself. He had been no master of their faith; he had no belief in priests, and the world was coming to disbelieve in them, and the sooner the better. He was but a layman called by laymen and laywomen to discharge a certain duty; they placed him there to preach and give expression to his religious convictions, but did that clothe him with any authority or power, or influence that the commonest of men could not wield? He had tried to be simply one of themselves, and outside the Church he had moved in all circles, among men of various shades of opinion, and had also endeavoured to be simply a man amongst them. He believed that what was right for a layman to do it was right also for a minister to do. He had participated in the politics of the town, and taken part in various social movements here. He had shared with his fellow creatures in their amusements and daily recreations, and endeavoured to be one amongst them. He trusted that no word or action of his had ever brought disgrace upon the religion he professed or the Master whom he professed to love and follow, Jesus Christ—(applause). He was sorry the time had come for him to part, but he hoped he should soon see their faces again, as he hoped before long to visit this good old town—(cheers). He felt the severance that was about to take place; might it be for his good as he believed it would be for theirs; they loved their little church, and he hoped it would grow strong and united, and be as a light set upon a hill, upholding that which was right, and true, and free, and being a menace to all that was despotic and degrading. He had endeavoured to watch the spiritual and moral interests of the town, and had spoken out very plainly, perhaps too plainly for some, on certain religious questions, but he had done all with the best feelings and the best motives. The rev. gentleman concluded by once more thanking the friends who had done so much for him, and expressing the pleasure it gave him to see Mr. Pinnock in the chair—(applause).

Mr. J. S. PEARCE followed in an earnest and thoughtful speech, expressing his opinion that in the departure of Mr. Amos Southampton was losing one whom it could ill-afford to let go, and the regrets he uttered were endorsed by Mr. P. R. DOMONEY, who said Mr. Amos had laid the foundation of a good work here, which he hoped his successor would take up and popularise, leading to an increase of numbers.

The Rev. D. Amos then addressed a few words to his congregation, which were responded to by Mr. Duncan, a member of the church committee, after which Mr. C. J. Phillips, expressed his sympathy with Mr. Amos in his departure, and his best wishes for his prosperity in his future career. He then proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman, which Mr. Chipperfield seconded, echoing the regret already expressed at Mr. Amos's departure from Southampton.

The motion having been carried by acclamation,

Alderman PINNOCK said he was glad to have been present to share with them in their expressions of regret at losing Mr. Amos, whom he regarded as one of the best friends he had in the district.

The Rev. D. Amos then bade his friends farewell, and a hymn having been sung the proceedings ended.

NORWICH.—At an adjourned annual meeting of the congregation of the Octagon Chapel, held in the Boys' school room, Calvert-street, on Tuesday, 4th inst., Mr. A. Mottram in the chair, a communication was read from the Rev. H. W. Perris, in which he announced his intention of resigning his office as minister of the Octagon Chapel. The following resolution was then passed:—"That this congregation regrets the occurrence of circumstances rendering it necessary that the Rev. H. W. Perris should have tendered the resignation of his office as minister of the Octagon Chapel, and in hereby accepting that resignation expresses its earnest wishes for his future welfare." At the same meeting the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of some members of the Chapel committee were filled up.

MANCHESTER UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

—The annual meeting of the members of the Union was held in the Memorial-hall, Albert-square, on Saturday evening. After tea the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the president, took the chair. In their twenty-third annual report (which was read by Mr. Harold A. Winsor, joint secretary with Mr. J. Wigley) the Committee stated that though the past session of the Union has not been marked by any event of special interest, such as the Raikes' Centenary, noticeable progress has been made in one or two directions. The area of the usefulness of the Association had been enlarged by the addition of two schools, that at Droylsden, which was a new school, and that at Dob-lane, Failsworth, making the total number of schools in the Union eleven. During the past year a series of addresses had been given on Sunday afternoons at different schools by gentlemen connected with the Union. This had merely been an experiment this session, but the appreciation manifested encouraged the hope that this branch of work would be developed. The Committee regretted to notice a slight falling off in the average attendance at the monthly meetings, which was the more to be regretted, as the papers read had been of unusual interest. The returns showed that the eleven schools within the Union had 2,158 scholars and 249 teachers on the books; that five of these schools had Bands of Hope connected with them, and seven possessed libraries. The Friendly Society formed in connection with the Union had now got fully to work, and would, it was hoped, prove a source of great usefulness. Perfect safety to the members had been the object aimed at. Such a Society, conducted entirely in the interests of the members themselves and without any of the extravagant outlay too often found in connection with these institutions, should be taken advantage of by all the schools.—The financial statement, which was read by Mr. Thomas Parry, treasurer, showed a balance in favour of the Union in respect of ordinary income and expenditure, but an extraordinary liability had been incurred in the formation of the Friendly Society, and this the friends were urged to try to clear off at the forthcoming Whit-Sunday festival without encroaching upon the ordinary funds of the Union.—The President, in moving the adoption of the report, said he was pleased to see the extension of the work in which the Union was engaged. He trusted that the new committee would provide a larger syllabus for the year, arranging not only for the monthly meetings but for a list of addresses more suitable and numerous even than in the past. He earnestly commended to the attention of the several schools the benefits offered by the newly-formed Friendly Society.—Mr. E. Winsor seconded the motion, which was agreed to.—Addresses were also given by the Revs. J. T. Marriott, Dendy Agate (Gorton), Noah Green (Mottram), Messrs. Cuthbert Grundy (Bury), John Ashworth, and others.—In the course of the evening the Strangeways Glee Party gave a selection of pieces.

BURY.—At the Unitarian Chapel two stained-glass windows, erected in memory of the late Mr. Thomas Wigley, of Timberhurst, were on Sunday unveiled. The large north window, presented by the sons and daughter of Mr. Wigley, gives a pictorial illustration of the text "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It is of five lights. In the centre light is a figure of Jesus, and to the right and left are the sick, the aged, the burdened, and the sinful looking to him for help. In the tracery are figures of the Evangelists and the Apostles. The second window, on the western side of the chapel, represents three scenes from the life of the Apostle Paul. It is of three lights, and is erected by subscription among the members of the congregation. In the centre light is Paul preaching at Athens; to the left Paul and Barnabas journeying; to the right "Paul the aged" under the care of a Roman soldier. In the tracery are figures of some of Paul's companions. The windows are composed of the choicest pot-metal glass, that is, glass in which the colour permeates the whole material, and the composition and drawing of the figures are excellent. Both windows are from the studios of Messrs. Mayer and Co., of Munich and London, and have been carried out under the immediate direction of Herr Francis Mayer. A memorial tablet, the work of Messrs. J. and H. Patteson, of Manchester, has been placed in the schoolroom. It bears the following inscription:—"To the memory of Thomas Wigley, of Timber-hurst, in recognition of his warm interest in the cause of education and of free religious faith. Gratefully recalling his long-continued and varied usefulness as a citizen and as a member of the Bank-street Congregation, his friends and fellow-worshippers erect this tablet to his memory as a tribute of affection and esteem, 1881."

SUNDERLAND.—The Unitarian Chapel, Bridge-street, after having undergone extensive alterations and improvements, which the comfort of the congregation worshipping there demanded, was reopened on Sunday last. It is fifty-two years since the Unitarian body became possessed of a separate church in this town, and during the period that has elapsed since that time they have continuously occupied the premises in Bridge-street. Mr. Lowe appears to have been the first minister, but he soon afterwards emigrated to America. He was succeeded by Mr. John Wright, who, after a ministry extending over two or three years, removed to Lynn, his place being taken by the Rev. H. McKean, during whose pastorate the rooms under the chapel, which had been used for school purposes, were, unfortunately in some respects, converted into shops. Mr. Braithwaite next conducted the services, and then Mr. John Wright returned from Lynn, but after some four or five years had elapsed he went into business. Mr. Ebenezer Syme's name appears next on the list. He was educated at St. Andrew's College for the Scotch Church, but seceded to the Unitarians. Subsequently he proceeded to London as a journalist, and finally went to Australia, where he became a member of the Legislature, and where he died. The Rev. R. Spears came to Sunderland in 1852, and remained there for five years. He was followed by Charles Matthews, Archibald Macdonald, Joseph Smith, John Whitworth, and the Rev. James Macdonald (now at Kendal). The Rev. Wm. Elliott completes the fourth year of his pastorate this week. The new pews are made with sloping backs and easy seats, with ornamental bench ends. In front of the fixtures there are eight movable seats, which can be reversed so as to form tables if necessary. The pulpit is supplanted by an elegant rostrum, raised two feet six inches above the floor. In the centre is a reading-desk (made to be lowered or raised at pleasure by an ingenious invention), effectively supported by small pilasters. Between these are panels, with carved bosses on each. On either side there is ornamental metal railing, which will be coloured and relieved with gold. The screen which separates the chapel from the vestry is composed of panels filled with tinted cathedral glass. The walls have been neatly painted, the ceiling whitewashed, and four new gas suspenders introduced. The work has been satisfactorily accomplished by Mr. Joseph Huntley, under the superintendence of Messrs. Tillman. The cost is about £200.—On April 2 two special sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Elliott to good congregations, many strangers being present in the evening. On Monday a public tea was held in the chapel. After tea a public meeting was held, ably presided over by Councillor Thomas Johnston, who has taken a very generous interest in the improvements which have been effected. Interesting addresses were given by the Revs. R. C. Smith, W. Elliott; Messrs. Geo. Lucas, of Darlington, F. Brown, J. Fothergill, J. Metcalf, T. Manning, W. Hemsley, and J. Street. A resolution, moved by Mr. Elliott, thanking friends in distant parts of the country who had contributed towards the cost of the improvements, was carried with the most hearty enthusiasm. The choir, led by Miss Hemsley at the harmonium, contributed much to the pleasure of the evening by the excellent manner in which they rendered an interesting selection of music. Every one appeared to be delighted with the improvements which have been made in the chapel, and hearty congratulations were on the lips of all. Votes of thanks to the ladies who had provided an excellent tea gratuitously, to the choir for their services, and to Mr. Johnston for presiding, were carried with entire unanimity, and a happy meeting was concluded by the singing of a hymn and by the Benediction.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.—The seventh annual meeting of the members of the Sunday Society was held on Friday, March 31, at the Rooms in Conduit-street; Mr. Hodgson Pratt presiding. The annual report, which was read by the Hon. Sec., Mr. Mark H. Judge, referred to the work of the Society having been pursued with unabated vigour during the Presidency of Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., and to the growth of public opinion in favour of its objects, and said: "The conviction is evidently gaining ground that the Government cannot much longer delay the extension of its Sunday opening policy to the National Museums and Galleries in the heart of the metropolis, for since 1854, when the Committee of the House of Commons recommended the opening of places of rational recreation and instruction on Sundays after the hour of two o'clock P.M., both Liberal and Conservative Governments have continued to open on Sundays the National Museums and Galleries at Kew, Hampton Court, Greenwich, and Dublin, with such results as have not only satisfied her Majesty's Government, but have had the effect of inducing the Corporations of Birmingham, Manchester and other large towns in the provinces to open Municipal Institutions of a similar kind on Sundays." The Sunday Art Exhibitions initiated by the Society had been continued, and were being initiated both in London and the provinces. Twelve had been opened last year under the auspices of the society, and on fourteen Sundays these exhibitions were visited by no less than 19,824 people. The report referred to the Social Science Congress, and the Church Congress, and the gain of the year in the decision of the Town Councils of Kidderminster and Stoke-on-Trent to open their free libraries and museums on Sundays. The loss sustained by the society in the death of Dean Stanley, its former president, was dwelt upon, and the report closed with the expression of a determination on the part of the members to spare no exertions to obtain an early settlement of the Sunday opening question. The balance-sheet showed that the income of the year 1881, with the balance from 1880, amounted to £737 1s. 1d., while the balance in hand on the 31st December last was £141 6s. 1d. Mr. Hodgson Pratt addressed the meeting at some length, in proposing the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, which was seconded by Mr. Robson J. Scott, and unanimously passed, after a suggestion had been agreed to from the body of the meeting that the report should embody the remarks of Mr. Mundella in support of lending articles from South Kensington to exhibitions opened on Sundays. Viscount Powerscourt, K.P., was unanimously elected President of the society, and after the transaction of routine business the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Chairman, on the motion of Mr. C. E. Cassal, F.C.S.

THE REV. H. R. HAWEIS ON LONGFELLOW.

The Rev. H. R. Haweis, in addressing a crowded congregation, which filled even the vestry, at St. James's, Marylebone, on Sunday night, said of the late American poet—Longfellow was the chief poet in that illustrious circle of writers who, at the beginning of this century, created American literature. Emerson and Oliver Wendell Holmes and Lowell are almost the only survivors. After a brief biography of the poet, Mr. Haweis continued: He has taken possession of our English hearts and homes. He has become our friend. There is a power of ministration about him that we cannot resist. His sympathy reaches across the wide ocean; his voice is heard by those who love it; his teaching felt by those who need it. I asked Mr. Tennyson the other day if he had known Longfellow. He said, "Yes," and bore willing testimony to the charm of his gentle nature. Mr. Robert Browning, who had also known him, was present, and remarked that he was "the kindest-hearted and most courteous of men," and in his case I may say with the Laureate—

"Manners are not idle, but the fruit
Of loyal nature and of noble mind."

On Longfellow's natural religion the preacher remarked: There are immense gains in the study of philosophy and science, but we are in danger of losing something—the sharp, keen, primitive taste—"the great glad aboriginal instincts," as Emerson calls them; the healthy loves and hates—ay, and the healthy response of soul to God. We go with blunted perceptions and bleared eyes to God's beautiful world. But what constitutes the religious heart is just this—to be able to see, as Henry Melville puts it, "the whole world burning with Deity!" The Poet, the Painter, the Prophet are alike in this—they have all the unspoiled health of the piercing, penetrating, spiritual sense; they carry about with them the riches, and we too often the poverty of the world. Someone said to Turner: "Mr. Turner, I never saw such colours and effects as you paint in Nature!" "Ay," said the painter, "but don't you wish you could?" And who does not wish that his eyes could be opened, his heart attuned, to see and feel the eternal presence and power—like the poet as he listened to the voices of the Ocean and the Woodland and the Night, as well as to those of the Temple and the Fireside?

"Into the blithe and breathing air,
Into the solemn wood;
Solemn and silent everywhere,
Nature with folded hands seemed there:
Like one in prayer I stood."

Mr. Haweis went on to speak of the Songs of Life and Death, and remarked on the poet's wide sympathies with all forms of human suffering and sorrow. This was no doubt due to the mellowing influence of his own great life of grief—the losses of his beloved wife, children, and many dear friends. He was not only one of those "souls that have made our souls wiser," as Emerson has it—he was a great consoler. Death itself became an angel of light in "The Reaper and the Flowers": the Silent Land—from whence no traveller returns—a realm of sweet Elysian rest to be desired; and even a city graveyard is transfigured in the closing lines of "Evangeline."

Speaking of Longfellow's energy, hopefulness, and aspiration, Mr. Haweis remarked on "Excelsior" that a letter of the poet's explanatory of that poem had been put into his hands, as he entered the pulpit. In that letter, which has appeared in some of the newspapers, Mr. Longfellow explained that the poem described the aspirations of a man of genius—putting aside every hindrance—and ever reaching forward to higher and higher efforts—at last dying with the unattained still beyond him. But the poem has a wider reach, for it sums up in one noble and poetic figure the story of every true and aspiring life. In answer to the impertinent criticism, repeated in last week's Saturday Review, that Mr. Longfellow had made a slip in using "Excelsior" instead of "Excelsiur," the poet in this letter remarks that the use of "Excelsior" adverbially is one justified by the best Latin writers.

Mr. Haweis interspersed his observations with several readings from Longfellow, concluding with the famous episode of the Monk Felix out of the "Golden Legend."

THE BROOK FARM EXPERIMENT.

In an address recently delivered to an assembly at Boston, U.S., the Rev. O. B. Frothingham gave the following interesting account of Brook Farm, the idyllic community immortalised in Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance":—

I naturally turn to that subject which has been filling my own mind for three months,—the character of George Ripley, whose biography I have been writing.

All of you perhaps do not know that for nearly fifteen years Mr. Ripley was a Unitarian minister in Boston. At the time he was ordained, in 1826, Mr. Greenwood was preaching at King's Chapel, Charles Lowell was preaching as predecessor of Dr. Bartol, James Walker was preaching in Charlestown, Dr. Channing was preaching in Federal-street, Dr. Ware was preaching in Hanover-street. In a word, it was a palmy day, a great day of anticipation and of hope, for all Unitarians. It was anticipated that the whole world would soon become Unitarian. Unitarianism wore its freshest aspect.

Mr. Ripley was born in Greenfield, Mass., of the finest Puritan stock, thoroughly trained and thoroughly educated, with the New England ambition and earnestness of purpose in his heart, and with his soul full of the aspirations that filled the best hearts of that time. Leaving his home, he went through Harvard, and was so fine a scholar that the authorities entrusted to him the teaching in mathematics.

Immediately on graduating he went to Boston as minister. At that time—not now—all genius, all talent, all scholarship, naturally gravitated toward the ministry. It was the great profession. The members of it stood at the very top of society. All doors were open to them. They had the place of honour. They were looked up to by young and old. Their lightest word was listened to and waited on.

Mr. Ripley was what was then called a Transcendentalist; that is to say, he was one of those people who believed that divine truth was associated intimately with the feelings, wishes, purposes, anticipations of the human heart and soul. Full of these ideas, he entered upon his ministry, Dr. Kirkland, then President of Harvard College, taking a great interest in him. He called himself a child of Channing. He was on intimate terms with the best thinkers and feelers, the most earnest and purest men of that generation. But his church was planted in an out-of-the-way part of the town, as it is regarded now, though at the time it was thought to be a fashionable quarter, near Fort Hill. I dare say some of you hardly know where Fort Hill is, or where it was; for it does not exist any more. It was cut down, carted away, and thrown into the sea, for aught I know. But he lived near Fort Hill, making that his headquarters, calling on the sick and the poor, and doing what good he could. But his church, not being in a fashionable place, soon left him. He had not the gift of eloquent or captivating speech, so that people would come for miles to hear him. As his society faded away, he became tired of the ministry and weary of the homespun routine of ministerial service. The weekly sermon weighed upon him; he was, after all, more a man of letters than a clergyman.

So, after a time, the enterprise of Brook Farm loomed up before his vision. I say loomed up, for it did precisely that. I recollect some days ago reading in a daily paper a paragraph in which it was said that Brook Farm was, after all, a dull place. So it was to dull people. But it was full of aspiration and of hope, a splendid dream of the future for the best spirits of that generation. It is a mistake to suppose that it was a descent from the ministry to Brook Farm. In fact it was but the legitimate result of such a ministry as Mr. Ripley's was. Dr. Channing had expressed his wish that some such experiment could be tried. The best spirits of the time talked it over, discussed it. The best society of the time was full of it. It was simply a scheme for carrying out practical Christianity; for realising, as we say, the gospel; for making the beatitudes a frank and full existence on the earth.

Filled with that idea and possessed by it, and all his enthusiasm thrown in that direction, Mr. Ripley, weary, as I have said, of the routine of the ministry, and seconded by a very noble wife, devoted himself to the realisation of that dream. His wife was as full of it as he was, quite as enthusiastic, quite as hopeful, quite as earnest. They two were always present at the discussions in regard to Brook Farm; and they both of them went into it with the idea that it was the practical fulfilment of the gospel. It was not in any sense a socialistic community. There was no tinge or taint of communism about it. There was no disrespect of property; there was no criticism of society, except that it was false; but there was no radical theory started upon which a new society should be built up. The gospel principle was the only one that was entertained.

Another thing; it was firmly believed that the best part of society would take an interest in the scheme; that the thinkers and workers, the men of wealth, all those who hoped for a better state of things—as so many professed to do—would come forward at once, and aid in setting the scheme on its feet. The New Jerusalem was expected to come down from the clouds. There was no limit to the expectation cherished by the men and women who entered into that project. They really believed, living as they did all their days among a few people, a little clique of people, a small circle, who entertained the same ideas with those they firmly held, that those people made the world. Consequently, when George Ripley and his wife, with a little body of co-workers, stepped out of their conceded position, left their satin and silk and broadcloth for the sake of realising the kingdom of heaven on earth, they did it in full faith that the kingdom of heaven would come on the earth.

Another feature should be made prominent: it was an educational enterprise. These men and women believing in man, believing in human nature, believing in the soul, believing in the capacities of the heart, were thoroughly persuaded that by educating freely, by the aid of nature, of art, of music, of all kinds of culture, everything that was good and noble, just and true, in men and women, the result produced would be such as never had been seen in the world.

Let me say that such a corps of educators never, perhaps, was brought together before or since. Mr. Ripley himself was the leader, one of the finest scholars in New England. A man of perfect training, of singular acquaintance with systems of philosophy, with mathematics and history. He was seconded by his wife, who had been a professional teacher, thoroughly trained, perfectly well acquainted with the whole routine of practical education. Mr. Charles Dana, present editor of the New York Sun, taught Greek and German, an admirable linguist and one of the finest scholars of the time. Mr. John S. Dwight taught Latin and music; and, when I say that, it is a pledge that music of the very highest description was made one of the elemental and rudimentary rules of education at Brook Farm. Then Mr. Emerson took an interest in it. Nathaniel Hawthorne was there for a time. Margaret Fuller came in the early period, and gave some of her matchless conversations; a sibyl in talk and truly inspired, a person whose readings gave no idea of the depth, the richness, the fulness, the afflatus, that always waited upon her lips—a woman whose talk, whatsoever the subject may be, always fascinated and riveted her hearers. With a musical voice and enthusiastic manner, a mind teeming with ideas and full of aspiration, she gave the very best of herself to Brook Farm. The evenings that she went there and talked were golden evenings in every regard. With such advantages as these, with a beautiful nature all around them, with freedom of action, with entire liberty of thought and feeling, what wonder is it that young men and women look back upon Brook Farm now, though their hairs are grey, as a kingdom of heaven on the earth? The young people enjoyed the freedom, the old people enjoyed the spirituality. The boys and girls played, and loved that; the elders worked with hope and faith, and loved that.

For the brief space of seven years Brook Farm stood for all that was noblest and purest in the hope and imagination of men.

A tract of land about nine miles from Boston, and about one hundred and seventy-fives acres in extent, was bought for $10,500. George Ripley made himself responsible for $1,500; his wife for $1,000 or more; Miss Mary Ann Ripley, a favourite sister of George, for $1,000 more; Nathaniel Hawthorne, for another $1,000. There was just about money enough subscribed to buy the farm. They went there, expecting, as I said, that great things would come out of these small beginnings.

But, after all, the world was not transcendental. Society was not made up of Transcendentalists, and did not even know what Transcendentalism meant. Dr. Channing was a great preacher, and Mr. Greenwood was a fascinating one. Dr. Walker was a powerful one. Mr. Palfrey, at Brattle-square, was a convincing one. Each had his own congregation;

but what Transcendentalism was, what this new faith was which was transfiguring the minds and hearts of a little knot of people, the congregations did not know at all. The consequence was that the money was not forthcoming, and we know very well that there is no such thing as living in castles in the air. A house must be built on the ground, and money is required to build it. We all know that. The money did not come in. Year after year, these devoted men toiled and hoped and believed; but the money did not come in. In vain did they make their representations, in vain did they publish their manifesto, in vain did they sing their song, in vain did they tune their harps; the great world cared little about them. The amount of it was that Brook Farm died. After a short existence, every year of which became more and more painful, Brook Farm died.

Fourierism was called in to save it, but that failed. The money still did not come in; and the men and women, tired of labour, tired yet more of toiling without recompense, seeing their dream fade away, knowing at last that their hope was an illusion, not seeing the material foundation appear, broke up and scattered.

The charm of Brook Farm to-day lies simply in its ideal character. It was an idyll; it was a dream: it was an anticipation of something that never came to pass. Transcendentalism died, Dr. Channing died, Mr. Walker went to Cambridge, Dr. Palfrey went to Congress, the palmy days of Unitarianism came to an end. Brook Farm, that fair anticipation, faded away, and came to an end, like everything else that is not useful. At last there was something pathetic, touching, almost tragic about it.

It is said that one of Theodore Parker's congregation once asked him what he thought of Brook Farm. Mr. Parker lived close by in West Roxbury, and had a little congregation there. He was an intimate friend of Ripley's, and used to go over every day or two and have a talk with his old crony. When Mr. Parker's friends asked him what he thought of Brook Farm, "Well," said he, "Ripley at Brook Farm is like a locomotive finely equipped, beautifully polished, steam well up, dragging a train of mud cars." The next time Ripley saw Parker he said, "Theodore, do you know what people say of your congregation?" "No," said Theodore, "what do they say?" "Well, they say that you are very much like a finely equipped steam engine dragging a train of mud cars!" It was not much of a joke, and it was rather tragic. Nevertheless there was a certain amount of truth in it. Brook Farm was fading away, and it is pleasant to note that the leader of it could still laugh when it ended.

Mr. Ripley went to New York, turned to a new occupation, and devoted himself to it with the same fidelity, the same earnestness that he showed at Brook Farm.

What is the reason that to this day people are curious about Brook Farm? What was there of it? Nothing. I have tried, not quite in vain, but almost, to ferret out in the last months some information, some detail about it. There is very little, because it was an illusion. It was a dream, a charming dream, a noble dream; still, one of those evanescent, yet not altogether evanescent, visions of a better humanity which will dawn upon the earth. The noble spirits of Brook Farm to this day pursue the thought of it as being one of those anticipations, like the dream of Plato or of Sir Thomas More, the finest illusion of the finest spirits,—that the time shall come when society, human society, shall be simple, true, faithful, as the best Christians always prayed that it might be.

The last meeting of the Oxford Browning Society, at the Rector of Lincoln's, to hear Mr. Arthur Sidgwick's paper on Browning's love poetry, was the most successful meeting the Society has held. A large number of guests were present, including some from London.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "James Epps and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.

ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

COLDS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE, and the word CHLORODYNE coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness, and as being the same thing. Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD, STATED PUBLICLY in Court that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE was UNDOUBTEDLY the INVENTOR of CHLORODYNE, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See The Times, July 13th, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a LIQUID MEDICINE which ASSUAGES PAIN of EVERY KIND, affords a calm, refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and INVIGORATES the NERVOUS SYSTEM when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC FOR CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.

The GENERAL BOARD of HEALTH, London, REPORT that it ACTS as a CHARM, one dose generally sufficient.

Dr. GIBBON, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states: "TWO DOSES COMPLETELY CURED ME OF DIARRHŒA."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC, PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

COUGH, COLD, &c.

From W. VESALIUS PETTIGREW, M.D., formerly Lecturer at St. George's Hospital, LONDON.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an Anti-Spasmic and Sedative. I have used it in Consumption, Asthma, Diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

From W. C. WILKINSON, Esq. F.R.C.S., Spalding.

"I consider it invaluable in Phthisis and Spasmodic Cough; the benefit is very marked indeed."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the TRUE PALLIATIVE in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER,
TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and Co., Horncastle.

"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other Sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

THE long-projected Conference of Unitarian and other free Churches about to be held in Liverpool next week is on the eve of becoming a fact—whether a great fact or not depends upon the tone of the proceedings and their practical results. The project has on the whole been received with general approval, and the long lists of deputations from our most important churches and institutions published, in our last two numbers, show that the invitation has been quite as widely responded to as could have been reasonably expected. Scarcely a voice has been raised in objection: there has been little or no criticism of a noteworthy kind; there is on all sides an evident disposition to give a novel and very interesting experiment a fair trial, and to subordinate all minor differences in a recognition of the great principles we hold in common.

The term "National Conference" has been objected to as pretentious, in view of the obvious fact that the group of churches convened constitutes in the aggregate one of the smallest of denominations, and are held together by the loosest of Ecclesiastical ties. But the phrase has been misunderstood if it is thought to imply anything more than that this is simply a convention of all the churches in the nation belonging to the Free Christian or Free Religious tendency. On that understanding the most insignificant of religious sects or political parties may fairly convene what may be styled a national conference of all who concur with its main principles and purposes.

Nevertheless we cannot but wish that a less apparently pretentious title had been chosen.

It is certain that whether we like it or not this meeting will be known in our history as a Unitarian Conference. It is an open question whether it might not have been wiser to have convened it on a broader basis, to have avoided any direct or indirect connection with a theological and denominational Society, to have invited all Catholic and liberal-minded thinkers throughout the country who recognise that real religious fellowship is independent of theological conditions and limitations. But whatever might thus be gained in catholicity would be lost in definiteness of purpose. As a matter of simple fact, there are but few churches outside our own which are even professedly founded upon a free religious basis. But the question is not now open for discussion. The Liverpool Conference is convened by a committee appointed by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. That very fact is sufficient to keep away all who are not more or less in sympathy with Unitarian Christianity. Only two or three ministers and congregations not avowedly Unitarians have responded to the invitation, and they are generally regarded as heretics and outsiders, so that the Conference is, to all intents and purposes, a Unitarian Conference and nothing else. Some may regret this; the great majority will rejoice in it; but the fact remains the same in any case.

One thing is to be clearly understood at the very outset. The invitation is issued to "ministers, members, and friends of all Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or kindred congregations." That is the only basis on which we are to meet. Any attempt to introduce a test or declaration of opinions or definition of faith, direct or indirect, ought to be treated as an insult and an impertinence, and authoritatively ruled out of order from the chair. In our separate churches it is the boast both of our ministers and congregations, that our bonds of union consist in spiritual affinities and religious sympathies, and that no dogmatic conditions are expressed or implied. In the Liverpool Conference there must be no attempt to introduce any narrower definition as a basis of union or of common action. Our American brethren wasted nearly the whole time in their first Conference in this attempt at definitions and test-making, which always means the invidious desire to exclude some small minority, or some obnoxious form of thought. It is essentially unchristian in its spirit and purpose, and we hope that any attempt to defeat the main object of religious fellowship, in the broadest and deepest sense of the term, will be discountenanced at the outset by the good sense and calm resolute judgment of the Conference as a whole.

The order of proceedings is before the public, and there can be no doubt that the subjects of the papers, and the names of the readers and speakers so judiciously selected, will give great weight and permanent value to what we suppose may be regarded as the first of a long series of biennial or triennial conferences. In the unusual richness and variety of the programme there is some reason to fear that there will be not sufficient time for the consideration of practical propositions naturally arising out of such important questions as the education and supply of ministers, the means by which our churches can maintain and extend their religious influence, and ministers' stipend and augmentation funds. The whole time is so fully marked out with the pre-arranged papers and discussions that no opportunity seems to be afforded for any free and spontaneous action on the part of the Conference itself on matters that may be regarded as properly falling under its province. It would certainly be a graceful act if this, the first national Conference of Unitarians held in this country in our generation, sent a resolution of sympathy to our American brethren on the loss of three of the most eminent men in our religious communion, LONGFELLOW, BELLOWS, and DEWEY. Further, it would be an act eminently worthy of a religious conference to express a decisive opinion, on definitely religious grounds, in favour of abolishing the whole system of parliamentary oaths, which act as a bribe only to insincerity and falsehood, and a barrier to the free constitutional exercise of political rights. No fear of misconception or misrepresentation ought to stand in the way of bold and decided action on this question, in which we fear some Unitarians fall far behind their brethren of other Nonconformist Churches. Other subjects of equal importance would naturally suggest themselves for consideration, if the Conference is perfectly free to control its own proceedings, and too much time is not wasted in preliminary discussions of the formal and unprofitable order.

We fervently pray and hope that this Conference will mark the dawn of a new religious epoch in the history of our Free Churches. Even if it end in little more than full and free discussion of some of the difficulties of our position, let it be characterised at least by a spirit of true Christian brotherhood. Let it be understood that we meet together for religious fellowship, and not for mere disputation or unprofitable criticism. At the same time we need not be afraid of "burning questions." Little will be gained if we do not look at the facts of our condition steadily in the face, however unsatisfactory they may be, and endeavour our best to see things as they really are. We need not fear the freest and fullest discussion, if only it be imbued with a thoroughly religious and brotherly spirit. Unity amid diversity of thought; charity in all things—these ought to be the great watchwords of every assembly professing to represent the Unitarian and other Free Churches.

CONCERNING REMEDIES.

IN three preceding articles, closely following the main outlines of the Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY'S valuable book, we have considered some of the principal causes of the alleged decay of Modern Preaching, and the "defective types," which are avowedly directed against the extremes of Orthodox dogmatism and emotionalism, with which we have little concern, except as curious outside observers. Our withers are also unwrung when Mr. MAHAFFY condemns the class of "Broad" preachers who "set forth from their pulpits doctrines clearly at variance with the creed which they have professed, and present the painful spectacle of inconsistency and self-contradiction in a teacher who ought to be of all things clear and consistent." We remain also untouched when our Essayist condemns the "extreme of sameness" which characterises modern sermons, and which tends to make people think that they will only hear what they knew long before, and what is therefore hardly worth hearing again. The reference here is to the school of pious preachers who think that all Christianity centres round one cardinal doctrine—Justification by Faith in CHRIST'S Atonement; and who make it a matter of conscience not to vary the subject-matter of their preaching, except in the choice of the text, and some illustrations chiefly limited to the Bible story, or to goody anecdotes more or less puerile and inept. Monotonous preaching of this kind is on the decline, even among Evangelical sects. The modern public, as Mr. MAHAFFY observes, are used to much more intellectual variety than their forefathers. They find intellectual recreation in various literature, and in the many exciting subjects of discussion in the Press and on public platforms. The Pulpit must not pander to the excessive love of novelty and variety, but certainly the total neglect of all the deeper questions that agitate thoughtful minds in the present age is not the way to arrest the tendency to a decline, or to secure greater respect for what, in its true ideal, is the noblest of human functions.

But while Mr. MAHAFFY strenuously opposes these extremes of Orthodoxy, he deprecates the other extreme, as he considers it, of "a general laxity as regards the importance of dogma, and a sort of easy-going implication that we must leave men great liberty as to their beliefs, provided they are strict in their duties and their life." Here we confess that we join issue with our essayist. The cardinal principles of the Liberal faith are character and conduct before creed and dogma; the unfettered right of private judgment as the essential means of attaining the knowledge of the truth. What a man really believes in his inmost heart and soul is no doubt of the most vital importance to himself, and we are far from sanctioning any laxity in the formation or the avowal of one's opinions. But if in this age of ours, when creeds are dissolving, and the old traditions and superstitions are outworn, an earnest, thoughtful man, doing his best to discern light in the midst of surrounding darkness, can arrive at no fixed dogmatic conclusion on some of the vexed questions of speculative opinion, what after all, does it greatly matter provided that he still patiently strives after the highest truth and endeavours his best to fulfil the noblest ideal in character and life? The world has never been reformed by preaching morals, urges our Essayist. No, and it has never been reformed by preaching hard orthodox dogmas. The world has been saved and reformed only by great ideas, by living principles of thought, which have gone forth from inspired lips, making all things spiritually new. It was not mere dogma which lay at the root of the Reformation of Luther and the Evangelical revival of WESLEY, but the living and fructifying principles that underlie all the great dogmas that have gained temporary credence. It was not the mere dogma of CHRIST'S death, regarded as a forensic act, not the dogmas of the Incarnation and the Atonement, which formed the substance of the early Christian preaching and reformed the world. It was the great truth of the manifestation of GOD in our common humanity; the consecration of the purest and noblest of His sons to the service of humanity, through labour and suffering and the martyrdom of death; it was these and other great principles underlying the hard dogmas, which really saved the world; and they will be as powerful as of old in impressing the heart of this worldly-wise, pleasure-seeking, and intellect-worshipping age, if only they were preached with something of their old power and devoted enthusiasm. Mr. MAHAFFY is unfortunate in his reference to "Ecce Homo" as a book in itself "beautiful and true, but not able to produce any permanent impression on Society." If he were as well acquainted with English thought as he is with the ancient Greek literature and the modern Episcopal Church in Ireland he would know that no book of our age has exercised stronger or more permanent impression on the real thinkers and workers of modern society, and that the real secret of its influence is that "enthusiasm of humanity" which subordinates to high moral ends the creeds, dogmas, and confessions of all the Churches.

This, then, would be our chief remedy for the alleged decay of modern preaching; and believing in its efficacy, we avoid the pessimist conclusion which Mr. MAHAFFY apparently adopts, that the day of preaching is gone by; that educated congregations at least no longer want instruction from the pulpit when they can find it in thousands of books; and that therefore "preaching is perhaps altogether a mistake nowadays." Mr. MAHAFFY graciously concedes that so long as we have it at all it is desirable to have it as good and telling as possible; and his "remedies" may be summed up in few words, while we must leave the discussion of them to another opportunity.

In brief, then, while discouraging us at the outset by the paradoxical thesis that "success in preaching would seem impossible and all our labour in vain," Mr. MAHAFFY urges as the best thing available, higher and more careful culture in the preachers, so that they may be superior to the average of their congregations, and fitted to speak as educated men on the great topics which they profess to expound. Hence they should have a University education as well as special theological training. They should also be trained in rhetoric and in extempore speaking, which alone affects the masses, although carefully-prepared written discourses are best adapted for the thoughtful few. Mr. MAHAFFY recommends the establishment of an Order of itinerant preachers, whose whole duty should be to travel from place to place for the purpose of speaking from the pulpit. We have had among ourselves an illustration of the efficacy of such a plan in the itinerant ministry of the Rev. CHARLES WICKSTEED, which is so fitting a crown to a life rich in high thoughts and good works. Would that there were at least half-a-dozen able and willing to follow his example and constitute themselves into an Order of missionary preachers, reviving decayed congregations, and stimulating everywhere new life and activity!

Curiously enough, our Essayist thinks that for a preacher who should soar above the practice of ordinary life, and proclaim ideal piety, ideal virtue, ideal self-sacrifice, the Roman Catholic law of celibacy is very profitable. Our fair readers need not be alarmed. There is not the slightest danger of celibacy becoming fashionable among dear little curates, or popular young ministers. Human nature is too strong for any restraints of this kind, but those enforced by the most binding laws of the most despotic Church the world has ever seen. "It is ELIJAH from the desert," says Mr. MAHAFFY, "it is JOHN the BAPTIST from the wilderness, it is SAVONAROLA from his cell, who are best qualified to impress and lead mankind by preaching." We greatly doubt it. These were men of their own age and best adapted for their age. It is the cultured University men who are best adapted now to impress the minds of cultured hearers; the popular lecturers and missionary-ministers, well versed in the world, but not of the world, who can best stir the heart of the common people.

And, finally, Mr. MAHAFFY suggests the abolition of constant sermons, it being unreasonable to expect two good sermons every week, or even one; the publication of a new and large collection of authorised sermons by the heads of each Church, selected from her greatest doctors, and given to every minister to use freely when he is unable to produce anything useful of his own; and the expediency of preaching, not in pulpits, but on platforms or from the chancel, or in some other way less bound by fixed ceremony.

But, after all, these remedies and suggestions, useful as they are, do not go to the root of the matter. There is still demand for preaching in this modern world, because the living voice of an earnest man is better than the choice thoughts of the printed book. And whosoever can speak like a live man straight to the hearts and consciences of his fellow-beings will be heard as of old with eager attention, and his word will be with "grace and power," because men in their inmost hearts know that the world is not to be saved from sin and corruption by philosophy, or science, or culture alone, but by the grand old truisms of Religion and Duty.

DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY.

V. TOTAL HUMAN DEPRAVITY.

THE subject of the Rev. JOHN HUNTER'S sixth sermon was "The Doctrine of Sin." There is the same moderation of tone conspicuous in this discourse as in those we have noticed before. With a good deal of it we quite agree; with other portions we are less in sympathy. The preacher began by remarking that the power of the Evangelical theology in all its developments came in a large measure from its looking the dark facts of life directly in the face. Doubtless it has done this; but it is equally true that it has distorted and exaggerated

"the dark facts of life" until an awful superiority became not merely the predominant but the distinguishing feature of all human life, and the world ceased to be God's world and became in very truth the Devil's world. Sin was everywhere, and it was dominant, constant, universal. The Devil ruled over the hearts of mankind, the whole human race, except the smallest fraction, were won over to his side and would be his slaves for ever. This all-embracing never ending rule of the Devil was the most solemn fact in the old Evangelical theology. It steeped in the darkest colours the whole scheme from beginning to end. It threw its black shadow over the whole creation. It tainted and corrupted every thing; the common business of life did not escape; the most harmless amusements were sinful. Every child from the moment of its birth came under its ban, and it peopled Hell with babes. The highly figurative expressions of Hebrew poetry—expressions illustrating the hyperbolic style common to Eastern writing, were taken as plain, prosaic, matter of fact statements, and made the foundation of a dogma, including in one sentence of condemnation the whole family of man. Every man was totally depraved, alienated from God and from all good, and prone only to evil, and his seeming good works were but "as filthy rags." From this state of utter corruption and hopeless future misery he could be rescued only by a special act of Divine grace. This redemption would be experienced only by a very few, and all mankind except that few would be lost eternally. This was the old Evangelical doctrine of sin. It found expression in the hymns of the Orthodox, in their prayers, in their sermons, in their theological disquisitions, in their works of controversial theology. It coloured their whole thought and expressed itself in their daily conversation. Now it is all this extravagance which Unitarians have protested against. They have not denied the reality of sin, but they have recognised the presence of good in human nature where Orthodoxy denied it. They have been more willing to recognise the good than the evil. They have defended human nature against its Evangelical assailants. It may be admitted, we think, that owing to this re-action or revolt from the popular theology they have not perhaps always emphasised sufficiently the evil there is in man. We agree with Mr. HUNTER, that the truth on this great subject is not to be found in "the optimistic rose-coloured theories which are often associated with Religious Liberalism." But neither is it to be found on the other side with the doctrine of the total depravity of man. This, then, is another of the dissolving views of Orthodoxy; the doctrine of sin is no longer held in the exaggerated form in which it was at one time commonly accepted. The influences which have brought this change about are thus hinted at by Mr. HUNTER:—"Partly owing, no doubt, to the reaction from the stern Calvinism of our fathers, and partly, too, from our clearer knowledge of the practical limitations of free will, there was a wide spread disposition both towards ignoring anything like a depraved element in human nature and misconceiving the true nature of sin." The admitted decline of Calvinism of which the doctrine of total depravity was a fundamental position is alone sufficient to show how truly the old Orthodoxy is passing away, and giving place to views which are truer and better, just in the degree that they throw aside the once popular superstition. These truer and better views of human nature Mr. HUNTER had distinctly set forth in a former lecture, in which he had said, "We have a nature which makes possible the closest union with God, a nature which is essentially his nature; hence no relation can be so intimate and immediate, and no being so near as God may be to us, so perceptible, apprehensible, accessible. Because we are spiritual beings we are open, as insensate nature cannot be to the tides of the Spirit, and our growing spirituality is a growing revelation of the indwelling God." This is as true, we believe, as it is finely expressed; but it is not consistent with the doctrine of Total Depravity. It is not the view of human nature to which we are accustomed in ordinary orthodox teaching. It does not regard our nature as blasted, withered, depraved, totally corrupt, but as in a certain sense divine.

Mr. HUNTER discusses at some length the doctrine of Original Sin, by which he means our natural tendency to sin. He carefully avoids the extravagancies which the popular Orthodoxy has mixed up with this doctrine. He admits that it has "often been mixed up with notions with which he and his hearers disagreed, and which they repudiated in the name of conscience formed and enlightened by Christianity itself. It was not true," he added, "that we were held in any way responsible for sins committed before we were born, but it was fearfully true that we had to bear the temporal consequences of those sins. We come into the world with tendencies and desires which make for sin, and of which sin is the outcome and result, but which do not constitute guilt till the soul has of its own free will yielded to them. The great truth that is known in modern days as the solidarity of mankind—that man in his physical, intellectual and moral life is vitally related to his fellows, contained the explanation of original sin. The life of the individual becoming corrupt, helped to corrupt the life of the race, and the corrupt life of the race poured a stream of corruption into the life of each individual. In a very true and profound sense the race fell in ADAM and still falls in the fall of every descendant of ADAM. Our blood to-day is tainted, our brains weakened, and we have tendencies within us to all manner of evil because our fathers wandered from the paths of righteousness and truth. When we were tempted to regard it as a hard law that the sins of the fathers should be visited upon the children, we ought to remember not only that nature expects us to do right and makes no provision for wrong doing, but that the virtues as well as the vices of the fathers are visited upon the children. This latter aspect of the law of heredity was full of encouragement and hope; good could be transmitted as well as evil, righteousness as well as sin. We had power to diminish original sin. Every noble life added to nature's inherited power helped to make it easier for humanity to do right and to be better."

Now this, we conceive, is just the element of truth in the doctrine of original sin. But we contend this is not the commonly accepted orthodox doctrine. It is simply the transmission of qualities good and bad from father to son, which nobody denies. It is the operation of a natural law, and is perfectly impartial. It does not transmit evil more readily than good, or good more readily than evil. It is not a supernatural visitation—not the result of a single act by which man suddenly fell from a state of purity and happiness into an abyss of guilt and misery and became morally impotent ever after. By a single act of disobedience his nature became radically changed, turned from all that is good and given over completely to the source of evil. His destiny also underwent a radical change. From that of a pure, happy, and deathless being, it became that of a sin-debased existence, ending for all men in death at last. This is the theological fiction for which we find no warrant outside the creeds of orthodoxy.

In the second part of his discourse Mr. HUNTER proceeded to discuss actual sin, which he defined as "failure, short-coming, imperfections that are to be blamed, the conscious free choice of the lower and worse in the presence of a higher and better no less possible. Moral power," he said, "was the measure of responsibility. We cannot attribute guilt to inherent incapacity. The doctrine of total depravity was only true when conceived as man's utter moral inability to be good and to do good without God. But God worketh in us, and our reliance on human ability includes Him as the ground of all power and the inspiring source of all energy. In our most truthful moments we cannot look upon ourselves as machines doing ill because we cannot help it; we are conscious not only of knowing to do good, but of being able to do good, and doing it not, and we dare not talk about inability and weakness, for we feel that we have failed to put forth the strength which we had, or might have had, and that we are responsible for the power we have wasted and thrown away."

Very true, we reply; but all this rests the fact of sin not on the depravity of human nature, but upon the capacity of human nature for good. It is the power for good in man which, according to Mr. HUNTER, makes sin possible. Without that natural power sin would be impossible, for "we cannot attribute guilt to inherent incapacity," and though "we cannot be good or do good without God, still he worketh in us and our reliance on human ability includes Him as the ground of all power, and the inspiring source of all energy." What, then, becomes of the doctrine of total depravity according to the orthodox conception? In Mr. HUNTER'S exposition of the doctrine of sin we cannot find it. Man's natural powers, he tells us, are divine—still divine, divine in every infant that is born into the world; and sin is the abuse of those powers by the conscious free choice of the lower and worse in the presence of a higher and better no less possible." Once more, then, we rejoice over a vanishing superstition. The doctrine of total human depravity, under Mr. HUNTER'S able and ingenious treatment, becomes another dissolving view of Orthodoxy.

ORVILLE DEWEY.

The New Birth of the venerable Patriarch of Liberal Christians in America has followed swiftly that of his dear younger brother, Henry W. Bellows. And dependant as for years he had been upon the weekly letter of his faithful correspondent, it seems as if that bond of vital sympathy, transferred from earth to heaven, had drawn him upward to the "World of Light."

Serene and blessed, as was the daily life of this aged seer, ripened by over four-score seasons of alternate frost and sunshine, trials and triumphs, as had become his saintly spirit—happily as the hours sped by, amidst the tranquil scenes he had enjoyed from boyhood of Berkshire's breezy mountain slopes and sun-steeped vallies—embosomed as his affections were in his peaceful home and friendly neighbourhood—yet he could not find rest in the enforced repose of infirm age. His eager soul longed to rejoin his "first-born brethren," once his earthly compeers, in their ever-advancing search for Truth, their widening spheres of Charity, their brightening vision of Celestial Beauty, amid the ever-opening Revelation of the All Perfect One! It had become "better to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord." And so "the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort" sent down the gentle angel of New

BIRTH to set him free, and in her loving arms to bear him upward into the welcoming circles of the "World of Spirits."

The constancy of the tender friendship, which, for thirty years or more, united Dr. Dewey and Dr. Bellows, was singularly manifested to the writer of this brief tribute, some three years since. It was on the occasion when the eloquent Minister of "All Souls" bore his earnest testimony to the unique gifts of the former pastor of the "Church of the Messiah" as a "Pulpit Orator;" and the portrait appeared so felicitous while faithful, that my impulse was irresistible to write to the venerated teacher some of my own reminiscences. They might seem, at least, like a handful of "Forget-me-nots" beside Henry Bellows's "Crown of Roses." But the return steamer brought a note, written in trembling letters, in substance saying: "Dear Bellows and you have tempted me to be angry with you both, for such extravagant laudations. Teach me rather to 'forget' the fragmentary past and 'the things that are behind,' and 'to press toward the mark for the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus.' . . . Ah! dear boys! why did I not know how you loved me before it was too late!"

And now this sketch of our departed "Father in Faith" having spontaneously struck the keynote of personal reminiscence, let it keep on, so far as limits permit, in like strain. Indeed, so intimate from boyhood were my relations with my uncle's confidential friend, that it would be affected reserve to write in any other tone. All space at command, then, shall be given to a few of countless memories of Orville Dewey, as beheld in the home circle and in private intercourse, where the real man moved to and fro in freedom.

It so happened then to me, while a youth of twelve or fifteen years in training at the "Boston Latin School" for "Harvard University," that Dr. Dewey became a familiar guest in my mother's hospitable house. He was at this period the temporary minister of "Federal Street Church," while Dr. Channing was seeking to renew his wasted energies, for better work, in Europe. And on Mondays—after his exhausting outpourings of Sunday—he was wont to "drop in, while passing," to talk over the themes of his discourse or for friendly interchange of thought and sympathy. A special attraction was that the "Misses Cabot," the elder of whom became a few years later "Mrs. Charles Follen" (both of whom will be remembered by English friends), made a common home with my mother; and the radiant intelligence, glowing enthusiasm, hearty affectionateness, and genial merriment of these bright-witted sisters charmed him. Sometimes they probed with penetrating questions the mystical metaphysics of the preceding day's sermon. Then, deeply stirred, and all on fire with truths dawning on his vision, he would rise from his chair and slowly pace the room, in a half soliloquy, half rejoinder. At these times of high-wrought emotion his aspect was commanding. His head was rounded like a dome, and he bore it erect, as if its weight was a burden; his eyes, blue-grey in tint, were gentle, while gleaming with inner light; the nostrils were outspread, as if breathing in mountain-top air; and the mobile lips, the lower of which protruded, apparently measured each deliberately accented word as if they were coins stamped in the mint. It was intense delight for a boy to listen to these luminous self-unfoldings, embodied in rhythmic speech. They moved me more profoundly even than the suppressed feeling of his awe-struck prayers, or the fluent fervour of his pulpit addresses, for they raised the veil, and admitted one into his "Holy of holies." At other times, literary or artistic themes, the newest poem, novel, picture, concert, came up for discussion; and as these ladies were verse-writers, essayists, critics, and lovers of beauty in all forms, the conversations called out the rich genius and complex tendencies and aptitudes of Dr. Dewey, in stimulating suggestions, which were refreshing as spring breezes. His mind gave hospitable welcome to each new fact disclosed by science, to all generous hopes for human refinement and ennobling ideals, while his discernment was keen to detect false sentiment or flashy sophisms. Again, some startling event would bring conventional customs and maxims to the judgment-bar of pure Christian ethics, when his moral indignation blazed forth with impartial equity, against all degrading views of human nature, debasing prejudices, and distrust of national progress—sparing no tyrant, however wealthy or high in station, pleading for the downcast, however lowly, hoping for the fallen, however scorned. Thanks to this clear-sighted moralist, he gave me, in his own example, a standard of generous Optimism, too sun-bright ever to be eclipsed. Let it not be inferred from these hasty outlines, however, that Dr. Dewey was habitually grave, or intent on serious topics solely, in social intercourse. So far from this, he continually startled one by his swift transitions from solemn discourse to humorous descriptions of persons, places, experiences. And as the Misses Cabot and my mother alike regarded healthful laughter, cheery sallies, and childlike gaiety as a wise relief for overwrought brains or high-strung sensibilities, our fireside sparkled with brilliant repartees and scintillating mirth. It is pleasantly remembered that in such by-play, Dr. Dewey, while often satirical, and prone to good-tempered banter, was never cynical, and intolerant of personal gossip or the intrusion of mean slander. And to close the chapter of boyhood's acquaintance, it is gratefully recalled how cordially sympathetic this earnest apostle was with my youthful studies, trials, aspirations. All recollections, indeed, of my uncle's curate—whom, as is well-known, he wished to become his colleague—are charming; and before my matriculation at "Harvard," one of my most trusted religious guides was Orville Dewey.

Many years passed ere it was my privilege to meet him often again; for he soon removed to New Bedford, to become the pastor of the Unitarian Church, while, after completing my university and theological training in Cambridge, a happy fortune took me abroad for an eighteen months' tour. At the time of my return to my native land, however, Dr. Dewey was already established as the minister of the "Church of the Messiah," in New York, while Dr. Follen had taken temporary charge of the "Chamber-street Congregation." And as both of these illustrious men were intimate friends of my uncle and Dr. Tuckerman, their combined persuasion led me to accept the post of "Minister at large" to the poor in the City of New York. This position drew me into almost daily intercourse with Dr. Dewey, as his congregation supplied funds for my mission, district visitors for my scattered people, and supplies of clothing, stores, and alms for the needy, while my Sunday-school was held in the basement-rooms of his church, and his young disciples were my fellow-teachers. This branch of the "Ministry at large," indeed, had been organised through his earnest instrumentality: his leading men and women formed its executive committee; and his own zealous energy was the quickening centre of its operations. Here, then, my acquaintance with Orville Dewey was not only renewed, but at once raised to a higher degree; for he now welcomed to his confidential intercourse, as a co-worker in responsible duties, one whom in earlier years he had regarded chiefly as the relative of revered friends. There is no space to describe this original thinker, inspiring preacher, and influential moulder of public opinion in the commercial and political centre, as it then was, of the Republic of the West. This was the period, when each Sunday his church was thronged by experienced men of business, ardent reformers, and earnest young men, to listen to his searching criticisms, sagacious counsels, keenly analytical investigations of social problems, and solemn warnings against debasing tendencies and customs—his scathing condemnation of dishonest transactions and base standards of mercantile and political honour, and his prophet-like appeals in behalf of pure morals, manly and womanly dignity, and consecrated homes. And during the Sunday mornings, a more select yet crowded assembly of fellow-worshippers drank in refreshment from his crystal fountains of profound philosophy, spiritual insight, and devout aspiration. But to others must be left the estimates of Dr. Dewey as a Liberal Theologian, Christian Moralist, and Illuminated Secr. My aim is the lowlier, though possibly a more suggestive one, of revealing some sacred springs, whence flowed his stream of the "Water of Life."

Let me, then, in calm simplicity, bear testimony to the character of Orville Dewey, as he revealed himself in private intercourse—though with modest diffidence he might again chide my over-estimate of his worth. What impressed me more and more each day was his rare combination of complex tendencies with concentrated unity. Like all great persons he was many individuals in one—a saint blended with a man of the world—a brooding meditative scholar, yet a swift observer of shifting scenes in the social drama—sensitive, as a woman, to the tragic trials of families, communities and states, while ever ready to turn the pages of actual romance or fictitious fancy-pictures, and catching instant sight of comic incidents and humorous aspects of life's pantomime; but at the core he was, all the while, a humble watcher of the mysteries of human existence, wonder-struck at the almost boundless sweep allowed to capricious freedom, yet awed before the majesty of steadfast moral laws—at once bravely hopeful as to the ascending destiny of our race, yet patiently resigned to the sublimely gradual development of the designs of Sovereign Providence; and still deeper down at the centre—though nowise unconscious of the exhaustless reserved power of reason, conscience and will—he seemed appalled at the possible abyss of guilt and woe forever open for each soul, that shall impiously sever the vital cord of duty, which by birth-right binds it to the All-Holy. From this profound sense of potential sin and sorrow, in himself and all fellow beings, sprang his tender compassion and considerate pity. Seldom has any one, within the wide circle of my observation and experience, appeared to be more acutely alive to the pathetic phases of Man's career upon this small planet, amidst the immensities of the natural and spiritual Universe, or more unfalteringly reliant on the Omnipotent All-Good.

From this innermost religious trust and sympathy arose Orville Dewey's intense longing for an all-quickening Social Regeneration—the Ideal of which, with devout gratitude, he recognised in the character, life, and work of God's Beloved Son, our Elder Brother. His unquestioning Christian faith was rooted in his true-hearted and thorough acceptance of the Law of Divine Disinterestedness, as illustrated in the uttermost self-sacrifice of Jesus. With uncompromising confidence he looked forward to the practicable embodiment of Christ's living law of Brotherhood throughout all human relations, so as actually to transform every family, community, and nation into a "Reign of Heaven on Earth," in leasts. And the "Ministry at large" appeared to him, as to many of his noblest compeers, the nearest step to be taken in the process of this vital transformation.

But the due bounds of this slight tribute of reverent gratitude are transcended, before my portrait is even outlined; and this sketch can give but a faint-reflected image of our ascended friend, as he shines forth transfigured in the beauty of immortal youth.

HALIFAX.—We are glad to be able to report that a sum of £500, borrowed many years ago for the purpose of building new class-rooms, was last week paid off. The ladies' sewing-meeting raised £100 for the fund by a sale of work, and two gentlemen have since then called on each member of the congregation, and report that they have been met cheerfully and liberally, and that the sum needed has been subscribed by the members with ease. The North-gate End congregations now stand free from debt.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Occasional Notes.

WE understand that the arrangements for our anniversary meetings at Whitsuntide are nearly completed, and present some features of a very interesting character. The service on Wednesday will be at Unity Church, Islington, instead of Essex-street Chapel, as heretofore. The Conference on Thursday morning, however, will be in Essex-street Chapel. Instead of the usual collation held in former years at the Crystal Palace or Richmond, there will be a soiree on Thursday evening at Cannon-street Hotel, and finally, we have unusual pleasure in making the announcement that Dr. James Freeman Clarke, whose approaching visit to England we mentioned last week, has accepted the invitation of the Committee of the Association to preach the annual sermon on Wednesday, May 23.

WE are glad to be able to announce that the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke and the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, two of our most distinguished American Ministers, are about to visit England, and hope to be present at our Whitsuntide anniversaries.

ROBERT COLLYER is preaching in New York to crowded congregations on such subjects as Instinct and Experience and Sabbath and Sunday. These congregations, it is stated, often include the very bone and sinew of the community, people who look as if they work for their daily bread, and are glad to listen to the joyful tidings of a liberal gospel. In his recent discourse on Colonel Ingersoll, he traced the decadence of the orator and the man since he found that Atheism would pay him 25,000 dols. a year. It is said that Colonel Ingersoll's father was a powerful preacher, who could sway an audience like trees in a tempest by his descriptions of hell. Who can wonder at the turn his clever son has taken?

THE Count de Paris has sent 1,000 francs to the subscription for the monument of Coligny. It is interesting to recall the fact that the daughter of Coligny, the widow of Teligny, married William the Silent, and that the Duchess of Orleans, the mother of the Count de Paris, is a direct descendant from a daughter of this marriage.

A CURIOUS correspondence has just taken place between Father Montsabre, the Lent preacher at Notre Dame, and M. Loyson (Father Hyacinthe), the most celebrated of his predecessors in the metropolitan pulpit. The initiative was taken by M. Loyson, who in polite language, represented to Father Montsabre that under the patronage of Mgr. Guibert the present Archbishop of Paris, he had been preaching doctrines which would never have been tolerated by any former Archbishop, or by any Monarchical Government during this century. Such teaching leaving people in doubt between the legitimate exercise of ecclesiastical authority and its abuse, could not but furnish a pretext for the formidable demonstrations of impiety from which France was suffering. He had taught in the same pulpit, with the sanction of another and illustrious Archbishop, a widely different Catholicism. He invited Father Montsabre to meet him in a friendly public conference, there to discuss matters on which they differed, and especially the supreme and infallible authority of the Bishop of Rome and the Inquisition of which Father Montsabre had made himself the champion. No method of settling a controversy could be more conformable to precedents. Assuring the reverend father of his distinguished sentiments, he signed the letter "Hyacinthe Loyson, priest." Father Montsabre began his reply, "Monsieur," thus treating Father Hyacinthe as unfrocked. If the controversialist could promise a respectful audience, perhaps his superiors would give leave. But would it not be better to have a discreet and friendly talk in private? "You," he continued, "don't believe. I believe, and hope to die in my faith. It would be a great consolation if my prayers could obtain from God for you a return to those convictions which illumined your youth. Accept, Monsieur, the assurance of the sentiments of Christian charity with which I have the honour to be your very compassionate brother in our Lord.—Brother Montsabre, of the Order of St. Dominique." Father Hyacinthe responds that the fear of scandal at the conference he proposes is chimerical. His habits of discussion are courteous, and, above all, Christian. Unhappily, the arrogance of many Ultramontanists contrasts with these, and Father Montsabre follows their bad example himself when talking of compassion, an expression which he might retort if he spoke the same language. When he was accused of not believing he would reply that he never did believe in the infallibility of the Pope, nor in the rights and benefits of the Inquisition, which were not dogmas when he preached at Notre Dame. Then, as now, he believed absolutely in the divinity of Jesus Christ, in the inspiration of the Canonical Scriptures, and the traditions which came from the Apostles. He would not accuse Father Montsabre of not believing in true Christianity, but wanted to convince him in public discussion that he unwittingly mixed up with the true faith doctrines which were foreign to it. Father Montsabre curtly replied that he would do better to confine himself to his own locality, and not seek a conference which could not tend to edification. Father Montsabre did not mean to offend him, and begged him to forget the expressions which he deemed arrogant, concluding "God bless you." Father Hyacinthe, having the last word, says he shall read the correspondence next Sunday in what is contemptuously called his locality, and shall take the public for judges of religionists, who formerly burned their adversaries, and now refused to discuss with them. He was not offended, for he attributed the tone of Father Montsabre's letters to unconscious ignorance of the usages of well-bred people.

DUE honour is being rendered to Robert Raikes in his own city. On Wednesday the Mayor of Gloucester laid the foundation stone of a memorial church to the founder of Sunday schools. The Bishop of the diocese and other dignitaries were present. The church is to accommodate nearly a thousand worshippers, and will have a district formed out of several large and populous parishes. After all the best memorials of Raikes are the innumerable Sunday-schools now scattered all over the world.

MR. JOHN F. SLATER, of Norwich, Connecticut one of the leading cotton manufacturers of the country, has decided to give a million dollars for the education of the coloured people of the Southern States. He proposes to put the fund in the hand of ten trustees, including ex-President Hayes, Chief Justice Waite, and other prominent men. The fund will be ample to sustain from fifty to seventy-five teachers and ministers yearly in the South, and be as great a benefit to the blacks as the Peabody fund has been to the whites. Many of the trustees have made a special study of the Southern negro problem, and all agree that the fund is capable of doing great good.

NORWICH.—A writer in the Eastern Daily Press refers as follows to the resignation of the Rev. H. W. Perris, which we announced last week:—"We may be permitted to express the general regret at the loss of so highly gifted and cultured a worker. The late Chairman of the Saturday Popular Entertainments, the President of the Science Gossip Club, and a prominent figure in various social and intellectual enterprises, Mr. Perris's withdrawal from the public life of Norwich will leave a gap not soon to be filled. It is well known that Mr. Perris's preaching talents have been exercised with undiminished effect during his tenure of the Octagon pulpit, and at no time with greater faithfulness and brilliancy than during the past winter."

BOURNEMOUTH.—The morning services which have been held in the Town Hall having been so well attended, evening services were commenced on April 2nd. The Rev. H. Ierson preached morning and evening.

THE Atlantic Monthly for May will contain Mr. Longfellow's last poem, as well as the first part of Mr. Hardy's new serial novel, entitled "Two on a Tower." The June Atlantic will have a portrait of Mr. Longfellow, with an elaborate article on the poet and his work.

Reviews.

Vignettes from Nature. By Grant Allen, Author of "The Evolutionist at Large." London: Chatto and Windus.

Both in his subject matter and his literary style Mr. Grant Allen stands absolutely alone as an author. In a time like this, when the number of authors is legion, this is no small distinction. Even in the sphere of popular Natural History there is a great number of pens at work, striving to satisfy the immense demand now existing for information in this direction, but we know of no other writer who has undertaken to treat the subject strictly and directly on the lines of evolution, as Mr. Allen does; and amongst the many books we have which are highly calculated to make the study of Nature all-captivating, none is written with such an easy homeliness and withal effectiveness as Mr. Allen's. The fascinating essays which compose the present volume appeared periodically in the Pall Mall Gazette, and form the record of a summer's stray thoughts on nature from an easy-going, half-scientific, half-aesthetic standpoint. As the author ventures to hope, "they may perhaps do good in spreading more widely a knowledge of those great biological and cosmical doctrines which are now revolutionising the European mind, and which owe their origin to the epoch-making works of Charles Darwin and Herbert Spencer." Thus the new ideas of the origin of species which have been so stubbornly opposed on theological grounds, and which still meet with execration from those who cannot or will not heed the facts which make those ideas so much more than feasible, are noiselessly "winning a widening way." Here we have an author whose book he who runs may read, pointing out on every page the significance, in an evolutionary sense, of modifications in the colours and forms of plants and animals which have been familiar to nature-lovers from time immemorial, even down to the very hairs inside the calyx of wild thyme, or the speckles on the sides of the English brook trout. A few examples will not be uninteresting. In a chapter on "Sedge and Woodrush" he says:—

And the history of these dry brown flowers is in itself curious enough to make them well worth a moment's examination. For the woodrush is almost undoubtedly a faded and colourless descendant of some once coloured and brilliant ancestor. You may be fairly sure of that from the mere look of the dry brown petals. Every blossom with petals, however small or green or inconspicuous, has once been a bright and flaunting flower; for the sole object of petals is to attract the eyes of insects, and they are therefore found nowhere but among insect-fertilised plants or their degenerate descendants. Flowers which have always been fertilised by the wind never have any petals at all, brown, green, or otherwise; but flowers which are fertilised by insects have them red, white, blue, or yellow; and flowers which have once been so fertilised and have afterwards relapsed almost always retain some memorial of their old estate in the shape of dwarfed and colourless petals, whose function is gone, while the rudimentary structure still survives. They point back, like the fasces of the Byzantine emperors, to the past glories of their race in earlier times.

And again, in the chapter entitled "Red Campion and White":—

Suppose, however, that some of these pink campions take (at first by some accident) to opening at night, then they may perhaps chance to attract the eyes of some passing moth, and so to get fertilised by the insect in its search for honey carrying the pollen from head to head. Thus a second generation of night-flowering campions would be set up, still with bright pink blossoms. But the colour of petals is always more or less variable, being only kept straight by functional needs; and so some of these evening varieties would be pretty sure to have more faded and whitish flowers than others, and these would best attract the eyes of the fertilising moths, and oftenest accordingly succeed in setting their seed. After long generations of such unconscious selection, the white-petalled individuals would establish themselves as a permanent race; though even to this day the original pinkiness of their constitution has not wholly died out. It reasserts itself from time to time; for you may often find scented evening campions with very pale pink petals, recalling the old type of the race.

When talking about Fallow Deer he has these words:—

The historical evolution of antlers in the deer tribe is exactly paralleled by the modern evolution of antlers in every individual red deer. In the first year a stag has no horns at all, and is technically known as a calf. In his second year he puts forth a pair of rounded bosses, and is therefore called a knobber in the slang of the gillies. With his third year the knobs fall off, and are replaced by longer horns, called dags, while the stag himself is now known as a brocket. Thus, year after year, the growing deer reproduces one stage after another of the ancestral development, till at length the top of the horn expands into a broad crown, and the beast is then finally dubbed a hart or "stag of ten," from the number of tines on each of his antlers. It would be quite possible to pair the cast horns of each year tolerably exactly with corresponding adult horns from the successive tertiary strata. Every deer in fact recapitulates in his own person the whole evolution of his race, the antler of each successive year being different, not only in size but in form and arrangement as well, from those of all previous seasons.

In another chapter devoted to Red Campion we read:—

The head of blossom which I hold in my hand, and which I have pulled off in passing, consists wholly of male flowers: every blossom contains stamens only, without any pistils. On the other hand, here in the hedge beside me stands another plant of the same kind whose blossoms are all female: every one of them contains a young capsule only, with the embryo seeds distinctly visible when I cut it open, but without a trace of stamens. This separation of the fructifying elements on different plants is a very recent innovation in the campions, and it marks a very high degree of differentiation—one not attained by the vast majority of the most developed plant types. The open pinks, such as chickweed, have stamens and pistils in each flower, and trust to chance for avoiding the evils of self-fertilisation. Even the other campions have the same common arrangement; but the red and white campions are peculiar in the fact that they have suppressed the stamens of some flowers and the pistils of others, thus making separate individuals wholly male or wholly female. Such an arrangement of course makes cross-fertilisation absolutely certain, and gives the species a great advantage in the struggle for life over its less differentiated neighbours. But the recent date of the improvement is shown by its incompleteness; for you may still find some stray campions with perfect stamens and fertile capsules in the same blossom.

One of the most interesting of these essays is the one on "A Mountain Tarn," which was read with great pleasure when it originally appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. Allen discusses the occurrence in a Welsh lake of a species of trout which differs from all others. It is not the only case of a particular species inhabiting a single station, for most of the twelve kinds peculiar to Britain are thus limited:—

On the old theory, which represented every species of plant or animal as the direct result of a special creation, we could have had no alternative but to suppose that each of these kinds of mountain trout was specially created in and for the particular little pool where we now find it. But the new theory of evolution simply teaches us that each trout has been evolved under peculiar circumstances to suit the special conditions of these isolated sheets of water in which they live. Let us look a little closely at the position of Llyn Gwernant, and consider why a unique kind of trout should have been evolved just there rather than elsewhere.

The tarn itself, one can see at a glance, must be a glacial hollow. It was scooped out by the grinding action of ice in the last glacial epoch. Look up the glen, and then down, and you will see that in either direction the valley widens out from the lake as a centre. But just about the neighbourhood of the lake itself the sides trend inwards, so as to enclose a small pass or gorge; and when the wholecombe formed the bed of an ancient glacier, the ice in this part must have been crowded together into a narrow compass, and thus squeezed hard against the sides and bottom of the gorge by the pressure of the great ice-sheet in the rear. If you look at the rock anywhere around the lake you will see that it is worn quite smooth and deeply scratched with ice-marks like those which occur just below the summer level of a glacier in Switzerland at the present day. So the rock-basin in which the tarn lies must itself be a product of the scooping action of the glacier. When the ice melted away under the genial climate of the post-glacial period, a little stream took the place of the vast frozen mass, and this stream expanded in the hollow till it filled the small lake and then ran out at the lower end. Hence the arrival of the trout in Llyn Gwernant must necessarily date from some period not earlier than the end of the last ice age. Whatever peculiarities they may display when compared with the parent type must have been developed since that time. Indeed, even if the lake had been here before the glacial epoch, the ancestors of these trout could not have dwelt in it; for we know that every species of animal now living in Britain must necessarily have entered the island since the ice-sheet cleared away.

How did the trout first get into the tarn? That seems at first sight a difficult question, for the only stream that communicates with it is the little torrent, broken by a hundred small cascades, which drains its waters into the river below. No fish could now possibly leap up these continuous waterfalls from ledge to ledge, some of them as much as twenty or thirty feet high. Hence local naturalists have speculated not a little on the origin of the trout, one theorist suggesting that they were carried hither by a waterspout, another that the eggs were brought into the pool clinging to the feet of a waterfowl, a third that the ancestral fish were placed in situ by the finger of the Almighty—which latter metaphor he does not deign to explain for us in full. For my own part, I do not incline thus clumsily to solve the problem with a deus ex machina; one cannot fairly consider it a dignus vindice nodus. It seems to me more likely that when the fish first came here the little stream still flowed in a moderately continuous basin, worn for it by the glacier, down to the level of the river, which then ran in a far higher channel than at present. Up this gentle incline the trout which were slowly spreading through the unoccupied fresh waters of Britain, after the thawing of the great ice-sheet, must have made their way into Llyn Gwernant.

But when they had once got there, the brook and the river went on carving their basins through the rock and the glacial soil, till at last they reached their present levels, the three highest falls on the brook being just those where it meets the newer valley of the main stream by Dolserau Mill. So after a while no more trout could reinforce the small colony in the tarn, which would thus have room to develop in their own way to suit their own peculiar circumstances, without any cross of fresh blood from the old stock to keep them true to the general type of the race in the lowland rivers.

If the reader will sit awhile with the author on the hillside, between the jagged and jutting edges of rock, where the rich black peaty soil is thickly overgrown with tangled patches of the purple flowers and wild thyme, and where the sweet scent and the hum of bees mingle in one's mind with that indefinite literary charm derived from faint suggestions of Puck and Oberon, the mellow autumn afternoon will seem for a moment like a bit of Shakespeare's dream-land:—

The whole labiate kind, to which wild thyme belongs, has been developed in strict correlation with the shape and habits of bees. No other family of plants (except the orchids) has flowers more curiously shaped than those of the salvias and horehounds; certainly no other family is so noticeable for sweet or aromatic scents as this, which includes the sage, mint, thyme, basil, rosemary, balm, hyssop, patchouli, marjoram, lavender, and catmint. Such scents are always due to the selective action of the higher insects, and are found only in the flowers which they most frequent. Indeed, we know geologically of no labiates before the late tertiary period, which is just the time when highly-developed bees began to present themselves. The honey-seekers and the honey-producers seem to have evolved side by side for one another's mutual benefit.

If you pick a little spray from the clump that covers this hollow in the rock basin you will see that it has some small unopened buds at the top end of the spike, some full-blown blossoms half-way down, and some overblown flower-cups on the stalk below. Now, if you look into these overblown cups you will see that they are apparently very shallow—much more shallow than in this bit of hemp-nettle—another common labiate—which I have picked for comparison with them. Moreover, the cup in the hemp-nettle is filled by four little flattened nuts or seeds, while that of the thyme seems to be empty. Of course the object of all flowering is the production of seeds; and one might at first sight be tempted to suppose that the thyme was quite barren, and so failed entirely of its function in life. But if you cut open the calyx of the overblown thyme blossoms with a sharp penknife you will find that the barrenness is only pretended, not real. What seems to be the bottom of the calyx is really a thick wall of interlacing hairs; and beneath this wall lie four little nuts, just like those of the hemp-nettle, only on a smaller scale. If, again, you cut open one of the full-blown blossoms, you will find that these hairs may be seen inside the calyx even while the corolla tube is entire, but they are then pressed back against the throat by the tube itself. As soon, however, as the tube and the corolla wither and fall out—which they do at once when they have played their part in the economy of the plant by inducing a bee to visit and fertilise it—the little hairs, relieved of this pressure, jump out by their own elasticity, and completely obstruct the entrance to the calyx, thus forming, as it were, a false bottom. Unless you were in the secret you would take it for granted that the calyx was empty, and had either shed its nutlets or else never contained any at all.

Now this is exactly the impression which the plant wishes to produce: or, to put it more correctly, it is because the plant has thus succeeded in producing a wrong impression on the minds of birds and insects that it has acquired this false bottom of interlacing hairs, and has so survived in the struggle for existence.

We close our short notice of this admirable volume by a quotation from its twenty-sixth page, which will not fail to strike the imagination of the reader. Speaking of the attractions which certain flowers exert for nocturnal moths, and, after pointing out that the eyes of moths correspond with those of owls among birds in the absence of certain nervous elements supposed to be the organs of the colour sense, Mr. Allen says:—

Moths, indeed, hunt mostly by smell, though they are also partly guided by sight, and perhaps even in part by the faint phosphorescence, hardly visible to human eyes, which, as the daughter of the great Linnaeus first observed, plays lambent over certain of their favourite blossoms in the early shades of night. I have seen this phosphorescence myself (or fancied I saw it) on the petals of the evening primrose; but only a few people have weak enough vision to detect it, for, like negative images, it cannot be seen by persons of robust and vigorous sight. Women and artists perceive it oftener than men of science, which no doubt tells rather hardly against its objective reality. Yet perhaps they and the moths can see some things which are hidden from the wise and learned; at least, I like to believe so, and to persuade myself that I too am in this matter on the side of the poets.

Faith or Unfaith? A Modern Phase of the Question, Discussed in Two Letters to a Guardian. By an Earnest Layman. London: Provost and Co.

There is much in this pamphlet with which we agree; there is also much with which we do not find ourselves in accord. It appears to have been written by a young man, who, having been educated in the Orthodox faith, is led by reflection and inquiry to throw aside not only his old creed but religious belief altogether. Religious doctrines and sanctions he has cast off, but avows that he can still cherish "those principles of genuine morality upon which Christianity and a thousand other faiths no doubt have been nourished." Thus he can write at present, but whether he will continue to do so appears to us, on a perusal of his letters, exceedingly doubtful. He has not been content to stop with rejecting what is absurd and objectionable in the popular conception of religion, but goes further, in the direction of destructive negative criticism, than there seems to us any sufficient cause for so doing. He was led to write by the circumstance that his guardian—who, it would seem, does not share in his friend's sceptical opinions, lent him for perusal Mr. Reynolds's book on "The Supernatural in Nature," and also directed his attention to the Bishop of Manchester's sermon before the British Association, and asked him to consider whether the arguments in that discourse should not cause him to alter at least some of his opinions on the important subject of religion. The well-meant attempt failed in each instance. The book was returned, after a hasty glance at its contents, with the assurance that it could not serve the intended purpose of reconciling him to the religion of his guardian. In the second letter the Bishop's sermon is criticised in a manner which shows that it also had failed to carry conviction to his mind. Here, then, we have an exceedingly interesting case, and one that is by no means singular. Very many, no doubt, have gone through the same experience, and reached the same goal as this earnest layman; and with him, as with them, what first started doubts in his mind were the absurd doctrines taught in the name of Christianity. But besides discarding these, he rejects, we quote his own words, "the doctrines called prayer, conscience, free-will, responsibility, duty, and faith in the unseen—the principles, in short, on which not only Christianity, but every professed religion is founded. . . . as in open conflict with pure Reason and simple Truth." Here we must join issue with him. With this ruthless iconoclasm, this sweeping conclusion, we have no sympathy whatever. Every word in the above enumeration of discarded "doctrines" stands for a reality, and is capable of defence on its own grounds, apart altogether from the authority of the creeds. We do not see how the "genuine principles of morality," on which "Christianity and other faiths are founded" can be maintained when free-will, duty, responsibility, and conscience have been surrendered. These are essentially moral ideas, and no system of morality can be held without them.

We can go with our author then only half way. Here we must part company. Now why do we take up this intermediate position? Why, if we go with him at all, do we not go with him to the end? A full answer to this question would be a complete justification of the Unitarian position. That we cannot attempt here, but a few sentences on this point we may venture to add. "While," says our author, "we recognise in religion no more than a sentiment, the subject of æsthetic expression, we will not deny its genuine truth and beauty; but we cannot but condemn the danger and falsehood of inculcating the forms of that expression as matters of substantial fact." We reply, religion is not sentiment only, not merely "the subject of æsthetic expression." It has its intellectual aspect also, and in that aspect it has its doctrines. Religious doctrines are the intellectual forms in which the religious sentiment finds expression. It is natural for the mind to shape its thoughts, and the shapes which it gives to its thoughts have been the foundation of the doctrines of religion that have been accepted and are current in the world. Religion would have no permanence as mere sentiment or "æsthetic expression," and it would be too vague and shadowy to exert any strong influence over the mind. It is idle, therefore, to object to religious doctrines. They are simply the distinct conceptions of the mind on the subject of religion. What we have to do is to examine the doctrines thus formulated by whatever tests will apply to them, and accept them so far as they bear the evidence of truth.

The current theology of the day is a very composite article. It is made up largely of superstitions, the outcome of ignorance and credulity; it has also its ideas, which have a firm basis in human nature, which are true to human nature in its higher moods, its trust, hope, reverence, love and aspiration. Those religious ideas and beliefs are helpful to our nature; they are supporting, stimulating, encouraging, elevating. They meet the deeply-felt wants of our nature, especially in certain crises and situations of life. We may instance the belief in a just and good God, the belief in a constant and impartial providence, the belief in a righteous retribution for all human conduct, and the belief in a future life, with its rewards for well doing and its penalties for doing ill. These ideas are both moral and religious, and, as set forth in plain terms, they are doctrines. Why should we not accept these in their simplicity while rejecting the superstitious notions which have been added to them? What we have to do is to discriminate, not to reject all with one sweeping sentence of condemnation. To say that "the doctrines called prayer, conscience, free will, responsibility, duty and faith in the unseen are in open conflict with pure reason and simple truth," is to reject the great moral ideas which have been the ethics of religion in every age and of every land. These "doctrines," as our author calls them, have been part of every religious creed, so far as we know, professed among mankind. Why? Because human nature has endorsed them and born abundant testimony to their truth and value. We do not say that men's opinions on these deeply interesting subjects have been free from error. By no means; but that only calls for discrimination in judging about them. Mistaken notions have doubtless been held on each one of these matters, but that does not justify their rejection or their condemnation in one sweeping sentence like the above. We speak plainly on this point, because we feel its importance. It is easy to accept the current theology without examination; it is easy to reject it in the lump as a mass of superstition and absurdity; but we are persuaded that neither course is true to religion itself, or will meet the religious needs of our time. Neither course will satisfy the thoughtful mind or approve itself to those who recognise the influence of religion on human life and happiness, and see what a vast power of good it might become under the direction of a sober and rational judgment.

A considerable part of the second letter is taken up with discussing the question of religious faith. We cannot go into the layman's elaborate argument on this matter. Nor is it necessary. What we have said above will apply to his objection here. By religious faith we understand our conviction in the reality of spiritual things—our conviction in the reality of sanctions and authorities above those which are temporary and earthly. Regarded thus, faith is no idle fancy, no weak credulity, no foolish dream. It is a reality to which the whole progress of mankind bears witness. Such faith is the most prominent feature in the history of humanity. That it has been associated with all kinds of superstitions and absurdities may be conceded. That crimes and atrocities almost innumerable have been perpetrated in its name may be allowed. But we maintain that the abuses of religious faith are no justification for throwing it altogether contemptuously aside. We have to distinguish between its right use and its abuse—between faith as an ennobling principle, and faith as a slavish superstition; between the faith which has been the inspiration of the noblest minds and the incitement to the noblest deeds, and that which has been a horrible oppression of the human intellect and spirit. With the latter we have no more sympathy than the author of this pamphlet. We deplore the errors and follies of religious fanatics as much as he does, but this does not blind us to the actual merits of religion. The only alternative of faith in the popular theology is not unfaith, that is rejecting religion altogether. There is valid ground for rational faith between the two extremes. There are certain religious ideas which correspond with the facts of human nature, and that correspondence is the source of their influence and power. It cannot reasonably be maintained that such ideas are idle, groundless fancies. No position could be more extravagant than to contend that man's higher nature is sustained and developed by falsehood and delusion; but this is the conclusion to which we are brought, if there are no realities corresponding to man's religious faith.

The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co. The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Co. Again do we place the Contemporary first, because it seems to us this month decidedly superior to its rival in variety and interest.

Beginning, as usual, with Theology, we find in the Contemporary two articles bearing on that great subject, "The Philosophy of Religion," the first of a series of historical and critical papers by Dr. A. M. Fairbairn, on the religious philosophy of Lessing, Kant, Fichte, and Schleiermacher; the second a more popular discussion of the socio-religious theories of "Lamennais and Kingsley," by the Rev. A. Kauffmann, who regards those eminent writers as typical representatives among liberal Churchmen in France and England of the growing rapprochement between the Church and the working classes in the three principal countries of Western Europe. The ideas they propounded, he says, are spreading far and wide, and the following passage of the essay may be quoted as indicating the character and direction of this movement:—

The new movement has religion for its inspiration, and looks to Christ's gospel preached to the poor as the best system of social therapeutics. It looks to the Christian religion as a spiritual force in society, promoting the even and harmonious development of the social organism and regulating its members by the exercise of the passive virtues of resignation and self-denial, and thus exorcising the demon of egotism and discontent. It regards the Church as an educational institution, forming character and habits, and inculcating the active virtues of diligence, thrift, justice, and veracity, thus furthering the material improvement of the people. It takes note of the mediatorial office of the Christian Church, reconciling employer and employed—the mons sacer, where Patricians and Plebeians, as of old, may be re-united. It dwells on the sacred solidarity of man taught in the New Testament, and recommends brotherly co-operation as opposed to the Heathenish method of industrial warfare in bare competition. Thus it regards Christianity as the "féconde principe d'association," which may bring about the federal union of classes and nationalities, as opposed to international fiscal wars and socialistic confederacies for the subversion of social peace and order.

In the Nineteenth Century, under the title "A Heathen Apocalypse," we have from the pen of C. Zeller a brief and rather dry account of Apocalyptic literature in other books than the Bible, and a few extracts from the fragments of Hermes Trismegistus, included in a Latin translation in the works of Apuleius. M. le Baron D'Estournelles gives what from the nature of the subject is a much more interesting sketch of "The Superstitions of Modern Greece," which curiously illustrate the survival of the ancient mythology in a modern dress. Dr. Nevins's article entitled "A Notable Secession from the Vatican," is a biographical account of Count Campbello, late Canon of St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, vindicating him from some of the charges which have tarnished his fair fame. "The Agnostic at Church" comprises two brief notes on Mr. Louis Greg's recent article on that subject, one by Mr. J. H. Stevenson, the author of "John Inglesant," and the other by J. H. Clapperton. Mr. Stevenson goes even further than Mr. Greg, and contends that an Agnostic should not only attend his parish church but should certainly offer himself as a communicant. In reply to the objection that by so doing the Agnostic is supporting a superstitious system against which his conscience rebels, Mr. Stevenson urges that "this system he has already condoned by coming to Church," which is a truly ingenious illustration of reasoning in a circle. Mr. Clapperton with polished satire assumes that truthfulness is enunciated in the Agnostics' creed, which implies conformity of outward conduct to the inward state of thought and feeling; and we are glad to be assured that few Agnostics even could possibly approve Mr. Greg's "hypocritical, and therefore, immoral method." We agree with the writer, who seems to write as himself an Agnostic, that "Agnostics outside the Church who are truthful, courageous, just, tolerant, and filled with the enthusiasm of humanity, will accomplish an admirable work in advancing human progress." For Agnosticism such as this we have nothing but respect, widely as we differ from some of its positions. Mr. Louis Greg goes far to make Agnosticism contemptible in the eyes both of the sincere Churchman and the Rational Theologian.

The remaining articles in the Nineteenth Century need not long occupy our attention. "The Proposed Channel Tunnel, a Protest," is signed by several eminent names in both the Houses of Legislature, in Science, Art, and Literature, including Cardinal Manning as a representative of Christendom, and George Jacob Holyoake as a representative of Secularism. The Protest is followed by an article from the pen of Mr. James Knowles, the editor, summing up the arguments against "certain proposals made by commercial companies for joining England to the Continent of Europe by a railroad under the Channel." Mr. Knowles invites those who are similarly convinced of the grave mistake which it would be in the present condition of Europe to unite England to the Continent by bonds which, once forged, it might be out of her power to cast off, to add their names to those set forth in the protest now published. Lord Sherbrooke asks, "What is Money?" and criticises the Bimetallists; and Dr. Siemens dwells upon "A New Theory of the Sun." Mr. James Howard, M.P., offers a reply to Mr. Bence-Jones's paper on "Land-owning as a Business," in which he says that, notwithstanding the cordial relations which exist between landlords and tenants on many estates, a life long intercourse with farmers nevertheless convinces him that the low style of farming which prevails in so many districts will continue until tenants are not only put in possession of legal security for the unexhausted value of their outlay, but, what is of far more vital importance, secured against a rise of rent upon their own improvements. Mr. Justice Stephen contributes "A Sketch of the Criminal Law," which may be regarded as an abridgment of a work which he has been engaged on for many years, and which, he hopes, will shortly appear on the History of the Criminal Law. The only other articles are "Small-pox and Vaccination in 1871-1881," a conclusive reply by Dr. W. B. Carpenter to Mr. Peter Taylor, M.P., and the anti-vaccinationists; "A School of Dramatic Art," a brief dialogue by Hamilton Aide, advocating not only an English Conservatoire, but a national theatre; and finally "Oiling the Waves," in which Mr. F. C. Gordon Cumming gives a number of curious facts showing how the use of oil in calming the waves may prevent shipwrecks and save multitudes of lives.

Returning to the Contemporary, Mr. Lewis Morris, the poet, and late candidate for Carmarthen, in a paper on "Higher Education in Wales," urges that power should be given to an Endowed Schools Commissioner, acting for Wales, to take or apply for educational purposes all useless endowments, of whatever date, in the nature of doles and apprenticeships, or the other endowments specified in the Endowed Schools Act of 1869; to remodel existing governing bodies of schools, and to remove trustees of other endowments who may have grossly neglected their trust; to administer school estates and endowments in so far as may become necessary through the exercise of the foregoing powers; and to compel the establishment of advanced elementary schools, or branches of schools. "Egypt and Constitutional Rule" is a valuable account of the present position of affairs in that country by an English resident. Lady Verney continues her "Autumn Jottings in France," which are pleasantly written, but imbued with a strong prejudice against peasant proprietorship. Mr. W. E. Bear replies to the Duke of Argyll in a paper on "The True Principle of Tenant-right." A still more instructive paper, partly bearing on the same question is that on "Emigration from Ireland," by the well-known Mr. Tuke, who presses home the fact that nearly a fifth of the people live in a condition of abject poverty, and have no other means of subsistence than "from one to ten acres of poor bog land." Mr. Tuke maintains that for them nothing can be done except to assist them to emigrate, and he utterly denies that the people are unwilling. But we are by no means convinced that the reclamation of waste lands would be too costly and too slow, especially if the peasantry had a proprietary interest. Miss Cobbe, in her paper with the antagonistic title "Vivisection and its Two-faced Advocates," replies in detail to her recent critics, with not a little of the exaggeration characteristic of her previous articles.

The remaining articles are "The Relation of Insects to Flowers," a Darwinian discussion by the eminent Dr. Asa Gray, of Boston, U.S.; "The Opium Trade and Sir Rutherford Alcock," a conclusive reply to the advocates of this iniquitous traffic, by B. Fosset Lock; and "The Political Condition of Belgium," by E. de Lavelye, the eminent Belgian economist, who gives a melancholy account of the difficulties which result from the ceaseless strife between the partisans of traditional religion and the partisans of freedom—the Clericals and the Liberals.

The British Quarterly Review. Hodder, Stoughton, and Co.

The British Quarterly, like the Modern

Review, gives the signatures of its contributors, with only an occasional exception, and the result is an increase of interest connected with articles which are known to come from the pens of writers of considerable authority or repute.

The present number, unlike most of its predecessors, comprises little or nothing of a directly religious or theological character except the brief article on "The Imitation of Christ," which is the only unsigned article, and deals in no very original way with a well-worn but always attractive subject.

Materialism is the subject of discussion here as in the Modern Review, and the theories of Lucretius, Tyndall, Pictou, Martineau, and W. B. Carpenter on "Matter and its Relation to Life" are discussed in an elaborate criticism from the pen of John Masson.

In an able article on "Mohammedanism and the Ottoman Turks" Mr. T. C. Trowbridge reveals the unfavourable influence of the religion of the Koran on the life and character of the Turks, the degeneracy of the race, their hostility to Christianity, known only in its corrupt form, and their enthusiastic devotion to the doctrine of the Divine Unity as an intellectual dogma entering into the entire political and social life of the Ottoman race. We protest against this religious creed being styled "rigid Unitarianism." The writer should have known that Unitarianism, as J. H. Newman concedes, is a form of heretical thought within the pale of Christendom, the natural correlative of Trinitarianism, the belief in One God in one person, instead of in three persons. Mohammedanism and Judaism are properly to be styled Monotheistic religions. Unitarian writers and preachers have themselves often sanctioned this prevailing error by speaking of Unitarianism as if it were synonymous with Monotheism.

The remaining articles call for no special comment here. They are, "The Influence of the Italian Renaissance on the Elizabethan Stage," by Vernon Lee; "Astronomical Explanations of the Force of Inertia," by Henry Larkin; "The Sculptures of Pergamon," by Gustav Hirschfeld; "The Union with England of Scotland and Ireland," a sad picture of English injustice and misgovernment in the past, by Mr. Thomas Shaw, ending with the prophecy of modified Home Rule as a solution of difficulties to which even an overburdened Parliament may not be unwilling to listen; and finally "Democracy in France in 1882," an instructive paper by M. E. de Pressensé, pointing out that the great question of the day is how to reconcile democracy and religion; and "The Imperial Elections in Germany," a valuable sketch of Bismarck's policy, from the pen of our friend and contributor, the Rev. J. Frederick Smith, late of Chesterfield. The number is brought to a close, as usual, with the copious review of "Contemporary Literature."

Thomas Carlyle. A History of the First Forty Years of his Life, 1795-1835. By J. A. Froude, M.A. Longmans, 1882.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

We can hardly over-estimate the value of this biography as a veracious account of the real Carlyle just as he was with all his defects of temper; his irritable genius, his intense self-sacrificing devotion to his family; his half-repentant love for his wife, whose real worth he hardly knew until he had lost her for ever; and his resolute determination to make for himself a foremost place in letters, and amid all discouragements and the indifference of a generation which knew not its greatest prophet to speak forth at all hazards the message which it was given to him to utter. The work will undoubtedly take its place in the history of literature with Boswell's "Life of Johnson," Lockhart's "Life of Scott," and a few other books of a similar class which will live as a precious possession for ever. Yet the immediate interest of this biography, it must be confessed, is greatly impaired by the previous publication of the "Reminiscences," that fascinating work so greatly misunderstood and unduly disparaged, which revealed to us the inner thought and life of a man of peculiar genius, and made him known to the world as he really was, with all his weaknesses, eccentricities, and hasty judgments of his contemporaries. But, after all, what is any biography worth if it does not reveal the real man to us, and not as Carlyle himself would say, the mere simulacrum, the outside show of the man? To our mind there is nothing so really creditable to the "Reminiscences" as the censure that has been so copiously bestowed upon both the writer and editor. We would not have lost a word even of the acrid personal judgments. They bring the man himself near to us; they show that he at least was not blinded by the glamour of genius, but saw even the greatest of his contemporaries as they really were, with the essential littleness which is often characteristic of men of the highest literary eminence. Even in his most acrid judgments there was no ill-nature in Carlyle. He simply saw further than others into the real mind and heart of a man and faithfully reported what he saw.

In the present preliminary notice we can do little more than add one more voice to the multitude of greetings which this biography has received, reserving a fuller review until another opportunity, when there is less demand upon our limited space.

In the voluminous papers placed in his possession, Mr. Froude tells us in his preface, Carlyle's history, external and spiritual, lay out before him as in a map. By recasting the entire material, by selecting chosen passages out of his own and his wife's letters, by exhibiting the fair and beautiful side of the story only, it would have been easy, Mr. Froude adds, without suppressing a single material point, to draw a picture of a faultless character. But this would have been a portrait without individuality, and least of all could such idealising be ventured upon in a life of Carlyle, who himself would infinitely rather be painted as he was, with all his angularities, his sharp speeches, his special peculiarities and infirmities, exactly as they had actually been; and the result of this thoroughly veracious life will be to confirm Mr. Froude's own saying, that "when the Devil's advocate has said his worst against Carlyle, he leaves a figure still of unblemished integrity, purity, loftiness of purpose, and inflexible resolution to do right, as of a man living consciously under his master's eye, and with his thoughts fixed on the account which he would have to render of his talents." One more passage we must quote from Mr. Froude's explanatory preface, and then we must close the book until the Liverpool Conference leaves us with comparative leisure and tolerable amount of space at our command. Mr. Froude, after explaining that the publication of Mr. Carlyle's letters with the connective narrative of Carlyle himself will follow at no distant period, together with an account of his last years when his biographer was in constant intercourse with him, adds:—

It may be said that I shall have thus produced no "Life," but only the materials for a "Life." That is true. But I believe that I shall have given, notwithstanding, a real picture as far as it goes; and an adequate estimate of Carlyle's work in this world is not at present possible. He was a teacher and a prophet in the Jewish sense of the word. The prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah have become a part of the permanent spiritual inheritance of mankind, because events proved that they had interpreted correctly the signs of their own times, and their prophecies were fulfilled. Carlyle, like them, believed that he had a special message to deliver to the present age. Whether he was correct in that belief, and whether his message was a true message, remains to be seen. He has told us that our most cherished ideas of political liberty, with their kindred corollaries, are mere illusions, and that the progress which has seemed to go along with them is a progress towards anarchy and social dissolution. If he was wrong, he has misused his powers. The principles of his teaching are false. He has offered himself as a guide upon a road of which he had no knowledge; and his own desire for himself would be the speediest oblivion both of his person and his works. If, on the other hand, he has been right, if, like his great predecessors, he has read truly the tendencies of this modern age of ours, and his teaching is authenticated by facts, then Carlyle, too, will take his place among the inspired seers, and he will shine on another fixed star in the intellectual sky. Time only can show how this will be.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK, AND Co. have added to their new "People's Edition" of popular works a volume of Longfellow's poems. The price is sixpence.

Literary Notes.

The Athenæum states that Mr. Swinburne is engaged in writing the article "Mary Stuart" for the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

READERS of Longfellow will welcome the appearance of "Hiawatha, and other Legends of the Wigwams of the Red American Indians," edited by Mr. Cornelius Williams. It forms part of the "Library of the Fairy Tales of all Nations," and gives the foundation upon which Longfellow built his poem.

It is stated that Prince Frederic of Schleswig-Holstein-Augustenburg, cousin of Prince Christian, who died on last Christmas-day, has bequeathed the greater part of his valuable library of Oriental books and MSS. to the University of Cambridge.

The committee for the erection of a monument on the Thames Embankment in memory of William Tyndale, who first translated the New Testament into English, have agreed that Mr. J. E. Boehm, A.R.A., should prepare and place the bronze statue, 10ft. in height, on a suitable granite pedestal on the site (west of Charing-cross) granted by the Metropolitan Board of Works.

MR. J. H. HESSELS, the learned editor of the "Lex Salica," has finished an interesting work on Gutenberg, which will shortly be published by Mr. Quaritch.

PROFESSOR SEELEY'S "Life and Times of Stein" is being translated into French. The book is attracting a good deal of attention among students of history on the other side of the Channel.

THE long-expected first part of "Specimens of Early English," edited by Dr. Richard Morris for the Clarendon Press Series, is almost ready for publication, and will be ready shortly after Easter. Professor Skeat contributes a short preface.

THE Pitt Press will publish next October the Palestinian redaction of the Mishna contained in the Cambridge University Add. MS. 470, edited by the Rev. W. H. Lowe, who is, we believe, one of the candidates for the vacant Regius Professorship of Hebrew. Several Hebraists of note are competing for the chair.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK, AND Co. have secured the right of reissuing in England and America the elaborate illustrations to the French edition of the Waverley Novels, now being published by Messrs. Didot and Co., of Paris. They will be brought out by Messrs. Ward and Lock in connection with a new edition of Sir Walter Scott's works.

ANCIENT TABLETS FROM SIPPARA, OR SEPHARVAIN. —Nine cases, representing a portion of the results of the researches just on the point of being resumed by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, who left this country for Alexandria and Babylon on the 6th instant, have just arrived in London. The tablets which they contain are for the most part small, and, either whole or in a fragmentary condition, are estimated to reach about five thousand in number. The texts on the tablets are large beyond precedent as compared with the size of the vehicle on which they are inscribed. The new importation, so far as it has been investigated, consists chiefly of trade documents, and largely of contracts for the sale or supply of corn and other agricultural products. They are dated in the reigns of Samassumukin and Kandalanu, the Chinladanus of the Greeks, who were contemporary with the latter half of the reign of Assurbanipal, or Sardanapalus, of Assyria, about B.C. 646. The tablets are from Abou-habba, the site of the ancient Sippara, the Sepharvaim of the Old Testament, which is mentioned by Sennacherib in his letter to Hezekiah as one of the cities whose kings had been unable to resist the might of the Assyrians. Sippara—or Pantibibol, as the Greeks called it—is mentioned by Berosus as having furnished five out of the ten Chaldean kings of the time before the Flood, and as the place where Xisuthrus, or Noah, buried the records of the antediluvian world at the time of the Deluge, and from which his posterity afterwards recovered them. The Hebrew term Sepharvaim, which is the verbal equivalent of the "two Sipparas," is applied to twin cities, one of which is situated on each side of the river. The Sippara, from which the tablets just received in London have been procured, is the Sippara, of Samas, Tsipar sha Shamas, or Sippara of the Sun God, as being a place, par excellence, where the sun was a chief object of worship. The other Sippara, or Sippara of Anunit, which is supposed to have contributed in ancient times to name the Sepharvaim of Scripture history, is up to the present moment unknown to modern investigation.

PROPHETIC MISANTHROPY.

The Spectator, in an article on Mr. Froude's "Life of Carlyle," writes:—

Mr. Froude makes no sort of attempt to disguise, even if he does not give almost artificial emphasis to, the atrabilliousness of Carlyle's attitude towards human life. Indeed, Mr. Froude remarks with a sort of pride that probably Isaiah himself was not a very pleasant or accommodating companion, and intimates that in this respect prophets who denounce the shortcomings of their countrymen are apt to be very much alike. There is no comment on Carlyle to which his biographer refers oftener than his mother's, that Carlyle was "gey ill to live with,"—and this peculiarity obviously strikes Mr. Froude as a most interesting personal feature, of which an honest biographer can hardly make too much. But if the prophetic faculty is supposed to include the power of really spurring man on to higher life and work, we doubt very much whether it be consistent with a nature of such unmixt aggressiveness as Carlyle's. Whether Isaiah was "gey ill to live with" or not, we do not know. We do know that not one of his great denunciations of the hollowness and self-sufficiency of the Jews of his time was unaccompanied by passages of sublime and heart-stirring encouragement, in which the strength of the Almighty arm to reach and bless his people, and his unflinching promise to uphold and strengthen those of them who should cling to him, are poured out in speech that is less like mere words of any human tongue than the breakers of the eternal love itself, as they touch and shatter themselves on "this bank and shoal of time." For ourselves, we had, we confess, always thought that this was part and parcel of the function of the prophet—that scathe and burn away the evil in man as he might, he must always have the power, and prove the power, to renew the fountains of that life which is pure, at least as effectually as to apply the scorching fire to that life which is impure. Carlyle appears to have failed utterly in this. For though his misanthropy is closely allied with prophetic wrath, though it is not hatred of that which is good in man, but of that which is petty and poor in man, still it is hatred of what is petty and poor even more than of what is evil in man, and it is wholly unaccompanied with vivifying and restoring life. Carlyle, if he were a prophet at all, was a prophet sent only to smite, and not to strengthen; a prophet of the purely destructive kind, whose function it was only to make us see through the conceits of modern civilisation, but whose voice failed the moment you asked him for something wherewith to replace these conceits, something breathing the spirit of power and of love and of a sound mind. What Carlyle wanted was some true love for man—for man in his insignificance, and yet his great capabilities. Of this he had hardly a grain. Flaming wrath for every sign of the smallness of the scale on which so much of man's nature is built, he had in abundance. And his "dark humour" must be said to have extended itself to the creative Power which had sanctioned and tolerated this smallness of scale, and had decreed that only in the power of conscience and love can frail human beings grow into something nobler, and more worthy of eternal life.

THE SUSPENSE OF FAITH.

The Christian World writes:—The present is beyond all doubt an age of transition, an age of unexampled diffusion of reading and speculation, an age when an immense multitude of persons have ceased to believe as their grandfathers believed, and when thousands have to ask themselves how far it is their duty to walk publicly in their grandfathers' footsteps. The shaking and crumbling that have taken place in traditional beliefs would be appalling were it accompanied by more irregularity or spiritual indifference; but the temper of the public mind is more earnest, and manners are probably more correct than when scepticism was almost unknown, but dissipation ran riot, and few cared enough about religion to ask whether their vague notions on the subject were right or wrong. The great body of intelligent persons have now awakened to the duty of proving all things, and the spirit of earnestness and reverence in which investigation is, on the whole, conducted, warrants the hope that, in spite of haste and impatience, the general issue will be not a dissolution of all religious bonds, but a holding fast to that which is good. Men whose delight is in the Bible, men who think no thoughts about Christ or Christianity except such as are adoring and reverential, men who take part not only in works of organised charity but in the activities of Christian congregations, are now refusing, even in Scotland, to put their names to systems of theological dogma. We conclude, then, that all, except those who believe that religion is noxious and worship a waste, or worse than waste, of time, ought to attend social worship. The question is whether a man can sincerely join his fellow men in doing homage to God, not whether he accepts this or that system of theology.

THE public library of Geneva has just come into possession of a valuable literary bequest. Madame Streickeisen, who inherited from her grandfather, Paul Moulton, a number of Rousseau manuscripts, and who died a short time ago, has bequeathed to the city the entire collection. It consists of eight volumes, all written in Rousseau's own hand, and comprises his "Les Confessions," two volumes; "Le Contrat Social," one volume; "La Profession de Foi du Vicairé Savoyard," one large volume; "Oraison Funèbre du Duc d'Orléans," one volume; "Projet de Constitution pour la Corse," drawn up by Rousseau at the request of Paoli in 1760; "Moreaux Divers," one volume, and two volumes hitherto unpublished. Some extracts from the volume entitled "Moreaux Divers" were published about twenty years ago by M. Georges Streickeisen Moulton, son of the testatrix.

"THE Russian Empire: its Origin and Development," by S. B. Boulton, is the title of the new volume of "Cassell's Popular Library," to be issued on the 25th inst.

MESSRS. SIMPKIN AND MARSHALL will issue immediately Mr. Charles K. Salaman's long-promised book "Jews as They Are," which has been materially increased since it has been in the Press, notably by a study of Shylock from a Jewish point of view.

FREE WILL AND NECESSITY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am much pleased to have an opportunity to reply upon this very important subject to one who is so well able to state the arguments in favour of the common idea of free will as "C. B. U."

He thinks that the causation which I believe to hold good between our previous mental states and our determinations is of the same kind as that which exists in reference to causation in the physical world. But there is this great difference between the causation of a merely physical effect and that of a determination; that in the forming of a determination we cause the result by means of certain efforts; the resulting determination is the effect of the conditions and of the efforts which we make in forming it; while in the merely physical world the effect is simply the consequence of the conditions. I therefore do not suppose that influences are "quite omnipotent;" for if they were so they would produce the determination "without any efforts of ours." In the passage quoted by "C. B. U." from my little book, the conditions upon which man's character and conduct are dependent in the first place, are stated; setting forth the true part of the idea of necessity, denied in the common idea of free will. But the statement is not complete. For it is also stated in my little book that character and conduct are dependent in part upon the personal agency of the individual—the true part of the common idea of free will, denied in the idea of necessity or determinism. It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose that I mean to say that our determinations are "wholly" dependent upon conditions. And it is misleading to speak of our determinations as "acts of self-determination." Our determinations are not acts. We do not do them. We form them. The act of self-determination is the mental process by which we form a determination. A determination is a feeling, or, more correctly, a combination of thought and feeling—of the idea of an act, combined with the feeling that we will do it. It is the result of personal agency and conditions.

Again, it is thought by "C. B. U." that praise and blame can only be justified by the consideration that it was competent for a man under particular conditions to have formed a different determination from that which he did form. But the idea that it was so in any case is a mistake, which arises from failing to distinguish between what we know before and what we know after we have acted. Before we do an act, while we are deliberating whether we will do it or not, we feel or know, if we are not Necessarians who believe with Mr. Mill that our will to act is "given us, not by any efforts of ours, but by circumstances which we cannot help," that our determination will depend, not alone upon present internal and external conditions, but also upon our personal agency in forming it. We know that the doing or not doing of the act depends upon the determination which we shall form, and we do not yet know what this will be, or is to be. We, therefore, feel as if it were competent for us to do the act or to refrain from doing it. But when we have formed the determination and have done the act, the state of things is changed. We now know what the result was; and was to be. And we can look back at the process of causation by which it was produced. And if we know the mental process by which we form our determinations, we may perceive that it consisted of a succession of efforts consequent upon conditions, and of changes in the conditions consequent upon the efforts; and that, therefore, the resulting determination was in part dependent upon our personal agency, but was dependent, in the first place, upon the conditions upon which our personal agency was dependent. We see, therefore, that in the existing conditions the result could not have been otherwise than as it was. And thus we find that all things are over-ruled by Supreme power; and that, although man's agency in the causation of events, or results, is in many cases a most important and an essential part of the means by which the events or the results are produced, it must always be subordinate to the laws of causation.

Man's merit or demerit, therefore, is not consequent upon any competence in him to alter the course of supreme causation, or to act in any case as a First Cause, or independently of conditions. It is dependent upon his possession of a power of self-government, and upon his efficient exercise of his power to regulate his conduct beneficially, or his failure to exercise this power efficiently.

Praise and blame, in the true sense of the terms, as stated by "C. B. U.," could not be rationally applied, even as means to influence the forming of a man's determinations, if man had no power to form his determinations; because man could not deserve either praise or blame by regulating his conduct well or ill. But as he has a power to do so we may rightly praise him when he has exerted this power beneficially, and may blame him when he has neglected to do so, without supposing or implying that his agency or his neglect was independent of conditions. If the criminal had no power of self-government "all idea of moral disapprobation as applied to his past and present character would be out of place." But the knowledge that he is dependent in the first place upon conditions in the exercise of this power does not make it so. It only qualifies very beneficially our moral disapprobation. When we know that the formation of his character has been in the first place dependent upon conditions, and that his conduct is at all times dependent in the first place upon present conditions, of which his character is one of the most important, we blame without the feelings of unkindness which are excited in us by the idea that he was the primary or independent cause of his determinations and his acts. And we employ punishment, when it is necessary to do so, not in the spirit of vindictiveness which is consequent upon that idea, but in the humane spirit of the feeling surgeon who finds it necessary to have recourse to his operating instruments.

But men will obtain other beneficial consequences still more important than the production of this enlightened spirit of humanity. For they will be enabled by this fundamental knowledge to ascertain the causes of character and conduct—the causes which have hitherto prevented the success of the educator in his endeavours to produce the purely beneficial educational results which he has desired, and the means by which he will be enabled to succeed.

Thus the knowledge of solution of this old controversy will become the means by which improvements in the formation of character will be effected which were impossible while men denied either the truth which is asserted in the doctrine of necessity, or that which is asserted in the common idea of free will. And thus, in due time, the means will become known by which the necessity for human punishments will be superseded by the removal of the causes by which in the past this necessity has been produced; the chief of which has been the absence of the knowledge of the causes by which the injurious development of the good dispositions of man's nature has been produced, and of the causes or means by which their beneficial development will be obtained.

HENRY TRAVIS.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Mr. Bartram discusses the old old question of "the Resurrection" as though he talked to men who accepted the point of view occupied by controversialists of fifty years ago. When people believed that after death the dead lay in their graves till "the judgment day," and then "arose," the uprising of the body of Jesus had some kind of symbolical meaning in it, as what the old preachers called a "pledge" of our ultimate uprising. But it was always cold comfort; for the rising of the body of a dead man or a dead god three days after its interment is a very thin pledge of my resurrection some thousands of years to come. Now all that is altered. People who really believe anything at all about life beyond the grave believe that there is no such thing as death; believe, therefore, that Jesus never died, though his body was done to death; and that all who "die" pass on, out of the body, into the higher life. What became of the body of Jesus, then, is a matter of no consequence. If it got up out of the grave, that would prove nothing so much as that the crucifiers did not complete their work. But if Jesus was in some way able to prove to his circle of disciples that though out of the body he still lived, that is of infinite consequence, and is indeed a glorious pledge of our persistence after the incident called death. When, therefore, people talk of the resurrection of Jesus as though everything turns upon the return to earth of a body, they miss the mark altogether; they might as well talk about a resurrection of one's old clothes. It has become plain that we either go on living after what we call death, or we shall never live beyond that incident at all. If the thinking conscious man is put into the grave, then at death we are "done for," and Mr. Bradlaugh and some learned "professors" are right. But if the real man persists, and only shuts the eyes of the body upon dust and ashes, to open them upon the abiding things of the spirit, then, as I have said, there is no such thing as death; and all discussion about the resurrection of the body of Jesus, or of anybody else's body, becomes at once uninteresting and unmeaning, except as a bit of history or from a medical point of view. The real resurrection is the marching out of the spirit-man when the poor tabernacle of the flesh falls to pieces.

THE MIRACLES OF FEEDING.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Mr. Richard Bartram, in his article on Miracles, in to-day's Inquirer, makes the following remark:—

"Of the other miracles there is only one which is common to the Four Gospels, i.e., the feeding of the five thousand by the shore of the Lake of Galilee. It is true that a similar story is told in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark of a rather less number, but that has always seemed to me to be really the same story, with the simple variation of four for five."

But both St. Matthew and St. Mark, whilst each recording two separate miracles with what Mr. Bartram calls a "simple variation," record also some words of the Worker of the Miracles which show that the two accounts cannot "be really the same story." Thus, St. Mat. xvi. 9, 10, "Do ye not yet understand, neither remember the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? Neither the seven loaves of the four thousand, and how many baskets ye took up?" And St. Mark viii. 19, 20, "When I brake the five loaves among the five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? They say unto Him, Twelve. And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And they said, Seven." It is evident from these words, which have apparently escaped Mr. Bartram's attention, that two separate miracles were wrought, and that the theory of their identity, and of a variation in the story, is untenable.

THE CONFERENCE AND THE SUSTENTATION SCHEME.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Speculation as to the probable success of the approaching conference would now be out of place. Of one thing there can, I think, be no doubt, namely, the admirable character of the subjects for discussion. None, surely, could have been selected more worthy of the attention of this the first of our national conferences.

I am particularly glad that one matter has not been overlooked. I mean that really most important practical one which will be brought forward by Mr. Rawson. If anything should come out of the discussion of it in the shape of a thoroughly sound sustentation scheme, that alone will be worth the assembling of the Conference. "The painfully low average of the salaries" of certain of our ministers, to which Mr. Cogan Conway last week alluded in your columns, cannot be satisfactory to our laity. We are not indifferent to theology. With us it is emphatically the queen of the sciences, and by consequence the Ministerial office must be a noble function. We have riches in our body, and, if the conference should evoke the necessary earnestness, the right thing should be easy of accomplishment. Why might we not raise £30,000, or even £50,000? It need not be done all at once; a few practical details might meet any difficulties. Professional men, and others dependent on their incomes, should have a series of years allowed them for their contributions, the contingency of death, &c., meanwhile being also provided for. What might not such a fund do for us! I sincerely wish Mr. Rawson success in his efforts. It will be a great thing if our first conference should be marked by a practical scheme of this character.

A LAYMAN.

THE LATE REV. D. DAVISON.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Miss Davison "emphatically protests" against the remark in my biographical notice of her father, that "as a minister he was not successful." Permit me to point out that the statement objected to did not stand alone, but had a qualifying context, being immediately followed by a reference to Mr. Davison's resignation of his office at the age of forty-five, and the closing of the chapel. My intention was simply to state an unquestionable fact relating to an old Presbyterian congregation of historic interest, and its last minister. Having regard to his superior abilities and attainments and his sterling qualities, no one will regard his failure at Jewin-street as a reproach; but all will admire Miss Davison's spirited letter guarding her father's memory from any suspicion of blame.

April 9. W. D. JEREMY.

THE FUNERAL OF LONGFELLOW.—The New York papers of the 27th ult. contain accounts of the funeral of Longfellow, which took place on the previous day. The ceremony was characterised by great simplicity. In the house the services consisted, says the New York Times, of a brief address, with reading of selections from the Scriptures by the Rev. Samuel Longfellow, of Philadelphia, the poet's brother; singing by a choir of female voices, with piano accompaniment, and a short concluding prayer, also, by the Rev. Samuel Longfellow. These services were strictly private, and in the presence of a small company, embracing only the family and relatives who were present at the poet's death-bed, and a few of his intimate literary friends and neighbours. There were the poet's family of sons and daughters, his brothers and sisters, and of those not of the immediate family, Ralph Waldo Emerson, who would not be deterred by the delicacy of his health and his advancing years from attending the funeral of his old and revered friend; Oliver Wendell Holmes, George William Curtis, Charles Eliot Norton, the Rev. Cyrus A. Bartol, Alexander Agassiz, and Mrs. Louis Agassiz. This company was grouped around the coffin, at the head of which sat the Rev. Samuel Longfellow, who alone conducted the simple services. The plain coffin was covered with black broadcloth, and bore a single line of passion flowers. The inscription on the plate was: "Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Born February 27, 1807. Died March 24, 1882." Immediately on the conclusion of the services the body was borne to Mount Auburn and deposited in the family vault. It was followed to the grave by the larger portion of those present at the services. The ceremony was as simple here as the services at the house had been, and there was no display of flowers, only a profusion of evergreen being placed about the grave. The Rev. Samuel Longfellow spoke the words: "Oh death, where is thy sting? Oh grave, where is thy victory? Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return. The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord." And this was all. Public services later in the afternoon and after the burial were held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard College. These were attended by those who had been present at the funeral services, and a crowded congregation, many who desired to attend being unable to get into the hall. Selections from the Scriptures and from Longfellow's works were read appropriate to the occasion, among others the lines from "Hiawatha" beginning—

He, the sweetest of all singers,
Beautiful and child-like was he;
Brave as man is, soft as woman,
Pliant as a wand of willow,
Stately as a deer with antlers
All the many sounds of nature
Borrowed sweetness from his singing,
All the hearts of men were softened
By the pathos of his music.

The Rev. Professor C. C. Everett afterwards delivered an address upon the poet's life and works. The services concluded with the singing of the hymn:

God is merciful, and His love
He sheds upon the path in which we rove.

Longfellow had for the last quarter of a century attended a Unitarian church, and was classed as a prominent member of the Unitarian denomination.

M. RENAN'S "Mare Aurèle" has been placed on the Index.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Indigestion and Liver Complaints.—The digestion cannot be long or seriously disordered without the derangement being perceptible on the countenance. These Pills prevent both unpleasant consequences; they improve the appetite, and with the increase of desire for food, they augment the powers of digestion and assimilation in the stomach. Holloway's Pills deal most satisfactorily with deranged or diseased conditions of the many organs engaged in extracting nourishment for our bodies from our various diets—as the liver, stomach, and bowels, over all of which they exercise the most salutary control. By resorting at an early stage of this malady to these purifying and laxative Pills, the dyspeptic is speedily restored to health and strength, and his sallowness gradually vanishes.

Religious Intelligence.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The thirty-seventh annual meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association was held on Good Friday in the Unitarian Free Church, Strangeways. At eleven o'clock there was a religious service in the church, which was crowded, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., of Nottingham. After dinner in the school-room, at which four hundred and fifty persons were present, the business meeting was held, the PRESIDENT (the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A.) in the chair. The report was taken as read.

The income has been £169 13s. 5½d., the expenditure £188 9s. 9½d., leaving £18 16s. 4d. still due to the treasurer. The loss on Teachers' Notes has been about £16. Arrangements are pending by which this loss will be materially reduced. The schools forming the Association now number 62, and in 55 schools on the books 1,338 teachers; 719 classes; 10,181 scholars, including 2,916 adults. The average morning attendance of scholars per cent. is 50, against 51, and afternoon attendance 67½, against 68, in the statistics in the last annual report. The committee have again been urged to supply an acknowledged want of our schools by the publication of one or more Service of Song. Though no satisfactory service of the kind has yet been forthcoming, the subject has not been overlooked, and it is most earnestly commended to the consideration of the new committee. The committee have still to complain that Teachers' Notes is not supported as it well deserves to be, and urge upon committees of schools to purchase quarterly a sufficient number of Teachers' Notes, and issue them gratis to their teachers, a plan which is already adopted in several schools. The fourth annual examination of Sunday scholars was held on April 4th, 5th, and 6th, 1881, when 447 candidates presented themselves from 17 schools, as against 624 candidates from 27 schools in the previous year. Of these 305 satisfied the examiners, and passed the examination—52 in the honours division, 98 in the first class and 155 in the second class of the pass division. The falling off in the numbers both of candidates and of schools presenting them seems at first sight to indicate a decline of interest in the examinations. But, on the other hand, the increase in the probable number of candidates from 696 from 17 schools this time last year, to 766 from 16 schools for the next examination to be held on April 3rd, 4th, and 5th, shows that in some schools, at any rate, the system is found to work well. The friends of the Association will learn with regret that with this annual meeting Mr. John Reynolds will terminate his long connection with the Association as one of its secretaries. Mr. W. H. Mellor, who has long been a member of the Committee, and has acted as Secretary of the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union, has kindly consented to allow himself to be nominated at the annual meeting as co-Secretary with the Rev. P. M. Higginson.

THE PRESIDENT, in his opening address, made an earnest appeal for the extension of the examination scheme in the Sunday-schools. He was somewhat sorry that the movement had not made greater way, because he had a strong conviction that it was calculated to do much good if it only took hold of the Sunday schools. A great opportunity was before these institutions, and in going into his own and other schools he had often felt how very much more good might be done to improve that opportunity. He regarded the leisure of the Sunday as a thing of priceless value. Amid the press of engagements in the week there was not much time for cultivating those things which enlarged the mind and improved the life, but in the leisure of the Sunday there was the occasion which, if seized, could alter the whole tone and spirit of the life and character. He had looked to Sunday-schools to do much in this way, and the question was how to make the schools do it. When he spoke of Sunday-schools he did not think so much of those scholars who attended day schools; he thought the most important work was with the boys and girls who had left the day schools. He rejoiced to know that a large portion of the young people in their schools consisted of persons over thirteen years of age, and he considered that with these lay their chief and most important work. They had amongst these the opportunity of carrying on the education, the elements of which were only commenced in the day school life. How to meet this great calling was a question which pressed itself upon his attention, and he looked upon the examination scheme as one means of helping the Sunday-schools to do their work more efficiently. He had seen the advantage of young people going through a systematic course, of having a definite aim before them, and was convinced that the effect would be beneficial to both teachers and scholars. He knew that many present were opposed to the examination scheme, regarding it as a secular work more akin to day school or college work, whereas the work of Sunday-schools should be distinctly religious. He agreed that the work of the schools was religious, and wanted to know in what way the making of teaching systematic and effective militated against the religious work of the schools. Religion was a life, a spirit, and an influence. Who was more likely to have influence with the scholars? Surely he who occupied their minds with the keenest interest and taught them most effectively. There were some people—religious sort of people, he supposed—who thought the proper way of spending Sunday was to go half asleep. There were fashionable people who lounged in the park, criticising their neighbours' dresses and showing off their own. That possibly was a religious way of spending Sunday, but he regarded it as a vain and empty way. His notion was that good work done by the mind was as good a thing in the Sunday-school as anything could be, and that it had a religious influence upon the mind to be active, thoughtful, and earnest in study. It was the empty mind, the idle life, that usually went wrong. If they wanted to draw people out of public-houses they must place before them high refining influences, and things which the people cared for, and in cultivating the minds of their scholars they were lifting them above the low debasing pursuits which led persons into temptation. He therefore could not see that there was anything in the objection that by making the teaching efficient, looking after the intellectual results achieved and striving after higher, they were neglecting the religious interests of the Sunday-school. He could not believe that any teacher who had religion burning in his soul would lose it because he spent his time in giving instruction to his scholars and in trying to raise them intellectually as well as morally—(applause). There was a saying in "Middlemarch" to the effect that if any man once became content with shabby achievements that man was lost; and in placing before scholars an ambition to shine in their studies they were placing a high and not a low motive before them. It might be urged that a system of examinations would arouse feelings of jealousy and ambition. Jealousy was to be deprecated, but he denied that ambition was wrong. Nothing great or good was accomplished without a high ambition, and as for jealousy, his experience at school and college was that the boy who won the prize was honoured and loved by those who had competed with him. Besides, one of the main purposes of teaching was to fit young people for the life on which they were entering; and in the school, which was a world in miniature, the children should be taught to fight the temptations to which they would be exposed and rise superior to them. He hoped, therefore, that the schools who had adopted the examination system would continue it, and that those who had not begun it would at least give it a trial. In his own school they had singing, dramatic, dancing, German, and geography classes; they tried to meet everybody all round and suit everybody's taste, so that there was something in the Sunday-school that each could be interested in. He knew there were some people who thought dramatic and dancing classes were wrong. For his own part he thought a good dramatic performance was good both for spectator and actor, and that a dance in good and pure company was as good a thing as anybody could engage in. He had sometimes thought it rather hard that families who allowed their own children to dance until four and five o'clock in the morning found fault with Sunday scholars if they had the presumption to dance until half-past ten at night. He detested class legislation; he objected to the doctrine that what was sauce for the goose was not for the gander; he believed that what was good for one was for another, and his doctrine was that the Sunday-schools were doing a grand work in finding a happy and bright home week after week for young men and women. It was the influence around them, not the thing they did, that was so much to be considered; it was the company in which they were rather than the act itself which they did; and let them hope that they had in Sunday-schools the good company with which any one could mingle without harm. That was his idea, and he raised a plea that the Sunday-school should be made a bright and congenial home for young people, and then they would not lose but keep the elder scholars—(applause).

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by Mr. FRANK JONES, the report and treasurer's statement were accepted.

The Rev. D. WALMSLEY (Bury) moved the appointment of officers for the ensuing year, Mr. John Reynolds to be president, and thanking the Rev. H. E. Dowson for his services during the past twelve months.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. G. R. EVANS (Liverpool), and carried.

A cordial welcome was then given to Mr. I. M. Wade, representing the London Association, and the Rev. R. Armstrong, representing the North Midland Association.

After Mr. WADE had acknowledged the compliment, a special vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Armstrong, on the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by Mr. J. HEYS, to which Mr. ARMSTRONG briefly replied.

A vote of thanks was also passed to the Strangers Church congregation for their hospitality, and the resolution was acknowledged by the Rev. T. J. MARRIOTT, the minister.

Mr. J. H. REYNOLDS moved, the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL seconded, and Mr. E. WINSER supported a resolution, which was passed, urging the desirableness of the members of the Association joining and by all means in their power forwarding the interests of the provident society started by the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union.

This concluded the business of the meeting.

EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was held in the same church, and was well attended. In the absence of Mr. Alderman Grundy, who had been announced to preside, Mr. Edwin Winsor was called to the chair.—After a few remarks from the CHAIRMAN, a resolution to place on record the meeting's regret at Mr. J. Reynolds's resignation of the office of Secretary, and thanking him for his valuable services during the long period of sixteen years, was carried by acclamation.—After Mr. REYNOLDS had replied,

The Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A. (Gorton), read a paper on "Aids for Teachers." He said his action was severely practical. He wished to deal with the methods of works, with aids—actual or possible, partly used or lying untouched within their reach—to the better discharge of the task which, as Sunday-school teachers, they had undertaken. He reminded them that rules, methods, abundance of external machinery would be of little use to them unless it was in the felt presence of the universal Father, and in the spirit of the great elder brother, that they essayed to teach the younger brethren. A good deal of what passed for teaching in Sunday-schools did not really deserve the name. If a teacher, so-called, spent all his time in reading a story book to his class, the occupation might, so far as it went, be innocent and harmless enough, but it was something which the scholars might just as well do for themselves. If a "teacher" let his class simply "read round" a chapter in the Bible, or in some other book, and took little or no pains to make them understand it, and to prevent them from getting very mistaken impressions of the meaning of unfamiliar words or allusions he could not surely be said to teach them. Neither in amount nor in accuracy would their knowledge have been increased. A teacher must be a person who at least tried to teach. And to try, honestly and patiently, must be better than to muddle on week by week with no sustained effort to do better. One of the great difficulties in the way of a teacher was to gain and secure the attention of his class. This could not be got by demanding it or claiming it as a right. Nothing but a sense of real interest in the thing that the teacher was saying would secure the attention of the scholars. True attention came from the fact that one had something to say worth saying. He commended to their notice the statement, "When you teach have something good to say, say what you mean, say it well, and leave off when you have said it." Having by due preparation and a proper method of imparting instruction succeeded in interesting scholars they had still to assure themselves that they really understood what they had been told, and that it had made an impression on their minds likely to be permanent. Various writers insisted on the necessity of questioning the scholars after teaching. He considered that the necessity of questioning was not as fully recognised amongst them as it should be. He knew of many difficulties, but was persuaded of its vast importance. It was, in his judgment, the only safeguard against hopeless misunderstandings on the part of the scholars. He thought it was decidedly better to teach a little at a time and teach it thoroughly than to hurry through a book or course of lessons without any testing of the scholars' progress. That some practical good might, if possible, come out of the Conference, he would offer two remarks about books and suggest four debateable questions as falling naturally within their present scope. As to books, preparation for Sunday lessons was made continually more easy and their choice of subjects more wide by the publication of teachers' notes and of the class and note books of the Sunday School Association, and those who wished to study methods of teaching would be much enlightened by various publications of the Sunday School Teachers' Union. The questions he suggested for debate were—(1) whether preparation of their lessons was as important as he had made it out to be, (2) whether there was any conspicuous gap still unfulfilled in their class-book and notes for lessons, (3) whether considering that almost every book treating systematically of methods of teaching came to them from orthodox sources, and therefore contained much about the Bible and human nature which was out of harmony with the convictions of their teachers, would it not be desirable for some competent person amongst them to write a manual of methods for the guidance of their schools? (4) whether it would not be desirable to secure for every intending teacher before he began his work some personal instruction, definite and helpful so far as it went, to fit him for what he was undertaking.

A discussion followed, in which various suggestions were made for the improvement of Sunday-school teaching.

The Rev. J. FREESTON gave it as his opinion, founded upon many years' experience in various fields of labour, that there was no work which brought such sure and satisfactory results as earnest work done in the Sunday-school.

Mr. I. M. WADE pointed to the plan in use amongst the orthodox bodies of having fixed lessons for each Sunday in the year, and suggested that Unitarians would do well to adhere to some system of lessons in their schools.

The Rev. F. H. JONES, Mr. C. GRUNDY, the Rev. W. MITCHELL, and others also took part in the debate, which was terminated by the passing of a vote of thanks to the Rev. D. Agate for his paper.

A vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman for presiding, and the proceedings ended.

NORTH END DOMESTIC MISSION, LIVERPOOL.

The twenty-third annual meeting of the supporters and friends of this mission was held on the 30th ult. at the Mission, Bond-street. Mr. R. R. RATHBONE presided, and amongst those present were Messrs. S. G. Rathbone, G. Holt, A. Booth, H. W. Gair, F. A. Rathbone, W. B. Gair, C. W. Jones, P. D. Carr, J. E. Hawkes, F. Gaskell, G. E. Evans, the Revs. C. Beard, J. E. Odgers, and the Missionaries, Messrs. H. W. Hawkes and E. M. Gabriel. Many ladies were also present, and the room was well filled with members of the Mission congregation and elder scholars. A beautiful display of exotic and wild flowers brightened the platform.

The meeting was opened with a hymn, when Mr. H. W. HAWKES read his annual report, which, after a sympathetic reference to the severe illness of Mr. Gabriel, reviewed the work of the year 1881:—As visitors for the Provident Society, the two missionaries had collected savings to the amount of £1,628 10s. 1d. The Temperance Benefit Society ended the year with fifty-one members, and divided a good surplus. The Window Gardening Society was fairly successful. The lodge of Good Templars touched its highest point in the autumn, and was very prosperous. The Juvenile Templars were not quite up to the mark. The Sunday-school showed an increased average attendance, viz., 108 in the morning, and 177 in the afternoon, and the elder scholars attend evening service very regularly. A social club-room has been added on for the elder boys and young men. The Mutual Improvement Society has made decided progress, and lectures had been given. The Mothers' Meeting still thrives. The Childrens' Church has a steady attendance of about fifty. The adult congregation is about stationary. Several minor matters were touched on, and the report concluded with an appeal to the authorities on behalf of public improvements much wanted at the North End.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD, in moving the adoption of the report, alluded to a passage in it, commenting on the irreverence too often resulting from the extravagancies of the Salvation Army, and urged that true religion was inseparable from emotions of reverence and awe. He believed that it always had a refining influence, and instanced a service he had witnessed in a foreign cathedral as a proof that perfect simplicity and popular power may be combined. He strongly supported Mr. Hawkes's remarks on the needed improvements.

Mr. C. W. JONES, in seconding the motion, earnestly combated the too-common idea that intemperance and other forms of evil are inevitable, and that a certain number of people always will go to the bad. He had faith that the time was coming when these things would be successfully fought down, and expressed astonishment that instead of only two Domestic Missions in the city there were not a hundred.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS, in moving a further resolution, spoke of the right basis of the Salvation Army work, in appealing to the religious nature as the only sure way of reforming men, but pointed out that after the first excitement, during which much good was often done, in the attempt to rekindle the dying flame, more and more extravagant means were employed, bringing contempt on religion and doing grave injury.

Further resolutions were carried, and the meeting closed with hymn and prayer.

CONGREGATIONAL SOIREE.

The annual soiree in connection with the above congregation was held in the Unitarian meeting-house, Moneyrea, on Tuesday evening, April 4. There was a large attendance of the members of the congregation and others. After the preliminary services, an adjournment was made to the meeting-house, which was well filled. The chair was occupied by Mr. David M'Master, who was accompanied on the platform by the Revs. J. C. Street, J. J. Wright, H. Rylett; W. J. Hurst, Esq., J.P.; Dr. Edward Gardner, Coroner; Messrs. F. D. F. O'Connor, Belfast Morning News, N. Bodel, Melagh; D. McCullough, Moneyrea; John Bennett, Belfast; Gavin Orr, Gransha. Letters regretting unavoidable absence were received from the Revs. John McCaw (Killinchy); W. O. Magowan (Ravara); H. McGowan (Ravara); and Messrs. Robert McCalmont, (Belfast); James Anderson (Saintfield); William Simonton (Combe); James McMaster (Tullycarnett); John Orr (Conlig); and others.

The CHAIRMAN delivered a brief opening address, in the course of which he said that the general affairs of the congregation are in a more prosperous condition than at this time last year; and that there is, if possible, even greater unanimity and cordiality of feeling amongst the members of the congregation itself, and a larger and more active sympathy between them and the friends of other denominations. The Chairman went on to say:—We have been led to understand, by a variety of unpleasant incidents, that we are blamed for not having interfered in such a manner as to keep our minister's political action within the lines laid down by those who assume to themselves the right and privilege of dictating the course of action which they believe ought to be followed. We regret that such a feeling should exist on the part of any of our friends, as we have no desire to separate ourselves from the great and influential party with whom we have so long acted, and to whom we have always given an earnest, an active, a united, and a consistent support. These differences have probably arisen from a misunderstanding of the relations which exist between this congregation and its minister. Civil and religious liberty has always been the watchword of the Moneyrea congregation. We regard liberty not as a mere abstraction or a mere word, but as an active and vital principle. Acting on this principle, when more than three years ago the pulpit of this congregation became vacant, we took the usual steps to secure the services of a suitable minister. Mr. Rylett was introduced to us, and, acting on the recommendations of tried and trusted friends, we invited him to become our minister. We had satisfied ourselves that his training and education were such as to fit him to be the leader and guide of the religious thought and life of the congregation. We asked him to sign no creed; we bound him to no system of theological dogmas; and we certainly required of him no allegiance to any political party. We were satisfied to know that he came to the work of the ministry here with a free and unfettered mind, and with an unsullied purity of life. And now, after an experience of more than three years, I only express the unanimous feeling of the congregation when I say that the recommendations which we received have been fully justified, and our expectations amply fulfilled—(applause). It will therefore be at once seen that whether we agreed with Mr. Rylett's political action or not, we could not interfere with him, without violating in a most flagrant manner that principle of liberty which we claim to be the fundamental principle of this congregation. Mr. Rylett came amongst us at the beginning of 1879, and he has been with us through one of the worst and most disastrous periods of agricultural depression ever experienced in this country. His pastoral duties led him into the homes of the people, and a searching and careful inquiry forced him to the conclusion to which all candid inquirers have come and must come, that the condition of the people was due not so much to accidental and temporary causes as to radical defects in the existing system of land tenure. And now when we consider the effect which the state of things he witnessed was likely to have upon Mr. Rylett's mind, coming as he did fresh from a different condition of society; when he found the population of the country rapidly thinning, the social status of the people gradually declining, and the education of the young so fearfully neglected, and when he found the whole energies of the people directed to the one absorbing purpose—that of trying to wring from an unwilling soil the exorbitant rent, which has been continually claimed by a grasping and avaricious landocracy—I say that let others think what they will, for my own part I am astonished at the moderation of his language and action. The course which Mr. Rylett has seen fit to take may not approve itself in every particular to all of us alike, but we are all abundantly satisfied that his sole desire is to do what in him lies to improve the condition of the people amongst whom his lot is cast—(cheers).

Dr. GARDNER (coroner) addressed the meeting on the subject, "Civil and Religious Liberty." The worthy coroner was particularly well received, the congregation of Moneyrea having taken a very active part in securing his election as coroner but a short time previously. The coroner's speech was an eloquent and exhaustive treatment of a subject which has from time immemorial been first on the list of sentiments at all gatherings of this large and respectable congregation.

The CHAIRMAN next gave the sentiment of "Liberal Religion and the Unitarian Society."

The Rev. J. C. STREET, in responding, said that he was there in a two fold capacity—first, as a minister of a free Church, to express his personal sympathy with the free Church here upon the hills that was trying through its modern, as it had tried through its past, history, to be perfectly true to the principles of religious as well as civil liberty. He knew himself what it was to be subject to many condemnations, and a good deal of social persecution and ostracism. He had had for a long period in the past to stand to a large extent alone among those who should have been his brethren, and had to suffer a good deal in various ways because of the very pronounced part he had taken in defence of the principles of religious liberty, and because he had ventured to identify himself with opinions that were anything but popular. As he had resented strongly anything like interference with his personal liberty, he was there that night to express his strong approval of the way in which the congregation at Moneyrea had recognised the perfect liberty of their minister, both in a political and a religious sense, and allowed him to take the course that seemed to him to be right—(loud cheers). He had never asked from those from whom he demanded respect that they should concur in his religious opinions, and he never cared whether they did or not, and neither, he took it, did Mr. Rylett require that all his brother ministers and the members of the free churches should agree with all his political actions, and he took it for granted he did not care whether they did or not. If, in a passing sentence, they would permit him to say that he had not concurred in all Mr. Rylett had said and done, it would only give more weight to what he would further say—that he believed Mr. Rylett had been acting upon conscientious principles, and he had a most perfect and most absolute right to so express himself, and should command respect for daring so to speak. He was there also in a representative capacity, as representing the Unitarian Society of Belfast. The rev. speaker then went on vigorously to defend the Unitarian Faith.

The CHAIRMAN gave the sentiment of "prosperity to the tenant-farmers of Ireland," and coupled with it the name of Mr. W. J. Hurst.

Mr. HURST (who is regarded as a probable Liberal candidate for the representation of the county of Devon) in responding said he thought it very generous on the part of the chairman that he should call upon him to address that meeting truly and unrestrictedly, although his political views and those of their clergyman were so different. He knew there was no danger of his presence there being misunderstood, and that no one there would suppose he had become a Land Leaguer any more than a Unitarian. He had much pleasure in coming there, and that for several reasons. He hoped, even if he failed to convert their clergyman, he might at least convert some of his flock. He came there with pleasure, for he always liked to meet men of earnestness and enthusiasm. Knowing the history of the struggle for justice and liberty in Ulster during the last eight years, he could testify that the people of that district had all along fought with enthusiasm in the front ranks. He knew some were dissatisfied with the Liberal Government, some of whose actions had sorely strained the loyalty of many. But he believed, if instead of some dozen or so of Cabinet Ministers, the twelve Apostles themselves were in place and power, they would be unable—speaking with all reverence—to conduct the affairs of the nation at this critical time so as to do full justice to all parties. He had heard it said "Principles, not men," should be, as it was once, the creed of the Liberal party. They thoroughly endorsed that principle. But still he reminded that meeting that a certain amount of faith must be placed in Ministers, who necessarily are more fully informed on all points than any other men could be. And he put it to them—did not, broadly speaking, Gladstone and Bright represent justice and progress, and Northcote and Salisbury injustice and retrogression? Therefore, was it not very important that they should calmly consider which they should choose—a Liberal majority and land laws administered by their friends, or a Conservative majority and land laws administered by their foes? He saw over a gate in one of our Ulster towns, Esse quam videri—"to be rather than to seem"—so, in speaking to the sentiment, "Prosperity to the tenant-farmer," he would say, let us honestly strive to be, not merely to seem, the well-wishers and friends of the farmer. True friends don't flatter us, true friends don't seek exclusive privileges for us, true friends will not seek to benefit us to the detriment of other classes of the community. They will tell us the truth, and seek noble but even-handed justice for us. The speaker then referred at some length to the condition of the county, and concluded by hoping that even to the deadly conflict of the social forces now going on in Ireland will succeed peace and "prosperity to the tenant-farmer," and to the whole community—(loud applause).

Mr. F. D. F. O'CONNOR in giving the sentiment of "The minister and congregation," said that the relations which existed between that congregation and minister were such as ought to exist between a properly governed people and those who governed them, and those relations he maintained, did not exist in Ireland—(cheers).

The Rev. H. RYLETT, who was received with great cheering, said he had to thank them very cordially for the many kind observations which had been made in respect of himself. He was glad to believe that the relations which subsisted between them were of the heartiest and most cordial kind. There was no house in the whole congregation in which he did not feel himself to be a welcome guest, and he believed there was no house within twenty miles of his manse in which he would not also be a welcome guest. He desired to thank everybody, not only the members of his own congregation but all other congregations who had rendered him on so many occasions such kind and willing service; for he would say that he never wanted anything done and got a refusal on the part of any man whom he asked to do it. So much for their pastoral relations. He hoped and prayed that they might be even more hearty and more unanimous than they were at the present time. No effort on his part should be wanting to render them so, and if they continued to help him as they had helped him in the past they would have a continuously successful career. A great deal of reference had been made that evening to matters which were perhaps a little outside their congregational life, but as Mr. Rylett's politics seemed to be of such intense interest to such a great number of people inside and outside his church, Mr. Rylett was there to say that he was not ashamed of his politics—(applause). He came came to settle at Moneyrea, as Mr. M'Master had said, at the commencement or a period of very disastrous agricultural depression. Mr. M'Master did him no more than justice when he said that he (Mr. Rylett) had made very careful inquiry into the condition of things that surrounded him. He found that the material condition of the people was poor in the extreme. He found that the fundamental principle of property was being violated every day, and that there was going on, under a form of legality, a constant uninterrupted system of flagrant robbery. Mr. Rylett went at length into the political question of the relations of landlord and tenant. He had sought to break down that feeling of sectarian prejudice and hatred which had marred the pages of the history of this county in the past, and he had endeavoured to teach the people that if they looked that sectarian animosity in the face they would quickly remove it and have a united Ireland, and then the people would not be long in securing their demands. He believed in self-reliance. It was necessary for Ireland and the people of Ireland to rely upon themselves, and not to depend upon any Prime Minister. He would say that he had no desire, and never had any desire, to separate himself from the Liberal party. He considered he was connected with the Liberal party, but if the Liberal party deserted Liberal principles as Mr. Chamberlain confessed it had done, he claimed his right to say that the Liberal party so called had forsaken their colours, and that he remained a Liberal. The attempt had been made to silence him, but he would not be gagged, and would maintain his opinions and express them regardless of what might happen, because he believed with the venerated Fletcher Blakely, that the explicit avowal of the truth was the best means of promoting it—(loud applause).

Mr. A. K. STEWART, as the descendant of one of the founders of the congregation, also responded, and in doing so said he was satisfied that Moneyrea being a perfectly free and independent congregation had only to realise the responsibilities and liberty and be true to its fundamental principle, in order to secure large blessings for itself and for the community at large. They had a minister who boldly spoke his mind, and it was their duty and their determination to support him—(cheers).

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT in a happy speech moved a vote of thanks to the ladies who had so kindly presided at the tea table, to the choir and to the speaker, and the proceedings were brought to a close in the usual way.

NORTH-MIDLAND SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The thirty-fifth annual meeting of this Association was held on Easter Monday, at the Old Meeting House, Mansfield. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., of Nottingham, and the sermon was delivered by the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, F.G.S., of Birmingham. Luncheon was afterwards provided in the school-room, of which about ninety persons partook. In the afternoon the business meeting was held in the chapel, under the presidency of the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, of Mansfield. The minutes of the last annual meeting were read, and, on the motion of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, adopted.—A resolution, welcoming to the meeting the Rev. J. Freeston, of the Manchester District Association; Mr. W. J. Cross, of the Midland Christian Union Sunday School Association; and the Rev. J. M. Pilkington, of the West Riding District Association, was carried, after which the Chairman moved that the printed report of the Association, as presented, be received and adopted.—The Rev. E. P. Hall, of Loughborough, seconded, and the motion was unanimously agreed to, after a brief discussion.—The next resolution was that a vice-president be added to the Association, and this was carried unanimously.—The officers for the ensuing year were then appointed, the President being Mr. Richard Enfield, Arboretum-street, Nottingham. It was resolved that the next annual meeting should take place at the Upper Chapel, Sheffield.—Mr. H. E. Perry moved that examinations be discontinued in the schools, arrangements being made with the Manchester Association to extend their examinations to any school in this district wishing to be examined. He pointed out that the Association was put to expense simply for the sake of one or two schools. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong seconded the proposition, which was carried. Tea was then provided in the school-room, and over one hundred persons sat down. The Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved again took the chair, and Miss Gittins, of Leicester, read a paper on "A Plan of Work in Sunday Schools." In the report presented by the committee the treasurer's account showed that the expenditure during 1881 had been £54 0s. 2d., and that of the subscriptions contributed the sum of £5 was from Nottingham, and of special donations £4 2s. 6d. from Nottingham High Pavement. The Visitors' Report stated that the various schools in the Association had been visited. The total number of scholars on the books was 1,998, as compared with 2,008 last year. The number of schools in the Association was 17, and of classes in the schools 173, with 317 teachers. The average percentage attendance of scholars in the morning was 44, and in the afternoon 65½, as contrasted with 49 and 69½ last year. The low percentage of attendance was attributed to scholars in some schools only being required to attend in the afternoon, to imperfect returns, and to want of visitation.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—The annual sermons were preached in Unity Church on Sunday last by the Rev. William Elliott, of Sunderland, and on Easter Tuesday the annual congregational tea and public meeting took place. A large number of friends were present from Newcastle and Sunderland. The chair was occupied by the Rev. R. Cowley Smith, who in the course of his address gave a résumé of his labours among them during his ministry, extending over nearly four years. Mr. Downey moved a vote of thanks to the preacher of Sunday, whose absence from that meeting through family bereavement they all deplored, which was seconded by Mr. Isaac Carr. A vote of welcome was passed by acclamation, on the motion of Mr. Thomas Hornby, seconded by Mr. J. H. Thompson, to the visitors. The Rev. Eli Fay, of Sheffield, responded in an earnest and impressive speech. He referred to the early removal of their minister to his own neighbourhood. Personally he knew little of Mr. Smith, but he had been unanimously elected to Stannington because the people believed in him, had faith in him, having known him for many years, and he looked forward to working with him side by side, as Mr. Payne had been able to do. He then urged the congregation to work earnestly and firmly together during the necessary space of time before another minister settled among them. The Rev. Alfred Payne also responded, and in the course of an earnest appeal to the congregation to be determined to overcome the temporary struggles of a young cause, said he looked upon the removal of Mr. Smith as a great loss to the district. He deprecated the love of change which some congregations seemed to exhibit. It was too often the case that just when a minister had been long enough to make his influence felt, some people were found who declared for a change. He impressed upon the members of that church to make up their minds to settle down resolutely to make their cause a success, and to show their earnestness during the time they would be without a minister by helping themselves. If they did that, they might rely upon it, the Association of which he was the representative would rally round them and they would soon again have the benefit of a regular minister. Mr. David Bell proposed a vote of thanks to the ladies, and Mr. T. Hornby moved a similar compliment to Mr. Smith for presiding. Mr. Smith briefly responded, and a most successful meeting was brought to a close by a hymn and the benediction.

The Liberal Pulpit.

TRUE AND FALSE ÆSTHETICISM.

The Rev. Brooke Herford preached recently at Chicago on "True and False Æstheticism," from the text, "I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands: and I fed the flock."—Zech. xi. 7. If art, said Mr. Herford, be the secret of life, it is important to understand its principles. The first of these is that it cares for realities, not for imitations. Beauty, the subtle, indefinable something which fills us with delight, is God's work. The key to the study is merely to open the eyes to all around. Our dull-eyedness singles out certain aspects of nature for admiration, yet in reality the meanest roadside weed, the tuft of moss on the wall, the animalculæ which swarm in every drop of water, have the strange and subtle elements of beauty given them from on high. The fringing of the speckled foam on the sea is as beautiful and wonderful as the laughing ripple or the storm-tossed waves. With the real sense of beauty in the soul, the whole realms of nature are opened, and lead to awe and appreciation of the Creator. Further, if the love for beauty is genuine and grows out of an appreciation of nature, it will save from another falsity—the fashion. But all material beauty, form, colour, and the like, is less than moral beauty. In the divine reality, beauty in relation to man is made up of grades. Of these, the crown is moral beauty. Any form with life is more beautiful than a lifeless form. Is not a beautiful face superior to the highest work of sculptured marble? And the moral nature within, shining out, makes the beauty of the features. The great defect of æstheticism is in overlooking this moral element, and regarding the beautiful only in relation to form and colour. Is not the prophet right in placing moral beauty high above this? John Ruskin is not responsible for the travesties of a crowd of camp-followers. He has never failed to assign moral beauty to its true place. It is not his precepts that have turned them into worshippers of things of the sense, from which the descent is easy to things sensuous and thence to the sensual. If there is to be an æsthetic revival, let it be of the moral nature. Let the sympathy with the beautiful come from the heart. Considered in that light, the question arises, Is not æstheticism as a philosophy of life a mistake? Like any pleasure its expounders are putting it in the forefront of life; and the pursuit of pleasure for its own sake is always unsatisfying. Beauty as the leading object of life, in the sense of always seeking directly, is a selfish object. The real inspiration of a man's life should be the thought of duty. The Swiss pastor Oberlin, whose life was a worthy example of this precept, nobly expressed the thought when he says:—

"I slept, and dreamed that life was Beauty;
I woke, and found that life was Duty.
Was then my dream a shadowy lie?
Toil on, sad heart, courageously;
And thou shalt find thy dream to be
A noontide light and truth to thee."

THE REV. H. R. HAWES ON IMMORTALITY.

On Easter Day the Rev. H. R. Hawes reviewed the arguments, old and new, for and against Immortality, at St. James's, Marylebone. After alluding to the great national festival of the Spring, he discussed Immortality as (1) a sentiment; (2) a doctrine founded on a belief in Christ's words, both of which, he said, weighed with those who believed it already and not with others; then (3), as not contrary to physiology; (4) as founded on Kant's "Pure Reason"; (5) as an hypothesis not explained and arranged on any facts; (6) as resting on a belief in God as a Father.

St. Paul's argument for our survival, from the analogy of a seed dying in the earth and springing up, would not hold good, because the seed did not really die and the body does—burn the seed and it would not come up again. Analogy means probability from a parallel case. The cases are not parallel. St. Paul's figure was an illustration, not an argument.

Neither would St. Paul's argument, adopted by the Churches generally hold good—that because Christ rose we shall rise. That does not follow, and the more unlike ourselves you make out Christ to have been, the less does it follow. We die in Adam, sure enough, as Paul says; our connection with a mortal progenitor is organic and physical; but that physically we live in Christ—no; our connection with Christ is spiritual, not organic, and may or may not exist in any special case; the assertion because the Head of Humanity rose, therefore the members will rise, is again a figure of speech, not an argument; it proved nothing.

The physiological argument against immortality, affirming the mind to be a mere product of matter and force, was then attacked. "All that we know of the phenomena of mind and matter," said the preacher, "is that they appear and disappear together, but you cannot express mind in terms of matter, though for every mental operation you can show a material operation in the brain; but even then mind is not a proper product of matter and force; to account for it, mind, as Buchner says, you must have matter and force + X, or an unknown something." Until man's mind, or the human soul, could be expressed in terms of matter, you could not say that the dispersion of molecules, called death, necessitated the destruction of the soul. Therefore physiology did not disprove immortality.

Kant founded his belief on immortality on the existence of the Moral Law—his argument for it was this:—A moral law is stamped upon men. It teaches virtue and happiness—the one dependent on the other—to be the supreme good. We have an instinct for both. We cannot but believe in their intimate connection, but we are impelled to seek more of each—i.e., to seek after the perfection of the moral law. That perfection, the realisation of the supreme good, is nowhere possible in this life. Therefore, whoever has impressed man with the law must somewhere provide in a future for its fulfilment. In this way Kant argues from the existence of a moral law—unrealisable here—to the necessity of some hereafter. This is his great argument of the "pure reason."

But, lastly, immortality is the hypothesis which explains and arranges a vast series of otherwise inexplicable facts. The mystery of savage populations, of unfinished careers, broken-off work, ruined hopes and aspirations, accumulated stores of love and knowledge, the failure of noble lives—all these, if this life be all, argue a world unjustly and irrationally constituted—and that is inconceivable to us living in a world evidencing such wisdom and power and even moral order begun now. A theory is accounted true in proportion to the number of facts it arranges. Immortality is a theory which goes far to introduce order in the place of the deepest moral and physical discord. It arranges our facts.

Lastly, the preacher dwelt on immortality as involved in the conception of God as a Father. If we believed that presentment of Him, Faith in immortality was a natural consequence. He who had formed us for earth, disciplined us for moral and progressive life here, would not, just when He had brought us to the knowledge of our longing and our love, wipe us out of His Universe.

THE LATE DR. BELLAWS.

At the monthly meeting of the Committee of the American Unitarian Association, held in Boston, the following letter was read from the Rev. Henry Ierson, Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association:—

London, Feb. 25, 1882.

Dear Mr. Reynolds,—You do not need to be assured of the deep regret with which we received the sad intelligence of the death of Dr. Bellows.

To many of us he was almost as well known as he could have been to his friends at home, while the general body of English Unitarians have never lost the kindly impression which his visits left us; and we hold in special grateful remembrance the occasion, nearly fourteen years ago, when he was the preacher at our annual meeting, and became an honorary member of the Association.

I am desired, therefore, by the Executive Committee of the Association to convey to your Committee, and to our American brethren through your kind intermediation, the expression of their profound respect for the honoured memory of your late eminent coadjutor and leader in every worthy enterprise, and their keen sense of the great loss which we have suffered in common with you.

Long has it been to us, as it would also be to yourselves, a source of strength and encouragement that the prominent place which our beloved friend was called to occupy in the religious life of your country was so ably and so nobly filled. But the high and well-deserved repute in which Dr. Bellows was held was not limited within the confines of our own body. His liberality of mind and his genial disposition had attached to him many personal friends to whom he was perhaps more the distinguished American citizen than the Unitarian minister. And his taking the leading part which he did, and did so admirably on one great national occasion, was gratefully appreciated by persons of all religious denominations. They felt that Dr. Bellows and others who served with him in the great cause of humanity were rightly interpreting the spirit of their Christian profession, and that it was to the credit of any forms of religious belief to show their practical effect in self-sacrificing devotion to human welfare.

In many such ways of philanthropic labour throughout his long public life has Dr. Bellows shown that religion can and ought to concern itself with all the natural interests of mankind; and thus, without perhaps thinking of this result, did he commend to public attention and respect Unitarian principles which in his own mind were identified with Christianity. But it was his glory to be in all things the Christian minister. His work and experience as a minister constituted, as he said, "the backbone of his life;" and he laboured incessantly to extend the influence of Unitarian teaching. It was a happy inspiration which led him to bring the organizing and stimulating power that had effected such wonders under his Presidency of the Sanitary Commission to bear upon the great object of bringing together the Unitarians of America in your periodical conferences, in which have been so often exhibited those great gifts of intellect and speech and those graces of character which rendered the influence of Dr. Bellows at the same time so commanding and so conciliating.

These were the qualities which enabled our revered friend to fulfil the important duty of mediating between the old and the new in the order of theological thought. We have long attributed to him this special function in the transition through which the Unitarian churches have been for some time passing. It was indeed his own frequently expressed conviction that he had been called to discharge such duty, and how sincerely he strove to perform it was shown in the effect upon his own mind. For his strong attachments to the past did not hinder the fullest sympathy with present movements of thought, and by none will the loss of such a leader be more deeply felt than by many earnest younger men, whom, while they were learning from him that liberty cannot subsist without law, he yet always encouraged to follow his own brave example of faithfulness to truth and duty.—I am, dear Sir, very sincerely yours,

HENRY IERSON, Secretary.

Signed on behalf of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The Secretary, on behalf of the directors, sent an appropriate reply, which was presented to the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at their meeting on Tuesday last.

Obituary.

DEATH OF THE REV. DR. DEWEY.

We deeply regret to announce the death of this venerable American divine, which occurred on March 21, at his house in Sheffield, Massachusetts. Dr. Dewey was born in 1794, graduated at Williams College in 1814, and was ordained to the ministry in 1823. He was an intimate friend and associate of Dr. Channing, and preached as his assistant for nearly two years. He was one of the most prominent representatives of American Unitarianism. His pastorate of ten years at New Bedford was succeeded by a settlement of fourteen years at New York. When Dr. Bellows went to that city in 1838 a strong friendship sprung up between them, which was broken only by Dr. Bellows's death. Yet Dr. Dewey was so soon called upon to follow him that we may well say of him, as was said of Saul and Jonathan of old, they "were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided." Dr. Dewey's active ministry closed at the termination of his settlement at the New South Church in Boston. He has since been engaged in literary labour. His principal published works were "The Old World and the New," "Discourses on Various Subjects," and "The Two Great Commandments." His writings also included many contributions to the North American Review and other periodicals. We shall give a more extended memoir in a subsequent number.

Mr. D. G. ROSSETTI.—Mr. Dante Gabriel Rossetti, the well-known poet and artist, died late on Sunday night at Birchington, near Margate, where he had been staying for some weeks. He had been in failing health for some time past. Mr. Rossetti was the son of Mr. Gabriel Rossetti, the commentator of Dante, and was brother to Mr. William Michael Rossetti, the critic, and to Miss Christina Rossetti, the poetess. He was looked upon by many as the foremost exponent of the so-called "aesthetic" school, both in art and poetry. He was born in London in 1828, and early in life exhibited decided artistic tastes. He has been chiefly before the public as a designer for the better class of illustrated works, and his name has been associated with those of Maddox Brown, W. Holman Hunt, Millais, and others. In 1861 Mr. Rossetti published a work entitled "The Early Italian Poets," and in 1870 a volume of poems. We are requested to state that the Fine Art Society, New Bond-street, propose to hold an exhibition of Mr. Rossetti's works at once (similar to the Millais exhibition last year), and that they would be glad of the co-operation of possessors of important examples of his work.

It is stated that the late Professor T. H. Green, of Oxford, has left behind him a considerable amount of unpublished writings in which his views are more fully developed than in the isolated essays, rather critical than constructive, which he had published in the Nineteenth Century or in Mind.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PUBLIC MORALITY.—A MEETING in accordance with the following invitation will be held in the Compton Hotel, Liverpool, on the 20th inst., at Three P.M.

WILLIAM SHAEN, Esq., M.A., in the Chair.

DEAR SIR,

Your presence is earnestly desired at a meeting of Ministers, Delegates and Visitors to the approaching Conference at Liverpool of members of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches, for the purpose of considering, and, if the meeting should so determine, of adopting resolutions on the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts.

In the year 1874 a meeting of Ministers was held in London at the time of the Annual Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which was attended by many of our leading Ministers, and which appointed a Committee to prepare a petition for the repeal of the Acts.

Since that time a flood of light has been thrown upon the terrible evils involved in the whole system of State regulation of Prostitution in England and on the continent of Europe, in India, and China, which we are deeply convinced render it the duty of our Churches to raise their voices in protest against the continued existence of these Acts.

The Right Hon. James Stansfeld, M.P., has given notice of his intention to bring the whole question of the Contagious Diseases Acts before Parliament during the present Session, in the form of a Bill for their repeal.

It is right that we should explain that the promoters and Committee of the Conference are in no way whatever responsible for the meeting to which we now invite you. We convene it entirely on our own responsibility, thinking that when so many representatives of our Churches are gathered together for the Liverpool Conference, the opportunity ought not to be lost of meeting to discuss the question of the Acts, and we trust that it will be agreed to add our voice to that of every Church which has declared itself on the subject, in condemnation of the Acts, and in demand for their repeal.

It is understood that, while all those who unite in this invitation approve of the meeting, some of them may be prevented from attending.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

THE Conference has been a grand success. It has more than realised the most ardent expectations of its promoters, and marks the beginning of a new era in the history of Liberal Christianity in this country. Nothing could exceed the warmth, the enthusiasm, the thoroughly practical tone, the earnest spiritual life, and, above all, and almost as a necessary consequence, the essential spirit of unity, amid all diversities of thought, which characterised the whole proceedings from beginning to end. Unitarians and Free Christians of all shades of opinion have shown—not by any means for the first time—that they could meet and discuss the most vital questions in a spirit of complete harmony and true brotherhood. The Unitarianism which undoubtedly formed the principal constituent of thought in the great assembly, may henceforth be interpreted as the uniting and reconciling element in our modern Churches. The Liberalism stood not for any mere wild license of thought, but for Christianity, unfettered by traditions, as interpreted by the free mind aspiring after the highest truth. The Presbyterianism meant no mere sectarian name of a doubtful party in our English history, but implied the essential equality of all our presbyters or ministers of religion, who recognise no distinctions in our Churches but those which are purely spiritual and personal. And the Non-subscription meant the entire freedom from all the limitations of human creeds and tests, only in order that we may devote ourselves with the full heart of loyal allegiance to the service of our Great Master. Convened in such a spirit, and inspired by the great traditions and principles of our Unitarian and Free Churches, the great assembly was animated by a thoroughly Christian spirit from beginning to end. It needed no test, no statement of belief, no “basis” of action, no formal declaration of principles. The Christianity was there in the hearts of loving earnest men and women, and the basis of action came naturally in the common purpose which animated them. There was felt in common the intense desire for “religious fellowship” which brought the assembly together; and, with that prerequisite as the basis, all difficulties were quickly solved, and all intellectual differences were merged in the grand realities of religious sympathy and spiritual unity.

The thoroughly representative character of this Conference was one of its most striking characteristics. Ministers and other delegates were there from every part of the United Kingdom, and every old and new institution, every Trust, Church, and Mission station sent its representatives. From Aberdeen in the distant north, down the eastern coast to Hull, Norwich, and on to Dover and Portsmouth in the south; and along the east coast through South Wales and on to Plymouth in the far south-west; from Belfast to Dublin and Cork, and even from across the Atlantic, ministers and laymen came, rejoicing to meet old and long-separated friends, exulting in the thought that, however isolated in distant and obscure fields of labour, they belonged to a wide and glorious religious community, whose influence is becoming a felt and acknowledged power in both Eastern and Western Continents.

The catholicity of spirit which is becoming an increasing characteristic among us was indicated by the breadth of the programme, and the earnest desire of the promoters of the Conference to include representatives of other Churches than those usually known as Unitarian and Liberal Christians. It is much to be regretted that, with one or two exceptions, none but Unitarian and kindred Churches responded to the invitation. The Conference was, as we pointed out last week, to all intents and purposes a Unitarian Conference, and no breadth of constitution or catholicity of tone could, in the present state of theological parties, make it otherwise. The essays and speeches, discussions and resolutions all referred to our Churches, our ministers, our prospects and aims, and our aspirations; and there was no mistake about the sense in which that significant word “our” was understood by nearly the whole assembly. The presence of the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, of Leicester, and the part he took in the Conference, were subjects of congratulation; but although he reminded the Assembly that other than Unitarian Churches were invited, and implied that they were in danger of losing sight of the real Catholic basis, his friendly rebuke only suggested the inquiry, where were the other Churches of which he spoke; what has become of the once famous Leicester Conference, from which so much was expected? When a great body of earnest Christian men and women are assembled in religious counsel, it is most natural, nay, it is inevitable, that they should think for the time of nothing but their own Churches, their own ministry, the religious cause with which their whole lives have been identified, and for which they are anxious still to labour on till the end. Had other Churches in any considerable numbers responded to the invitation, they also would have exercised a real and perceptible influence; but in their absence—made all the more conspicuous by the presence of such men as Mr. WOOD and one or two others—there could be, and there ought to be, no mistake about the clear fact that this was, to all intents and purposes, a Conference of Unitarian Churches, and that its main design is to extend the influence of that form of religious thought which, however it may be designated, is certainly non-Trinitarian and unorthodox. It would have been simply absurd for such a Conference to have talked about “the development of the religious life” within other Churches than our own, or to have discussed the means by which other Churches can best extend their religious influence, or to have appealed to the laymen then present to raise Ministers’ Stipend and Augmentation Funds for other Churches than those with which they were connected; and although Professor CARPENTER by an after-thought wished to change the title of his paper to “The Education and Supply of Ministers for the Pulpits,” not a single hearer of his admirable paper was blinded to the fact that it was our pulpits, and none other, to which he had direct reference. It may be a matter of regret or of congratulation that the Conference was convened by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It may be an open question whether it would not have been better to have endeavoured to convene a Congress of Liberal thinkers in all Churches on a professedly Catholic basis. But, as a matter of simple fact, we must emphasise the statement that the so-called National Conference at Liverpool was simply a Conference of Unitarian and kindred Churches, and will be distinctly recognised as such not only throughout the denomination, but by friendly and unfriendly observers from without.

Our further comments and criticisms—and the latter are very few—must be left to another occasion. Our voluminous reports of the papers and discussions will sufficiently speak for themselves. The proceedings, with scarcely any exception, were from beginning to end worthy of the occasion. They indicate the presence of great vitality and an earnest spirit of religious life among us, which will undoubtedly lead to large practical results in the immediate future. The most practical paper, from the nature of the subject, was Mr. RAWSON’S, on Ministers’ Stipends and Augmentation Funds, with its painful revelation of the decline of many of our smaller congregations, and the total inadequacy of the incomes of a considerable number of the ministers of even more flourishing congregations. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the thoroughly earnest and business-like way in which Mr. C. H. JAMES, M.P., Mr. W. RATHBONE, M.P., and other laymen have at once grappled with this question; and put it beyond doubt that a determined effort will be made to bring the salaries of all efficient and educated ministers into some nearer proportion to the value of their services. But this and other fruitful subjects must be left for consideration at a time when we have far less pressure upon our space.

The remarkable letter of Dr. MARTINEAU, which we print in full elsewhere, was felt by all as an Episcopal benediction on the proceedings, and completely removed the impression that one who is so greatly honoured among us was in any way indifferent to a movement so closely connected with the deepest life of our Churches. Not only were the professors of our colleges, our journalists, and nearly all our foremost ministers from all parts of the country present, but our really representative laymen, the leaders of social and political movements in their respective neighbourhoods. If we have anything to regret where all was so thoroughly satisfactory, it is that more of these prominent men did not take an active part in the discussions, in at least equal proportion with our ministers. We know well as a rule what the ministers have to say, we are anxious to know what our laymen are really thinking and wanting in relation to the condition and development of the Liberal Christian movement.

One thing more. It was delightful and satisfactory to find that the divisions which are said to exist among us, and are alleged to be fatal to combined action, had no representation in the proceedings of this Conference. We hear about "Old School" and "New School" "Supernaturalists" and "Anti-Supernaturalists," in the metropolis only. These party names and the spirit of division they represent seem to disappear when we go into the freer healthier life of the Midlands and the North. Without any formal declaration of belief, there was a full and most practical unity brought about by the realities of religious sympathy and fellowship. A thoroughly Christian tone at the very outset was given to the proceedings by the Communion Service on Tuesday evening, in which nearly the whole Conference were united, and by the memorable sermon of the Rev. CHARLES BEARD, of which we will only say at present that it was eminently worthy of the great occasion and of the most remarkable audience which even he, with all his varied experience, has ever addressed.

We must not close without bearing our tribute of praise to the admirably efficient arrangements of the Conference Committee and the indefatigable acting secretary, the Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON, so thoroughly supported as they were by the local committee and their equally efficient and indefatigable chairman, Mr. H. MEADE-KING, and their secretary, the Rev. C. J. PERRY, minister of Hope-street Church. The hospitality of our Liverpool friends was unbounded, and has left a most pleasing impression upon all their visitors.

LEICESTER.—The Rev. J. Moden, the newly-appointed pastor of the Free Christian Church, delivered an inaugural sermon at that place on Sunday week. The discourse was founded on the words "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office, so, we being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another;" and the general subject was the mutual responsibilities of minister and congregation.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE PREACHER.

There seems just now a disposition to depreciate the preacher of the period. According to his critics, he has no end of faults and shortcomings. He is certainly inferior, it is insisted, to his predecessors, and he fails to attract hearers to the same extent that they did, or to win their assent to his teachings as was formerly done. We do not know whether he is allowed to be quite so learned or not by the majority of those who have constituted themselves his censors, but we do know that some of them make the assertion that he is not. It is said, also, that the preacher of our time comes from a lower social grade than did his forerunners, and that consequently he is without those social graces and attractions which give influence over those he has to address, in fact, if we are to credit certain writers in the public press, the preacher of the present day is an inferior being altogether compared to the preacher of the past; and this is the principal reason why there is such a decided falling off of the attendance at our places of worship. Now, we should like to know how the said critics have found out all this; for we always like a little proof attached to positive statements. We say at once that we strongly doubt the accuracy of these assertions. We altogether deny that there are grades of men in religion other than that of character. The one divine emphasis of Christianity is that which it lays on the infinite importance of the individual soul. As a matter of fact, it may be that the two churches that happen to be established in this country, the Episcopalian and the Presbyterian, may draw a larger number of their ministers from the industrial classes, and less from the ranks of the aristocracy, than formerly; at least there are more "Liberals" than formerly. But so far as their being drawn from the industrial classes is concerned, we contend that this is rather an advantage than otherwise. For first, there will probably be in the future less appeal to the snobbish element in human nature than formerly, and we should think a decided improvement in brain-power; while the minister will be more likely to know the wants and understand the needs of those whom he addresses than if he had been a younger son of some aristocratic and titled family. He has been used to breathe the same social atmosphere, to bear the same lot, to struggle with the same difficulties, and to fight against the same temptations. And though he may not, perhaps, be admitted to the "House" on the same familiar terms as a brother or a cousin, he will be all the more likely to get into close contact with the mind and heart of the large majority of his parishioners.

Among the other sects, not established, we know that, speaking generally, a larger mind prevails than in the past; a better education is given to their ministers, and they are instructed in branches of knowledge of which their predecessors could know nothing, as they did not exist till recently; so that as far as education is concerned the preacher of the present day has the advantage, at least so far as information is concerned. And it must be borne in mind that the non-established churches are becoming ever more and more the great religious forces of our time; that they are infusing a moral vigour into public life, and helping progress on in every direction unprecedented in past generations. In most instances their ministers are educated in some form or other at the respective expense of these churches. And what institution, we would ask parenthetically, besides the Church had made it a part of its work to seek out youths in the working classes who have superior merit, morally and spiritually, and of course mentally, to those around them, and educate them for a liberal profession? Religion alone has had the power of impelling men to make these sacrifices systematically from generation to generation. The non-established churches have done this far more than the established churches, and have gained in popularity in consequence. It may be that, in doing so, they have lowered the standard of manners, though we hardly think so. For it is generally confessed that the manners of the present are less stately than those of the past; but they are more free. Men are now too busy for punctilious. It is said that the pulse of Englishmen beats two and a half times quicker now than at the beginning of the century. If this be so, then, religious movements—their work and progress will share in the acceleration along with everything else, and a swifter, brighter life is demanded in connection with them. There may be dangers associated with this fact that belonged not to the past; but the gain can hardly be questioned.

But further. It must also be noted that as a rule the churches of the non-established sects are larger in the present day than those in the past, and, therefore, their overflowing congregations were often not so numerous as our less crowded places now. For instance, we read of the great popular Baptist preacher of his day, Robert Hall, drawing not only crowded audiences to listen to his eloquent and powerful outpourings, but also distinguished statesmen, and at once our imagination is set astir, and we call up before our mind's eye an immense place densely packed by entranced multitudes. But Harvey-street Chapel, in Leicester, in which he ministered, will not hold above a third the number of the "Pork Pie" Chapel, built for his successor, Mr. Mursell, who had usually twice his number of hearers present without being crowded. But what a contrast is it to the size of Mr. Spurgeon's tabernacle, who is the popular Baptist minister of the day. If future generations judge of attendance at places of worship by the size of this place, and the way it is generally filled, they will draw a very different conclusion from ours, and they will make, as it seems to us, as great mistakes as the critics are now doing. We believe that our open-eyed observation of the facts of the present day, and the partial knowledge we have of the past in relation to these matters, lead us to draw erroneous conclusions. The fame of the great preachers of bygone days, and some of their sermons, have come down to us; but what about the prosers, the ordinary good men, who did their work faithfully, and then disappeared? If the future judges the present from our Martineaus, Robertsons, and Spurgeons, surely it will hold a very different opinion from that which now widely prevails. We hold that if there is any change in the relations of the minister of the present day, with regard to the people, it is not so much in him that the difference is found as in the people themselves. There has been a considerable growth in the general intelligence of the community, and a decided increase and diffusion of knowledge. And this is an advantage to the preacher rather than otherwise, as he is so much better understood, and, with the permanent religious instincts of the people he is enabled to reach their hearts and minds all the more readily.

We believe the average preacher of the present day to be in every way equal, if not superior, to the preacher of the past, choose what generation the reader may. What, then, is the reason that this outcry has arisen? Of course we judge comparatively, not ideally, in giving the following answer. The quickened intelligence of our time has made us all more critical than in the past. Our ideal of excellence has risen, and as our standard is higher, so also is our criticism all the keener. Men who formerly would have listened with acquiescence, if not with agreement and appreciation, now listen with a lynx-eyed attention, and every faltering or misplaced word, every broken metaphor or halting logic, or appeal to lower motives than the highest, are caught up, and set against the preacher to his disadvantage. It is rare now, we believe, that a large part of a congregation sleep during the delivery of the sermon, as used to be the case, if we are to believe the traditions of a few generations ago. Each Church has a larger per centage of members who think for themselves, and who are able to judge what they hear on sound principles. Judging by a higher standard, they grumble at what in bygone days would have been accepted as a matter of course.

The quickened intelligence of our time has led to another result. The theology that was once assented to, if not in all cases intelligently believed, no longer suits the temper of the present day. In science, in art, in poetry, there has been a large return to nature; instead of doctrinal standards, the heart, the conscience, and the reason, must be appealed to by the pulpit, for men cannot be free men of the mind all the week and mental slaves on Sunday. And if the preacher of the present, who with equal gifts of intellect and superior knowledge to the preacher of the past, having better informed hearers to speak to, will but take these facts into consideration, he may win men to the gospel of love which Jesus taught, and to the service of God in ever increasing numbers. For our own part, we believe this outcry about the decay of preaching power is all nonsense, and we think it is too bad that it should be taken for granted by even the friends of Christianity. We hold that the intellectual range of the ministry is equal to that of any other profession whatever. What speaking profession produces a larger per centage of great orators? Is it the law? Are there no lawyers who fail in their profession for want of the power of expression? Is it in politics? We have a lively recollection of having had to listen to professed politicians whose bungling sentences and stammering utterances have kept us in a nervous twitter, where, at all events, a preacher would have spoke fluently, even if he had talked equal nonsense. The men of power, of great ability, are the exceptions in all professions, and the men of original thought are even more rare still. And what profession does so much for so little? What prizes are there in the various churches for men of great ability, if we put aside the few bishoprics in the Episcopal Church? The men who devote themselves to the ministry in the churches of our land must do so with no expectation of attaining anything for themselves or their sons beyond a bare livelihood. They have only the stimulus of high motives, of lofty disinterestedness in their work, and if anyone steps out of the usual line, and shows that he is animated by the same motives as those which animate the breasts of men who honestly and honourably devote themselves to other professions, he is denounced as one who has mistaken his vocation. We know there are compensations in the minister's life, but they are found not in outward gain, but in inward delight, in a life hid in God; but at the same time impossibilities ought not to be expected from any class of human beings. Encouragements are needed, not eternal fault-finding, which comes from ignoring more than half the facts concerned.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXIX.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

166. REV. JOSEPH HUNTER (1835-36).—A learned and distinguished antiquary and historian; descended from an old Presbyterian family named Sylvester, of whom he has given an interesting account—tracing them from ante-Reformation times—in a volume entitled "Gens Sylvestrina," privately printed in 1846. Born at Sheffield in 1783. At the age of five years adopted by the Presbyterian or Unitarian minister there, Mr. Evans, and his wife, who brought him up with more than parental care and affection. Educated for the Ministry at York College (1806-8); for more than twenty years minister of Trim-street Chapel, Bath. Author of "Hallamshire, the history and topography of the parish of Sheffield," folio, 1819; "The Hallamshire Glossary," 1829; "The Diary of Ralph Thoresby, F.R.S.," 1830; a volume "On English Monastic Libraries," 4to, 1831, &c., &c. In that year he was appointed Assistant Commissioner of Public Records, and thenceforth he devoted himself almost exclusively to antiquarian pursuits. Some of his numerous works are in Dr. Williams's Library. He died May, 1861, aged seventy-nine years. A full account of him, with a list of his works, appeared in the Sheffield Independent soon after his death. An engraved portrait was given him by one of his admirers, Sir Richard Hoare, as a frontispiece for one of his large volumes; a copy of that engraving was kindly contributed by his son, Henry Julian Hunter, Esq., M.D., of Bath, to the writer's collection of portraits now at the library.

167. SAMUEL PETT, ESQ. (1836-55).—A most amiable, kind, and estimable gentleman; for many years a member of Little Portland-street Chapel. He died 5th July, 1871, aged seventy-four years. He was a son of Samuel Pett, Esq., M.D., of Hackney, of whom there is a bust in Dr. Williams's Library.

168. JOHN TAYLOR, ESQ., F.R.S., F.G.S. (1836-63).—An eminent mining engineer. Descended on his mother's side from the Rev. John Meadows, one of the two thousand ministers ejected by the Act of Uniformity, and on his father's from the Rev. Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich; one of the earliest members of the Geological Society, and its treasurer from 1816 to 1844; one of the earliest and most active members of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and treasurer of the Association from 1832 to 1861; for many years treasurer of the London University College; author of numerous articles in scientific journals, chiefly connected with mining, geology, and mechanics. Mr. Taylor was held in high estimation by men of science: even Baron Alexander von Humboldt, who wrote so severely of others, expressed for him "a warm regard." He was equally distinguished for moral excellence and scrupulous integrity. At one time, when his reputation as a miner was at its height, "enormous offers were made to him from various quarters for the mere privilege of using his name, which was thought a sufficient guarantee for the soundness of a project. Shares upon which he could, without any dishonourable connivance and merely by dealing as others dealt, have realised a large fortune in a very short space of time, were pressed upon his acceptance (without the smallest condition attached to them) by men of credit and character. His reply was simple and decisive. 'I am an agent and cannot be a speculator.'" "Few men had more tempting opportunities of enriching themselves without going one line beyond what was permitted by law or even by the current morality of the world. He resisted them all." (See a paper printed but not published soon after his death.) He died 5th April, 1863, in his eighty-fourth year. A large photographic portrait of him was contributed to the collection above alluded to by his son-in-law, Philip Worsley, Esq.

169. REV. THOMAS WOOD (1836-41).—The first minister of the Effra-road Chapel, Brixton (1839-41).

170. BENJAMIN WOOD, ESQ., M.P. (1836-45).—Member of Parliament for Southwark. For many years a member of Jewin-street Chapel, first under Dr. Abraham Rees, and then under the Rev. D. Davison, until the chapel was closed in 1840. He was a younger brother of Sir Matthew Wood, Bart., M.P. (the father of the late Lord Chancellor Hatherley), who had also been a member of Jewin-street Chapel; a member of the Presbyterian Board from 1841 to the date of his death, 13th August, 1845. Both in and out of Parliament he took an active interest in the Dissenters' Chapels Bill.

171. REV. BENJAMIN MARDON, M.A. (1837-56).—"A learned and able defender of Unitarian Christianity." Born at Exeter; studied at Manchester College, York, and subsequently for three years at the University of Glasgow. Whilst still a student there he succeeded Mr. Yates as minister of Unitarian Chapel, an office which he held for nine years, when he removed to Maidstone (1825). In 1827 he succeeded Dr. Evans, author of "Sketches of Various Denominations," at the General Baptist Chapel in Worship-street. On Dr. Williams's Trust he was highly useful as one of the examiners for the scholarships, and on the book committee. In 1855 or 1856 he left London for Sidmouth, and died in April, 1866, in his seventy-fourth year. There is a bust of him at the Library.

THE London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says that at the next annual gathering of the Society of Friends, to be held about a month hence, a proposal will be made for a revision of the book of doctrine, practice, and discipline, with the view of modifying that work in accordance with the spirit of the age and the present tone of thought amongst the Quakers. It is nearly twenty years since the last revision was made.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—With changing temperatures the digestion becomes impaired, the liver disordered, and the mind despondent, unless the cause of the irregularity be expelled from the blood and body by such an alternative as these Pills. They directly attack the source of the evil, thrust out all impurities from the circulation, restore the distempered organs to their natural state, and correct all defective or contaminated secretions. Such an easy means of instituting health, strength, and cheerfulness should be applied by all whose stomachs are weak, whose minds are much harassed, or whose brains are overworked. Holloway's is essentially a blood tempering medicine, whereby its influence reaches the remotest fibre of the frame and effects a universal good.

Literary Notes.

THE translation of E. von Hartmann's "Philosophy of the Unconscious," on which Mr. W. O. Coupland has been engaged for the last three years, is expected to appear before the end of this year in the "English and Foreign Philosophical Library," published by Trübner and Co.

THE daily average of visitors to the National Gallery is stated at 4,609.

PROFESSOR W. W. GOODWIN, of Harvard, author of the well-known "Greek Grammar" and "Greek Moods and Tenses," has accepted the invitation of the Committee of the School at Athens of the Archaeological Institute of America to assume the directorship of the school for the first year.

THE volume which Mr. Murray announces of sermons on special occasions preached by the late Dean of Westminster in the Abbey will include the discourses occasioned by the deaths of Lord Palmerston, Charles Dickens, Canon Kingsley, the Princess Alice, Carlyle, Lord Beaconsfield, and others.

MR. J. M. HORSBURGH has been elected to the Librarianship of the London Institution from a large number of candidates. Mr. Horsburgh is senior master of modern subjects at Radley College.

PROFESSOR SCHUCHARDT, of the University of Graz, is engaged on a bibliography of the so-called Creole languages, the literature of which is much richer than is generally assumed. The volume will be produced with the assistance of the Imperial Royal Academy of Vienna.

SOME delay has arisen in the preparation and printing of the concluding portion of Professor Skeat's "Etymological Dictionary." The fourth part has been extended to more than three hundred pages, but the price of it will be the same as that of the preceding parts. The Academy believes that the date of publication is now definitely fixed for the first week in May.

THE interest in the sacred books of the East is spreading. We hear from Calcutta of a translation of the Koran into Bengali being published by Bhai Grish Chunder Sen. The Moulevis in Calcutta speak well of it, and vouch for the accuracy of the translation.

IT is stated that Mr. Freeman's American lectures are to be issued under the title of "The English People in their Three Homes," and "The Practical Bearings of General European History." They will be published by Messrs. Porter and Coates, of Philadelphia, under special arrangement with the author.

MR. MURRAY publishes "The Domestic and Artistic Life of John Singleton Copley, R.A.," by his granddaughter, Martha Babcock Amory.

A short and interesting "Life of Dean Stanley" has been published in Holland by Dr. Rovers. It forms part of the well-known series "Mannen van Betekenis," edited by N. C. Balsem, of Haarlem.

MR. REGINALD LANE POOLE has undertaken to edit for the Wyclif Society the treatise "De Dominio Civili" being Books III., IV., and V. of Wyclif's "Summa Theologiae."

A BENGALI version of Sir Theodore Martin's "Life of the Prince Consort" is, it is stated, about to be published in Calcutta with a dedication, by permission, to the Governor-General by Mr. Gopal Chandara Mushkhopadhyaya, better known in India and in this country as Mukerjee.

SIR ALFRED LYALL has in the press a volume of "Asiatic Studies, Religious and Social." The subjects treated are the following:—Religion of an Indian Province, Origin of Divine Myths in India, Influence upon some Religious Beliefs of a rise in Morality, Witchcraft, and non-Christian Religions, Missionary and non-Missionary Religions, Relations between the State and Religion in China, Formation of Clans and Castes, Rajput States in India, Islam in India, Our Religious Policy in India, Religious Situation in India.

ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.—On Thursday the deputation from the body of English Presbyterian Ministers in and near the cities of London and Westminster, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Martineau, the Rev. C. Wicksteed, the Rev. Dr. Sadler, the Rev. C. Howe, the Rev. J. R. McKee, the Rev. T. Hunter, the Rev. J. P. Ham, and the Rev. R. C. Jones, were introduced by the Lord Chamberlain, and the Rev. Dr. Martineau presented their address. Her Majesty received the address and returned a gracious answer. The Rev. Dr. Martineau, the Rev. Dr. Sadler, and the Rev. J. P. Ham were then severally presented to Her Majesty.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND KINDRED CHURCHES.

The National Conference of "Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or kindred congregations," was opened at Liverpool on Tuesday evening. A communion service was conducted by the Rev. WM. GASKELL, M.A., in Hope-street Church, which was completely filled, many having to stand. At least 600 persons were present, nearly all of whom were communicants. A most impressive address was delivered by Mr. Gaskell, and in the course of the service two appropriate hymns were sung, one by A. A. Livermore, "A holy air is breathing round," the other by William Gaskell, "Father! faithful may we be." Mr. Gaskell was assisted by the Revs. J. C. Street, C. J. Perry, J. Wright, and G. St. Clair, and the scene was one of unusual solemnity and impressiveness.

At half-past seven a religious service was held in the beautiful and spacious Philharmonic Hall, immediately adjoining the church. More than 2,000 persons were present, including ministers and members of other Churches in Liverpool. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, of Leicester, chairman of the school-board of that town. The lessons were Psalm cxlvii. and Ephesians iv.

THE SERMON.

The Rev. Charles Beard, B.A., of Liverpool, preached the sermon. The reverend gentleman chose as his subject "The Life of the Children of God," and selected as his text the 9th, 11th, and 12th verses of the 1st chapter of John:—"That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. . . He came unto his own and his own received him not. But as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God."

He said that comparative theology was a new and fascinating—and perhaps to the common apprehension a dangerous—science. Yet he dared venture to predict that the older it grew the more it would be able to sum up its results in the familiar words, "That was the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." But there was a sense in which it was true to say that comparative theology could never have for us more than a theatrical interest. In our religion, more than in anything else, we were the children of our circumstances, our age, our race. To be universal here was above our powers. We must pray in language that was familiar to us. We must find our way to the sanctuary by well-worn paths. It was, he thought, the strangest thing in history that we, arians as we were—children of the world's conquering race, whose history comprised the history of modern literature, science, art, invention, colonisation, and politics, should yet have gone to the Semite to learn the secret of faith; and, for the sake of the carpenter's son of Nazareth, should have cast away all the gay charm of Hellas, all the grave majesty of Rome, and all the gloomy grandeur of the Scandinavian Valhalla. But he did not say that this fascination faded, whilst even those who professed to be weary of Christ, and to have found a better leader for humanity were easily detected in thinking his thoughts, and repeating his words, as it were, in their own despite. So both theoretically and practically they must approach the life of the children of God by this path of access. That there were others they not only did not deny, but solemnly and joyfully affirmed; but this was the nearest, the dearest, the most familiar to us. It had been trodden by saints and martyrs innumerable; it was that in which our own infant feet were trained to walk by those who have passed beyond it to climb the golden stairs. It was that upon which old and tender associations met them on either side and voices of encouragement helped them onwards. They were at home with Christ, they had loved him all their lives, the attitude of affectionate admiration was familiar to them, and to their consciences he spoke as never man spoke; and though they knew all that could be told them by confident science and still more confident speculations of the inconceivable awfulness of God, they had lisped their "Abba, father," into the great places of the universe and their prayer had come back to them in strength and peace and joy. But if the religious life referred to be confined within the lines of any precise definition the specifically Christian life was at the same time one and many; the saints were all of one brotherhood, the very ground of saintliness lay in that which no church could monopolise. To ask whether the New Testament was Protestant or Catholic was, except to eager controversialists, a question without meaning. Children of God all spoke one language, and to those who comprehended it, their's was a dialect which went straight to the heart. But while all this was undoubtedly happily true, pieties had a local colour of their own. The Catholic saint lived in a world apart from which the common temptations of existence were jealously shut out, and its ordinary affections and workaday duties were banished. Was this conception too mechanical? Did it lack grace and spontaneity in their eyes? Let them forget this, and think how swift and strong and victorious it was; how it triumphed over weakness of the flesh and trampled fear under foot when hard duty was to be done. Then there was the evangelical type of piety which was the recognition of the great fact that human nature could be regenerated and purified only in the force of a mighty affection or was perpetually recreating its strength at the fountain of the love of Christ. Did they complain that at its best this form of Christian piety contained an element of narrowness and mistook a part for the whole, that it, too, like Catholic saintliness, turned its back too much upon the world and aimed too much at sanctifying life by separation. It might be so; but let them recollect what life and fire it retained almost at its worst, and how it touched and moulded spirits dull to every other charm. Each of these types was illustrated by saints innumerable; but he went much further than this, he claimed that the true children of God were always to be known, not by the name they bore, but by the star upon their foreheads, and the virtue which went out of them as they tarried among men.

Did they ask how much or how little belief of the intellectual kind would serve as soil in which religious life might grow? He could not tell. He only knew that he could not mistake the growth when he saw it. To be faithful to one's better self, to lift life as high as it would go, to bow in trembling reverence before the infinite and eternal—this was true allegiance to the "light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, and the unmistakable mark of the divine sonship.—This life he would next point out was an end in itself; there could be none higher, for it was a life with God, and in God, and for God. All spiritual theories of salvation agreed in this, whatever its effect on the soul hereafter it was liberation and strength and rejoicing now. Men called on their imaginations to paint for them against final assize, in which, according to human precedents, actions would be estimated and weighed with an outlook to future judgment; but all the while the soul had a life with a vitality that was quickened or faded away, capable of rejuvenescence, capable too—dare he say it?—of eternal death. That our souls should live was the essential thing. This life was something more than a moral life, no matter how genuine and strong that might be. They had emancipated themselves, he trusted, from the delusion that there could be no morals but such as religion taught and sanctioned. Whilst morality was in itself not necessarily more than earthly, and would be the same had human life absolutely no point of contact with the infinite and eternal, the ethics which were quickened by religion could not lose the infinite and eternal out of view. If humanity was to go forward, it would not be in the strength of calm calculation or with the wisdom of deliberate policy, but because there were found men and women who were wise with a divine folly, who would work for God and suffer for Christ, and even lose life to win a victory for righteousness. This life was so natural to man as to be almost independent of theological belief, so that what one who truly aspired after it need ask was not, "can it be produced in other churches?" or "in what Church does it grow with most luxurious beauty," but only "Is it possible for me?" And here he was forced back upon the necessary individuality of preaching—that it was not the official message of a Church, but the utterance of a single soul. He must speak for himself alone, and what reply could he give to the question but one? The Christian Church that did not produce the specifically Christian life was self-condemned, no matter how critically correct its comprehension of theological truth—no matter how cordial its alliance with advancing knowledge—no matter even how firm its grasp upon every-day moralities, or how steady its efforts for human welfare. The piety of the future, he did not shrink from saying, must become less ecclesiastical and more worldly. It must venture forth from the incense-laden atmosphere of the cathedral into the fresher air that blew about the common haunts of men. He did not say it must be less biblical, but it must learn to distinguish more accurately between that which was only local and temporary and the universal and eternal. However firmly they might be convinced that the religious life was in its essence one, simple, unchangeable, they must also recognise the fact that the human mind could not go on from century to century heaping up knowledge, widening its outlook upon nature, reading in the great book of cosmic fact the unerring record of God's will, without incurring the necessity of change in the form of piety. As men grew older, and looked out upon the universe with nature's eyes, God became greater, more transcendental, less conceivable, and true piety shrank with a deeper reluctance from the attempt to divine Him. He (the preacher) took neither the negative nor the positive side in the controversy as to God's personality, for either seemed to him to be an equal offence against His essential incomprehensibility. He was content to wonder and admire. He thought the time was coming when even such worship would be less precise than it was. They would come back to the brevity and simplicity of prayer which Christ enjoined, but which the Christian world had so un-animously cast aside. He thought there could be few listening to him who needed any exhortation to take their religion boldly into their hands, and to carry it into the whole of life. He did not say that they did their duty to the great ideal of the kingdom of God, but at least they knew what that duty was. And perhaps it was almost a danger that they could so keep alive to the necessity of being, in their religious capacity, on good terms with science and philosophy. Not that that was not needful, not that it might not be too much neglected by some Christian people; not that it was not well that facts of every kind should be fairly faced, and faith made, if possible, to square with them—but because, after all, neither science, nor philosophy, nor theology was religion, and religion was that for which a Christian Church existed. What was chiefly demanded of those who had the responsibility of preaching was the feeding of hungry souls. In concluding, he said, Lift up your hearts and take courage. We know the God in whom we have believed. We know the Master in whose steps we try to follow. We know the far-off goal to which humanity surely tends. We know the duty which imperatively demands our hand and heart. All that remains is that we be faithful. Let us forget, if we can, our futile intellectual pride, and while we humbly rejoice in the light that is given to us, remember that many diverse beams go to make up the pure and perfect audience of the day. Let us get the better of our unwillingness to speak of the hopes and beliefs that in every deed lie close to our hearts, and in simple and serious words declare, on all fitting occasions, the pieties which mould and govern us. Let us endeavour so to enter into the spirit of Christ as to be able to put away our personal weaknesses, and pretensions, and vanities, forgetting ourselves in the greatness of our work, and being content with any task in the vineyard, however arduous, however humble, when we can do grand service. Let us be careful, only of the quality of our work, that it be thorough, genuine, simple-hearted, the best that is in us, the best that can come out of us. And, above all, let us leave success to God, who is a just taskmaster, and at nightfall pays every labourer his rightful hire. Churches come and go; creeds are formulated and forgotten; but the heart of man still ponders the mystery of life, and hands are always being lifted up to the Eternal. And if only we are faithful witnesses for God, who hath neither beginning nor end, for Christ, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever"—if only now and then we can stay a fainting soul, or refresh a weary will, and to the last quit ourselves like men in the ever-raging battle of duty, what more do we need? For then "the Lord will be to us our everlasting light, and our God our glory."

WEDNESDAY.

The National Conference of ministers and representatives from the Unitarian and other Free Churches of the United Kingdom was resumed in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, on Wednesday. In the first instance a devotional service was held in Renshaw-street Chapel, conducted by the Revs. J. PAGE HOPPS, W. CAREY WALTERS, T. W. FRECKLETON, and A. N. BLATCHFORD, B.A., which was well attended.

The Conference proper opened shortly after ten A.M., the body of the Hope-street Church being completely filled with delegates, including a considerable number of ladies.

On the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, seconded by Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON (Leeds), Mr. JAMES HEYWOOD, M.A., F.R.S., was appointed chairman of the Conference; and on the motion of the Rev. J. WRIGHT, seconded by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, the gentlemen who had made the preliminary arrangements were appointed the Committee and Secretaries to conduct the business of the Conference.

After a hymn had been sung, and after the offering of prayer by the Rev. ALFRED PAYNE,

The CHAIRMAN introduced the business of the Conference by reminding those present of the discussion which took place in Liverpool in the years 1839 and 40, since which time great progress had been made by the Unitarian Churches, particularly in Lancashire. They had been much helped, too, by the progress of science. Sir Charles and Lady Lyell were steady attendants at Mr. Martineau's chapel, and this no doubt had been a great encouragement to persons holding Unitarian views. The discoveries of Darwin in regard to evolution, the publication of Bishop Colenso's views as to the Pentateuch, and the efforts of Dr. Davidson to show that many books of the New Testament were written in the second century after Christ, and that they did not convey the views of the apostles, but of persons living nearly a century after them, had also had an important effect in the same direction. He was glad to find that the text about the three heavenly witnesses had been left out of the revised translation, recently published, the story being felt, no doubt, by the revisers to be entirely untenable—(hear and cheers). With regard to their views of the Deity and the attitude of science, he had been much interested in reading a passage of Schiller, which seemed to meet and to harmonise the nine recent theories in all classes of science, and at the same time to illustrate their holy and serious meaning:—"While man's will wavers, and in eternal movement all things circle round, one tranquil spirit remains firm in the midst of the movement, the lofty living mind soaring high o'er time and space, one God, one holy loving will"—(applause). In conclusion, the Chairman alluded with pleasure to the progress and development of Free Christian principles in Lancashire. At one time there was no Unitarian congregation in the north-eastern portion of the country, but now congregations had been established at Burnley, Accrington, Padiham, and other places, and in Liverpool and Manchester new congregations were springing up, while the old ones were increasing and not waning in their power.

Mr. HERBERT NEW and the Rev. C. C. COE, F.G.S., then read papers respectively on the "Development of the Religious Life Within our Churches."

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE RELIGIOUS LIFE WITHIN OUR CHURCHES.

BY MR. HERBERT NEW.

We are met together for religious fellowship and conference; and the topic first submitted to our consideration is "The Development of the Religious Life within our Churches."

The promoters of our Conference, in placing this topic in my hands, may have supposed that from amidst the engagements and cares of an active life, variously employed, some practical words might be uttered of interest to our Churches. If I fail in the attempt to utter them, it will be for want of ability, and not for want of opportunities of observation. Even in our smaller congregations, unchanging in the number of their worshippers for half a century, changes of motive or of opinion must have occurred which give the means of gaining some insight into the condition and prospects of our religious associations as centres of spiritual life. I therefore regard the topic under our notice as interesting to every single community, as well as to the representatives of our several communities in Congress.

I propose, within the limits of time assigned to me, to speak of the nature of the religious life, its connection with our ordinary social life, the necessity of guarding it from discouragement or offence, the danger of Ritualism, the advantage of a closer sympathy with our Dissenting brethren, the importance of prayer, and the effect of the modern ideas of the future state in throwing us upon a fuller life in God.

The title of this essay implies a confession of deficiency, and an acknowledgment of need.

But, in deprecating any feeling of complacency, we do not deny the existence of the religious life in our Churches. We seek only to discover how we may enlarge and extend it.

For the purposes of this essay, I should wish to start with a statement of what I understand to be meant by the religious life; not expecting to give an exhaustive definition, although a definition might be found in theological or philosophical treatises. The existence of the religious life in a Church may be, and often is, almost unconscious; and in such a case an attempt to ascertain its quality or quantity would be vain if not mischievous. But gathered together as are the members and friends of this congress from many separated and distinct communities, the inquiry addresses itself to a general experience, and will not meddle with the internal condition of any single congregation.

The religious life with which we have to do is common to all men, and to all bodies of worshippers, whether habitually assembling as the members of a settled congregation, or gathered together on some special occasion, or under the impulse of some social or national catastrophe. This common religious life is universal; for as "the true light lighteth every man coming into the world," so every man is capable of receiving that light, and of being perpetually illuminated and led by it. The seat of the religious life is in the soul, and the sphere of its activity is in the relations of the soul to God, to our fellow-worshippers, and to our brethren both within and without the sanctuary of worship. It is the life of God in the soul; not merely the life of the soul, which may be emotional or æsthetic without being religious; but that higher or spiritual life which is awakened in the soul by the operation of the Spirit of God. It begins in the emotions, it strengthens and directs the forces of the will, and finally possesses the heart, the mind, and the soul at once and altogether. Humility and penitence, love and reverence, aspiration, resolution, self-surrender, faith, hope, and Godly love or charity are the elements and the results of the development of the religious life.

In the extreme manifestations and forms of the religious life, it would seem to be abnormal and special; so far removed are human beings from one another in this respect. The saintly character impresses the man of the world as exceptional and unreal, and even sometimes arouses in him a feeling of repulsion; but the same character melts the heart of the child and subdues the passions of the criminal. Had not these extremes an obvious relation to one another, we might divide off and separate the saint from the other children of humanity. But this cannot be; they are complementary, and mutually related as givers and receivers. The religious life which has no relation to our fellow-men is not worthy of the name. Unless it shines forth and warm our neighbour, it is no divine plane of the altar of God.

"Heaven does with us as we with torches do;
Not light them for ourselves; for if our virtues
Did not go forth of us, 'twere all alike
As if we had them not."

Moreover, the saintly character is not the product of any particular age or of any particular religious system. It belongs to humanity. There is a divine economy in its supply and administration. It is God's method of illuminating the souls of men. It is more than a method of instruction. The noble souls whom we love and reverence as the children of God are not the mere utterers of precept. We treasure not their words only, but their persons and their memory, which are an inalienable treasure, having an influence over us long after they themselves have gone from our sight.

My fundamental proposition, then, is—that the development of the religious life is practically within the range of our ordinary social life, and should keep its place and be cherished there. The unit of the Church is the religious soul. However mean his station, however inconspicuous his presence, and even though he utter no word of exhortation and make no public profession of faith, the ordinary life of the truly religious man is serviceable to the Church. In simple piety he lives amongst his fellow-worshippers like one of those little ones whose angels do always behold the face of the Father in Heaven; and of him it is easier to say, than of many prominent members of the Church, "of such is the kingdom of Heaven." Let any one cast back a gaze over half-a-century of the unrecorded history of the Christian society in which he has been nurtured, and "not many wise, not many mighty," will rise in his memory as the witnesses of the faith; but he will recall not a few "weak ones," whose simple piety he associates with the religious life of the Church, and whose silent influence has unconsciously moulded his own character. Our Unitarian position too often tends to impair the growth of our religious life, by reason of our constant obligation to stand in the forefront of the battle of doctrinal controversy; and we become like a besieged city, having an active garrison and starved inhabitants. Busied with this "carnal warfare" of words, this often necessary conflict with Orthodoxy—the weapons of the inward conflict—the armour of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit have been less familiar to our hands. And yet do we not know how to use them? We know, too, that spiritual victories are won by those who turn the other cheek to the smiter; for this is no strange precept to many of our people who bear the reproach of Christ with their simple faith and go on in their way rejoicing.

If the growth of the religious life is practically within the range of our ordinary social life, we must guard it against discouragement and offence. This is tender ground to touch upon; and my appeal must be made in very general terms. First, I commend to all a tender regard for the religious nature in all men. We believe in it theoretically as firmly as any of the Churches; and yet there are reasons why we should ask ourselves what are the obstacles which repel many religious persons from our communion; what are the causes of offence, or our own defects, which drive some of our people out of it? Our intellectual sufficiency is repulsive to those who are outside of us. In our assumption of superior knowledge and freedom from prejudice, we are apt to break the bruised reed and to quench the smoking flax, and to drive away many who would like to come to us for help in their difficulties about religion. And the reason why we do this is, because we allow the intellect to overmaster and stifle the religious life in ourselves. The affirmations on which we rely would serve us better if we did not so hastily press our negations into view. The former are our strength; the latter our weakness. If we were less confident in that which is not our strength we might leave more room for the testimony of life and character. "Let your light shine before men" is the first Gospel precept. It is not a call to controversy, but it is the moral foundation of social religion.

Our religious indifference, amounting often to coldness, has a repelling effect upon many, who, though brought up amongst us, yet long for religious sympathy and the exercise of a warmer devotion. In this respect we are apt to offend the little ones in our midst. If our simpler and purer faith be precious to us, why does it not bear more fruit in ourselves, and why does it chill the growth of religion in others? I am aware that some efforts are being made to remedy this defect; but what kind of efforts? Too often merely external ones. We cannot gain much, and we may lose a great deal by the mere imitation of those things which we see in the popular Churches. Let us glance for a moment at what is called "the Church." The Establishment, or the Episcopal Church, as it has been variously called—names alike expressive of its character as essentially opposite to our congregational religion and polity—has during the last fifty years largely increased. By the labours of a devoted and active priesthood the Church of England has become a centre of attraction, both religious and social, and has therefore exercised no little influence upon other religious communions. In view of this attractiveness, have we been wise in our imitation of its architecture and its ritual? I think not. We have, in effect, smoothed the path along which more go from us than come to us. The Unitarian Churches are not singular in this imitation; nor do I suppose that other Dissenting Churches do not suffer from it. But I believe that this mistaken imitation is more fatal in our case, because of that religious indifference, already mentioned, which affirms that all forms of religion are alike in the eyes of rational and liberal men.

I have referred to "other Dissenting Churches"; and I rejoice to know that in this Conference some representatives of their communions are joined with us. I give them a welcome; and I venture to say that I have larger hopes of the increase of the religious life in our Churches from intercourse with them than from any advances we may make towards an outward imitation of the Church, of whose attractive ritual I have already spoken. Let us not forget, too, that a graceful ritualistic cultus is the most comfortable cloak for indifference and unbelief. It would, therefore, cause no feeling of jealousy in my mind to see those who find our fellowship too cold going to worship with our Congregational brethren. Our religious life would be increased if we were in fuller harmony with the Dissenting Churches of all denominations. I think there are common grounds of sympathy. It is obvious that associations or alliances of this kind cannot be forced or extemporized; but I know, from experience, of instances in which such religious communion has been realized. Single and even rare instances are more valuable than may be supposed. And may I not refer to special occasions of impulses aroused by social or national catastrophes? Sometimes the heart of the whole nation is deeply stirred, and a common aspiration of prayer goes forth from the hearts of all people as from one assembly. When devotion is thus excited, it melts all souls together before God, in spite of differences of creed and communion. In isolation and indifference the heart waxes gross, and we can no longer see with our eyes or hear with our ears, but remain alien and unconverted. A sound national spirit cannot exist where religious life in societies and churches is wanting.

I now venture upon the consideration of a source of religious life which, although it is the principal source, is most difficult to deal with as a practical question. Prayer is a fact which lies at the basis of the religious life; and all must have some knowledge and experience of the emotions and acts in which prayer is concerned. Gratitude and submission, humility and aspiration, the uttered word and the answering presence, the longing soul and the given peace, the cry of weakness and the coming of strength, the sob of penitence and the answering comfort, the search for truth and the glad discovery, the sense of need and the whisper of sufficiency, the prayer for strength and the coming of power, the cry of the child and the voice of the Father, the thirst after God and the supply of refreshment, the ascent after God and His descent into man; if these are but figures of speech and flowers of rhetoric, the topic of prayer has no place in this paper. But if they are words of truth and soberness, then I need no argument to bring the subject before you as one of vital importance in our inquiries into the development of the religious life of our Churches. Prayer must be employed in our work, and made more and more a fact in our worship. Let us not say that prayer is to be relegated to the dropped superstitions of past ages, or that physical discoveries have left no room for intercourse between man and God. With the sphere of nature indefinitely extended both above and beneath us, in the universe and in the atom, are we to be driven from the recognition of the infinite as one of the divine attributes, and to be deprived of the presence of God around and within us? No changes in our knowledge which it is possible to conceive can rob man of his spiritual nature, or take him out of those conditions in which he lives and moves consciously as a child of God. Let me hope that this Conference will give forth a certain sound in its advice to the Churches on this subject. While preparing this paper I have received from a minister of long experience a letter, in which are these words:—"It also occurs to me that one of our great wants is the devoutness of prayer; not, indeed, the use of liturgies, which I cannot bind my nature to, but the free-spoken burdens, desires, and longings of the present hour, expressed in simple and earnest language chosen in our moments of conscious experience. This I should like to see in Sunday-schools, our chapels, and all our meetings of an ecclesiastical character; also on the part of our laymen as well as by our ministers."

I quote these words as opportune; but I do not wish to raise the question between free prayer and liturgical uses, as this every worshiping assembly must settle for itself. I wish, however, to lay down clearly my conviction that to neglect prayer is fatal to religious life in ourselves and in our Churches. There is abundant evidence of the vitality of prayer. It is not disappearing from our literature. A noble preacher of righteousness, lately gone from amongst us, whose public discourses were not seldom leavened with humour or pointed with satire, one who knew well the age in which he lived, and did not undervalue its science and material prosperity—I mean the late George Dawson—has left as his most precious legacy to the world a volume of prayers worthy to be ranked with our oldest litanies, a testimony to the vitality and power of prayer as the basis and strength of the religious life in the closet and in the sanctuary.

Permit me one more testimony. Another minister, a friend who is kept away from our Conference by illness, writes thus:—"One main point that I should insist upon is this—that the unadoring irreverent man is false to the facts of the case. I have sometimes heard Unitarian people urge the advisability of reverence, adoration, because, as they say, it is what we lack, and the other Christian communities have; and because it is so imposing, and graceful, and soothing, and so on. But the matter, of course, goes much deeper. The adoring man, the reverent man, is not merely a man who has a sense of grace in life, a sense of the poetical side of things; but he is a man who is aware, to a certain extent, of the facts of the case, who is aware of the infinite power and beauty which beset him."

My last topic deals with modern changes in our views of a future life. These have a relaxing tendency, as all changes in religious doctrine necessarily have. But the relaxation is the opportunity for a wise substitution of better things. The discrediting of an everlasting Hell, and the discovery that the wrath of God is not the triumph of evil, are tidings of great joy; but if we regard them merely as an addition to our negations, and if they bring us no nearer to God, nor engage us more earnestly in his service, they are no tidings of joy at all. For, strange to say, with these relaxations, a worse evil arises to threaten us. No sooner are we relieved of fears—once wholesome to the devout puritan of a past age—than we are confronted by the phantoms of Agnosticism and Pessimism, which threaten to destroy the religious life altogether, or to corrupt it into that hatred of all religion—more freely expressed in a neighbouring country than in our own—which is the very spirit of evil working in the hearts of men. How shall we be delivered from these? By no new device that I know of; but only by a return to the old way. The religious life in God, as expressed in the words of the Hebrew Psalmists and Prophets, and as displayed in its perfection in the person and life of Jesus Christ, is as much a reality for us to-day as it ever was to the men of old and to the fathers of our Churches whose memory and words we cherish. The ancient Hebrews regarded God as a reality, whose everlastingness belonged to His nature and existence—not to theirs. In Christ we are called to be partakers of the Divine nature; and an inner life is manifested to us, which is described as the life which is hid with Christ in God. Here, then, is our larger hope, our larger trust. Here is the ground of the life of our Churches. By more frequent communion in work and worship, by the recognition of the possibilities of a higher life in all men, and by a jealous and tender regard for it in those around us, in the poor and humble, in the child and the outcast, we shall do more to increase it in our own Churches than by any other means that I know of. And for the future, let us trust the Giver of life in this life, that we may be in His hands and His disposal, who alone is from everlasting to everlasting, and who alone hath immortality.

Asks thou endless life, O mortal man,
Fearing thy little self should cease to be!
Which of the threads that make the sum of thee
Would'st thou draw out to an eternal span,
Inseparate, essential, in the plan
And purposes august of Deity?
Thy might, thy meanness, each too poor a plea,
Too weak alike a deathless flame to fan.
In God alone thou livest; His the power
That starts, sustains, or can thy life prolong;

He is the source, the goal, and He the road;
In love of Him begins the eternal hour,
The endless praise, the everlasting song,
The absolute life that's hid with Christ in God.

BY THE REV. C. C. COE, F.G.S. F.R.G.S.

In discussing "The Development of the Religious Life within our Churches" we make two important assumptions. We imply that the free congregations here represented have, one and all, a corporate life, which entitles them to be called "churches;" and that the main object of their existence is to promote the religious experience of individual members through the religious life of the community; that, in short, no amount of social and philanthropic activity can be accepted as a substitute for the exercise of this distinctive function.

In order to cherish the spiritual life of our churches we should aim, in the first place, to give religion the prominent position which it once occupied, as a sentiment calling to the highest service and involving the most momentous issues. That there is some need of this effort will be seen at once, if we consider the definitions which are given of that term. I am conscious of being sometimes slow to take a joke, but I suppose that men do not mean to be facetious when they say that at least half of their religious faith consists in paying twenty shillings in the pound; or when they assert that it is possible to develop a religious life without burdening the mind with a belief in God. But for myself, I must confess that these two articles of faith, whether you take them separately or in conjunction, this habit of accurate book-keeping and this spirit of vague reverence, do not constitute my full conception of religion. Religion consists of conscious life in God: a felt communion with the Great Being who is our Heavenly Father. If that is so, then it follows that children should be educated to live in communion with God, and not learn to affirm or deny certain propositions about Him. If that is so, there can be no religion, properly speaking, without God. Cosmic emotion may tend to produce a spirit of reverence; but the vague awe of its worship must be something very different from the felt communion of the child with its Heavenly Father.

The sentiment of religion should also be brought into closest relationship with our moral nature. We should see that there can be no better way of showing our love to God than by doing his will; no stronger motive for doing his will than the filial love we bear towards him. At the present time it is of the utmost importance that we should have a clear notion—a notion which shall not only be clear, but which shall also correspond with the facts of the case—as to the relation which subsists between morality and religion. If the Bible were a plenary inspired book, it would then contain a moral law whose guidance ought to be followed in every detail; but this is a position which few would venture to maintain at the present time. For example, we should hardly care with the Russian Jew to adopt the principle of international policy embodied in Deuteronomy xiv. 21. "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien; for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God."

Those who admit that the conscience varies in different men, and changes in the individual, so that it is capable of being educated and liable to be degraded, can scarcely maintain that it is an infallible guide, or that, in the mere matter of judgment, it should prevail if brought into contact with what was really known to be the will of God. In these days we can fall back neither upon Infallible Book nor Infallible Conscience as the Word of God. Is Morality, therefore, to be divorced from Religion? Surely not, if we will only learn from experience, which teaches us that we are living under the moral providence of God, who leaves us to discover moral truth for ourselves; who takes care that the moral ideas of men are widened and purified by the "process of the suns," and who is bringing us by the varied discipline of existence something nearer to that perfect life which is to be the issue of all our efforts, the answer of all our prayers.

Take this view, and the connection between religion and morality must needs be indissoluble—so long as we believe in God.

Religion has often suffered, in my opinion, through the neglect of the immortal hope. The eternal life has been defined as communion with God and Christ: as a qualitative rather than a quantitative life. I should be sorry to say one word against so sublime an idea; but it carries within it the promise of something more than a temporary relationship. Life in God is communion with an Eternal Being, and the tie is an eternal one. If so, why should we not make the fullest use of this comfort, in the hour of sorrow, of this strength in the season of temptation. The prospect of the future ought to have but one effect, to ennoble and to sanctify the actual present.

In the second place, the spiritual life of the churches will be largely developed, if each individual member believes that religion is a matter of personal importance to himself. There is great room at present for this sort of persuasion. The upper and middle classes sometimes seem to consider that religion is mainly adapted to meet the wants of the poor. It is candidly asserted that the political world is much obliged to the zealous teacher of religion, because, through the lavish promise of future glory, the oppressed classes endure with patience the afflictions of the present.

On the other hand, the poor seem to regard religion as one of the luxuries, though not perhaps a very expensive luxury, of the rich; so that the place of worship is known not as the certain House of God and possible Gate of Heaven, but as Mr. Smith's chapel—where attendance implies an indirect worship of Mr. Smith.

Religion is supposed by some to be the special business of a priesthood; so that if a man pays something towards the salary of an exceptionally pious parson—who is often paid in inverse ratio to his piety—it would be quite as good as being pious oneself. On the other hand, there are some who go the length of saying that religion is the vital concern of everybody else but the parson; and it is Ruskin, I think, who compares the clergyman dilating on the future life to the innkeeper praising the beautiful scenery in his neighbourhood, not that he has ever seen it himself or cares anything about it, save in so far as it brings him customers. I am told that a traveller asked a native the other day what they called a finger post in those parts. We call it a parson! Why? Because he points the road, but does not journey on it himself! Coming to a post without any fingers, and what do you call that? says the traveller. We call that a Bishop, because he neither journeys on the road nor even points the way!

There are some people who think that they can elude the claims of religion, so far as they are personally concerned, by saying that they have no taste for religion, just as a man might say that he did not care for olives or had no gift for music. Is that a valid excuse? Will that secure indemnity from the consequences of neglect? If the old-fashioned notion be true, that we owe a duty to God as well as to other people, then it is no excuse to say that we have no taste for duty. If it be true that the religious sentiment is the crown and glory of the composite nature of man, then it is a poor sort of complacency which somewhat exultantly boasts of the absence of such a gift. Moreover, spiritual consequences will follow whether you have a taste for them or not. If you fall over a cliff, the law of gravitation is not arrested because you have chosen to pronounce that you have no taste for Natural Philosophy.

In the third place, it is necessary that he who is convinced of the importance of religion to each individual should be ready to recognise the fact that it is possible for one human soul to help another in its onward and upward path. It seems to me to be one of the most obvious phenomena of our spiritual experience that the individual soul would often fail to come to the knowledge of God if it were not for such help; and yet we often talk as if we were independent of such assistance altogether. The fear of priestcraft has perhaps done as much harm in the world as priestcraft itself, since it has prevented people from availing themselves of those aids to devotion which one soul can render to another.

There is another sentiment which does much to hinder the spiritual life of our Churches. It is the feeling that religious aspiration is too solemn a thing to speak about to a fellow creature. The sentiment is well expressed by Clough in one of his poems:—

O let me love my God unto myself alone,
And know my knowledge to the world unknown;
No witness to my vision call,
Beholding, unbeheld of all.
And worship Thee, with Thee withdrawn apart
Within the closest veil of mine own inmost thought.

Within the most abstracted 'st shrine
Of my least breathed-on thought.

Julian Hawthorne has shown us in his "Garth" how this sentiment militates against the idea of public worship:—"Garth's notions of worship having always been associated with privacy, he was at first somewhat abashed by the openness of everything. How could he be expected to unfold his heart to the Lord with fifty or sixty people looking on? Just as he had made up his mind that the place he was then in must be a sort of ante-chamber, whence he would possibly be admitted to some hallowed inner tabernacle, the white-headed pastor arose tower-like in the pulpit, and, to Garth's amazement, began to rumble forth a prayer. Glancing hastily around, he saw that the congregation had hidden its face in its hands—a gesture which he attributed to their shame at the poor minister's irreverent conduct. No one interfered to stop him, however, and the prayer went on, Garth blushing anew at each fresh invocation. This ordeal over, a short pause ensued, and the neophyte observed a general coughing, rustling, and brandishing of handkerchiefs—efforts, no doubt, being made on the part of the scandalised hearers to recover their equanimity. But now the hoary offender rose again—to all appearance still unabashed—and proceeded to read a hymn.

It will scarcely be credited, but the assemblage, instead of signifying their disapproval by a unanimous sigh or even by an eloquent silence, rose with one accord to their feet and sang aloud to the accompaniment of music the very words that Parson Graeme had just read. After this Garth began to feel in how bad a place he had fallen. He was solitary in the midst of a callous and unsympathetic crowd, and had the pain of being at odds with them without the power of believing himself in the wrong." And yet, if any reliance is to be placed upon an almost universal sentiment, he was wrong. There is a place for human sympathy in connection with divine aspiration. I doubt not that the little child prays all the more earnestly when it feels the pressure of a mother's arm or the clasp of a father's hand. I doubt not that the parent's heart is warmed by the thought that the prayer of his child mingles with his own. The heart of many a hard worked son of toil has throbbed responsively to those words of Longfellow's in his "Village Blacksmith":—

He hears the parson pray and preach;
He hears his daughter's voice
Singing in the village choir,
And it makes his heart rejoice.

It sounds to him like her mother's voice,
Singing in Paradise;
He needs must think of her once more,
How in the grave she lies;
And with his hard rough hand he wipes
A tear out of his eyes.

The sphere of the human affections is the temple of common worship, within which, and reached through which most frequently, is that Holy of Holies wherein the soul stands solitary and communes with its God alone.

Conceive, then, what the development of the religious life might be, if the principles which have been advocated were fully carried out. Born into a religious atmosphere—taught from the first by inherited instinct and by tender careful culture, to exercise the functions of the religious life—the child learns to unfold the aspirations of its spiritual nature to the same extent that its other faculties are developed. Wherever he goes "he walks with God," like Enoch of old. Always he retains that feeling of early child love which makes it pleasant to be in the same room with father or mother. He, too, is glad to know that he lives in the same world with God—that he can cast an upward glance of love and feel a ready response, since aspiration brings its instant inspiration. To him there is no duty which is not a divine service—which is not quickened by the thought that God is well-pleased with faithful devotion. The father and the mother know that the home life is the type of the religious life, and are careful so to act that it is not a bitter mockery to call God our Father and our Mother too; and to picture the abode of our immortal spirits as a heavenly home. The man of science feels that in each well-proved hypothesis he is only thinking the thoughts of God; the less instructed admirer of Nature sees in every object around him, be it the star-filled space or the peopled leaf, the handiwork of God. In every trial, man gathers strength from the thought of God's constant presence. He learns to estimate at their true value the specious allurements of temptation. He dares not sin, yet he is bold in the service of duty, trusting to God's sustaining grace. He climbs the hill of meditation, to realise how much greater God is than the little world in which man too often dwells, and everything assumes the gigantic proportions which pertain to an eternal life, till this mount of meditation becomes the scene of assured victory, of absolute resignation, of transfiguring glory.

Such a man comes into the church fraught with its special sanctities, with its ancestral and its personal memories—the place of public worship, whose services tend to remind him of a pious childhood, of an ardent youth, of a faithful manhood, of the help that he has received from the common worship of kindred souls. He comes, determined to give and to receive the highest possible impulse towards the cultivation of the spiritual life.

Had we a Church of such worshippers I doubt not that the old proverb, "like people, like priest," would come true, and that while the soul of an intense earnestness would inspire our music, while a new meaning would come into the choicest utterances of poet, psalmist, prophet, and apostle, while the spirit of Christ would be more fully realised, there must also come a new fervour into the spoken prayer, a deeper significance into the word of exhortation.

The religious life would then be indeed developed in churches whose every service was a real communion with God, lifting the souls of all to a higher level of spiritual aspiration, and sending them forth not to suffer from the reaction of a spiritual intoxication, but to carry with them into the tumult of the world a heart quickened with a purer love, a soul filled with a nobler aspiration, an intelligence more inspired with the yearning thirst for truth, a hand more capable to do the appointed work of life!

Mr. THOS. CHATFIELD CLARKE thought the time had come when if the influence and power of the churches was to be retained and increased there should be a new birth both of laymen and ministers. They were too narrow and local in their sympathy. The Church of England, the dominant Church, influenced a considerable section, the Evangelical Dissenters largely influenced the middle class; this was on one side; but on the other side there was an enormous number to whom religion presented no attraction whatever, and he urged that the Unitarian body should approach this class in an earnest spirit and in an unconventional manner, and without any loss of rationalistic power, but with the fullest freedom and love and sympathy deal with them in the matter of religious truth.

The Rev. W. H. CHANNING spoke next, alluding to his previous residence in Liverpool as the happiest period of his ministerial labours, and expressing his pleasure at the realisation of Christian unity which this occasion made apparent.

The Rev. H. SHAEN SOLLY (Liverpool Domestic Mission) spoke upon the various efforts which might be advantageously made by congregations themselves, in the way of visitation, encouragement of temperance, window gardening, &c.

The Rev. DAVID DAVIS dwelt upon the necessity of a devout spirit in the Churches. They would never take the stand and do the work that they ought to do unless the article of prayer was more direct, earnest, and from the heart. If a minister found that he had not the power to commune face to face with God, he should leave the pulpit and devote himself to secular work.

The Rev. J. MOPEN thought that the great point to aim at was, while not sacrificing their breadth of theological view, to gather and retain more of the warmth and devotion which characterised orthodox Christians.

Mr. I. M. WADE thought that there must in all their efforts be a distinct manifestation of doctrinal opinion, otherwise their work was colourless and complexionless. Let them not be afraid of their theology, but boldly declare it, and then there would not be such absurd blunders and misconceptions as to what they really did believe.

The Rev. E. M. GELDART, M.A., suggested that religious life might be developed by having, as was the case in his own Church, a service for children on the first Sunday in every month. That was found to have a beneficial effect in binding the children to them, and increasing the general interest in worship.

The Rev. H. W. PERRIS, of Norwich, who had passed through various phases of religious history, being first brought up in the Church of England, then becoming a Nonconformist minister, and afterwards a Unitarian minister, advocated very strongly the unconventional method of appealing to the people and the discarding of the pride of spirit which characterised attendance at ordinary places of worship.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, Congregational minister, of Leicester, protested against the idea that that was a Conference for the promotion of Unitarianism. He gathered that they were met together not to promote any particular Church organisation, but to strengthen their common religious life and to draw men from various Churches into union; that they could only do this by remembering that religious life was one thing, and the means by which it was promoted might be quite different things. He recommended, to use an evangelical phrase, an increased zeal for souls, and that efforts should be made for conversion, which he supposed was from a Unitarian point of view left out of sight—(no, no). Let them approach the subject more in the old evangelical spirit, bringing the word of God to bear upon hardened hearts and sorrowful souls, and he was satisfied they would as Churches in that way do the most good.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., advocated the collecting together in classes of the young members of the congregation, and the imparting to them of religious teaching, with the addition of participating in the communion services, where it was thought desirable to do so. He had found great advantage from such organisation; it brought the Sunday scholars into the Church, and it was a bond of union between the school and the congregation.

The Rev. PHILIP WICKSTEED spoke in favour of a more careful and extensive practice of religious instruction to children by parents.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD summed up the discussion, observing that if they were to promote their own religious life there was only one thing to do, and that was to live themselves.

The Conference then adjourned for luncheon.

The Conference was resumed at three o'clock in the afternoon, under the Presidency of Mr. JAMES LUPTON, J.P.

The CHAIRMAN congratulated the Conference upon the success which had so far attended their efforts, and he believed that as the meeting progressed, and when it had concluded, they would all feel that they could go to their homes better prepared for the work which devolved upon them. The gathering of today had made him feel proud of the Church with which he was associated. The Chairman then announced that the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and Mr. R. Bartram would read papers on the subject "By What Practical Means Can Our Churches Best Enlarge and Extend Their Religious Influence?"

BY WHAT PRACTICAL MEANS CAN OUR CHURCHES BEST ENLARGE AND EXTEND THEIR RELIGIOUS INFLUENCE?

BY THE REV. RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG:

In that share of the discussion on the extension of the religious influence of our Churches which falls to me, I shall have chiefly in view those Churches which either immediately or by strict historical affiliation are connected with the exodus of some two thousand faithful ministers from the Established Church two hundred and twenty years ago. And I would interject the preliminary inquiry, what specific kinds of influence we do in any marked degree already exercise beyond our own Church walls. The answer comes at once from friend and foe, that in the political and social sphere members of our Churches wield an influence enormously out of proportion to our numbers; and though steadfast faithfulness to these Churches does not always maintain an exact ratio to the political eminence achieved, I cannot hesitate to attribute our strenuous citizenship very largely to the training characteristic of our Churches, to the stern call to duty, the claim that the world is the sphere of the church, the demand for justice, liberty, and truth in all things, the proclamation of the universal human brotherhood, which gives the tinge to our whole religious consciousness. And if this be so, then I, who hold true social and political activity to rank with the noblest forms of human energy, say, "Far be the day when effective sectarian organisation shall be bought by diverting the strength of our people from this high public work."

Turning from the national life to the national thought, I find it as impossible to estimate our effectiveness upon the mind of the country as it seemed to Esdras to weigh the weight of the fire or measure the blast of the wind. The attempts made through magazines and otherwise to spread some knowledge of the philosophical, theological, critical, and social thought characteristic of our Churches are minimised, in effect, through the imperturbable indifference of the cultivated laity amongst us to all such efforts, their lack of desire to read, and their steadfast determination, even if they read, not to buy. In like manner, the schemes that spring up from time to time for the propagation of our thought by the platform are largely stultified by the compulsory use of dingy rooms in back-streets and petty, shame-faced advertisements, the result of the miserable poverty of the sundry associations which thus strive to reach the people.

But it is not the political, not the mere theological influence of our Churches that I am instructed to discuss. It is the extension of their religious influence outside the narrow borders which hem them in as yet. I take it that this means the extension of our worshiping societies, by growth or by multiplication; and that I am invited to say what things are needful to promote this momentous end.

The very desire for this extension is amongst us a new-born thing. At first, not extension, but existence, was the object for which our predecessors strove. It is within the last thirty, and chiefly the last fifteen years, that the aspiration for extension has become pronounced; and the change of mood has developed pari passu with the disappearance of the old Whig families from our pews, and the appearance in their place of the sturdy bourgeois.

But when challenged to suggest practical means for the extension of the religious influence of our Churches, it is essential that we should observe that we still have in our ranks thousands of excellent men and women highly cultivated, wealthy, influential, who do not share the desire. The very first practical problem that lies before us is the winning over of these persons to our own desire. They want to know why we cannot let well alone, why we who hate the sectarian spirit are puffing ourselves out with denominational zeal, why we are exciting ourselves, why we cannot let the rich go to Church and the poor to the Methodist meeting, confident that the liberal thought which is abroad will dissipate their fanaticism and bigotry; why we cannot go quietly on our way content to see the mighty forces of the Zeitgeist shaping society to the form that is to be without the intermeddling of our feeble hands. These men are profoundly sceptical of any real saving power in our Churches at all. Now, while there is any large leaven of this manner of thought among us, we may talk till we are weary, of extension, but our talk will end in talk.

But then I find another temper asserting itself amongst us of a very different fashion. There has sprung up recently among us an impatient and eager spirit that can find neither rest nor peace. There is loud discontent with the position inherited from the Presbyterian fathers. Men want to know why we should be the least of all the sects. They are dissatisfied with small things, and want big things instead. They want to compete with Baptists and Methodists. They envy the gathering host of the Salvation Army, and wish our trumpets could blare as loud as theirs. They want to be one of the conquering sects; and they are inclined to deprecate all habits and principles which stand in the way of taking the world by storm.

I feel constrained to protest from the bottom of my soul against this feverish unrest. Easily enough we may win the masses to our ranks. Let us preach a hotter hell and a more devilish devil than the rest, and the people will press into our kingdom. Let our preachers play the mountebank, and multitudes will delight in our sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. But what shall it profit us if we gain the whole world and lose our own soul, that soul of high and noble truthfulness, of fidelity to the living word of God, of unflinching loyalty to principle though our right hand be cut off, which is the one thing which our Church possesses apt for the salvation of the world?

If we have any place at all in the great moving host of Christendom, our post is in the van; but never can the vanguard have the main body of the army with them. If we have any function to achieve for God and Christ, it is the glorious labour of the pioneer; but the pioneer in holy things must be lonely, must be misunderstood; must know, by the very measure of his devotion, the sacred sorrow of him who wept over heedless Jerusalem in the aching void of what seemed to be his failure. But passing on now, on the one hand, from those who do not in their hearts believe that our Churches have any great part left to play in God's world, and those, on the other hand, who are all restless for wide and conspicuous results, what is the real work we have to do, and how are we to do it?

I am persuaded that the weight of an immense responsibility rests on us; that we have that to give which no other Church in Christendom can give; that there are hundreds of men and women in every grade and class of English life to whom, if we could only get at them, we, and we almost alone, can offer succour for religious faith and life. And while the masses in no class are as yet for us, I believe it to be our urgent and solemn calling to gather these into communion with our Churches. What are the main conditions indispensable to the achievement of this duty?

The first is one on which it is impossible too earnestly to speak. The realisation of the aspirations of the morning is the one indispensable condition of realisation of the desires of this afternoon. If the religious life within our Churches be undeveloped, no practical means that brain of man can devise, can enlarge or extend their religious influence outside. Every measure that deepens or confirms the hold of religion on the people who are within directly tends to win the people who are without. Growth from within is the only organic method of addition. Every device for the promotion of our external extension which withdraws vital force from our internal development is a price paid for that which is not bread. Health at home is the one foundation for energy abroad.

I claim that I am still wholly practical, when I say that the next condition of effective labour for the extension of our Churches is, not machinery, not, that is, specific organisations, but steam;—power, that is to work the organisations when constructed. Here, as I am more and more convinced, is the very crux of our problem. On this all turns; and to lay before you elaborate plans for extension while keeping silence about motive power would be to mock you with the vainest of vain talk.

Two kinds of motive power must be found if there is to be—as I would to God there might be—this Church extension. The first is work. Ministers cannot do these things alone. Somehow, the young men and young women in our Churches must be awakened up to the duty of the hour. For my part, it is in them that I find the most devotion, the most generous enthusiasm, the most brave and truthful resolve to do according to their power the work which God shall give. But the lawyers, the merchants, the manufacturers in our Churches must mean the thing if we are to extend our influence. It is idle to come together here from the four corners of the kingdom to discuss practical means of extending our influence, unless each man who has come here means to do his part. What are the practical means of building up commercial and practical connections? None other whatsoever but vigilant, enduring work. And outside that thing I defy any speaker here to show us practical means of extending the influence of Churches.

And the other kind of motive power needed—and without which talk is vain—is that most worldly, least spiritual of all things,—money. You can extend no Churches without hard cash.

Churches are extended only by men being all on fire to extend them. They can only be extended by a new spirit of giving. We have thousands of men who are ready with kind and friendly words to give their half-guinea and guinea subscriptions to this and that when we ask them so to give. But the men who seriously hold their means a trust from God for the good of the world are very, very few. The men amongst us who have modified their style of living, distinctly curtailed their establishments, faced downright and continuous self-sacrifice, that our Churches through their proffered aid may extend their influence, might, I suppose, hold a congress in a room twelve feet square. Men may be sincere, good, religious, who do not do this. I honour and love many a man who does not do this, but fares sumptuously every day, yet walks closely with his God. I believe even that there are men who conscientiously deem it wrong to give more than their neighbours. But our first duty to-day is to face facts; and it is vain for us to try to persuade ourselves that we are very much in earnest about extending our Churches, while we do not give as much towards that in a year as we give for pictures, for carriages, for gardens. It is wretched work for a dozen ministers to sit round the board of one of our missionary societies, with painful care voting £10 for the year here and £5 there, and refusing any action somewhere else, while men who are asking why on earth our Churches do not extend are spending £100 on their summer trip, or entertaining a hundred guests at a dance at a cost of twenty shillings a-head. The other day, Mr. Samuel Morley, starting the Congregational Jubilee Fund, said they must make it £5,000 at least. “£5,000!” cried some one from the hall, “what nonsense! Why I mean to give £20,000 myself.” The fund to-day has passed £120,000; and the religious influence of the Congregational Churches is going to extend. With us, every single organisation is struggling for funds; and half the energy of the men who are willing to work has to go to carrying round the hat.

Again, let me say, I presume to judge no man; the price of real, heavy giving may be too great to pay; only let us face facts, and know that if our Churches do not extend it is not by any mysterious inscrutable Providence, but because we think it more prudent not to sell all, and go and follow him.

I have left myself but little time to discuss details of machinery. And, indeed, I have but little to suggest, so sure am I that the machinery will be forthcoming when the motive power is supplied.

The most remarkable recent efforts towards the extension of the religious influence of our Churches have consisted of series of services in secular buildings, conducted by ministers in addition to or in place of their ordinary church services. These movements have achieved immediate results which it is no exaggeration to call brilliant. The pure and simple worship which we love has proved in these cases, at any rate, acceptable and delightful to thousands of the unchurched masses, and I will not attempt to estimate the enormous good which I am sure these services have done. But I fear, under present conditions, they must be regarded as in their very nature exceptional. In the first place, they have in each instance within my cognisance been conducted by men of high and special individual endowment for this very kind of work; and, in the second place, if held in lieu of one of the usual chapel services, they must have a tendency to disperse the regular congregation, which would be a heavy price to pay for the temporary interest of outsiders; while, if held in addition to two regular services, and perhaps Sunday-school or other duties, they must involve a nervous strain which I do not believe half-a-dozen of our ministers have the physique to endure for any length of time without serious detriment to health, and, therefore, to the general sum of their usefulness. I should delight to see these public hall services extended far and wide; but if our people mean to have it so, and do not mean to enfeeble our existing Churches and our existing ministry, they must either find competent lay agency for the purpose, or set additional ministers down in all our large towns. I am asked to suggest practical measures. Let the wealth of our Churches engage six men, strong in body, mind, and heart, to keep this work going in our twelve largest towns, either in collegialship with or independently of the settled ministers, and a noble movement will be inaugurated.

But that, like all really practical proposals, involves a scale of giving by our people, which, except among the working-classes, does not as yet exist. Failing the halls—though you will have the men to find, and that for a yet more exhausting work—the street pavement and the green sward cost nothing; and if blue skies were dome enough for Jesus and for Paul, we need not be ashamed to preach in temples not made with hands.

We, in Nottingham, have this winter tried an experiment which, at any rate, as an experiment, if in no other way, is, I think, of some little value. We took from Mr. Hopps the idea of invitation by personal visit, by printed card, and by the presentation of a little hymn-book throughout a district. But instead of inviting our neighbours to a hall, we boldly asked them to come to our own Church on Sunday evenings. For twelve Sunday evenings we agreed to put aside our usual liturgy, to sing from the little hymn-book specially prepared, and to adopt as simple, direct, informal a mode of address by way of sermon as the minister should be found capable of producing. Sixty visitors paid four thousand visits among the working-people within three-quarters of a mile of our church. We wished to test the alleged prejudice of people against church-buildings. Our visitors returned with roseate accounts of their reception. A third of the people were positively coming. The result was, the first Sunday, which was streaming with rain, perhaps 200 strangers; the second Sunday, perhaps 300 or 400; and through the remaining ten a number fluctuating between these extremes, the last Sunday being one of the fullest of the series. This was neither startling nor brilliant; but we believe that no small number of our visitors will continue to attend our services; that many toiling men and weary women have been taught to feel God nearer and man kinder and life holier than they did; and that hundreds who could not conquer inveterate habit, and never found their way to our gatherings, were pleased and touched by the visit of invitation, and have found some help in the strain and struggle of life from the hymn-books which we left with them.

I hope that some one in this discussion will touch upon the duty that is surely laid upon us to go with our gospel to the ancient Universities of the land. Thousands of the most promising youth of England there take the momentous step from the Orthodox Christianity which their understanding can no longer hold by to the agnosticism, noble or ignoble, which wanders outside all church doors. So entirely are we outside these great training-schools of the national life and thought that these youths do not even know that any body of men have found in a simple Christian theism the reconciliation between the reverent spirit of faith and the bold spirit of largening knowledge. If, for a moment, they themselves pause on our resting-ground, they think they are alone, the mists are about their eyes, and they stumble on till Matthew Arnold or Comte or Spencer gives them shelter. Surely the sin lies at our door, that not a voice is heard at Oxford or at Cambridge proclaiming the simple fatherhood of God and brotherhood of Christ, and telling how high thought and lowly prayer are brother and sister angels who may share the hospitality of our minds. Only, if we go to the Universities, we must go with spirit and self-respect. Far better stay away than go as paupers, challenging the comparison between our mean back-room and the goodly churches of Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and the rest.

I have no anticipation of great and splendid triumphs of our cause. I do not believe God's work for us is to become the popular Church. But I believe that with faith, with generosity, with enthusiasm, with steadfastness, with love, with prayer, we may play no mean part in saving the world from swinging out of Superstition into Atheism; and showing before men that there is a life, a faith, a philosophy which neither cringes before the devil nor makes blatant mockery of God. It is not the external methods so much as the internal spirit, nor the practical measures so much as the quiet, steadfast faithfulness that we need with all our heart and soul to strive and pray for. We want the baptism of the Holy Spirit and of fire. To this, whenever it is ours, God himself will give the increase. But unless we be converted and become as little children, we shall not enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

MR. BARTRAM'S PAPER.

In approaching the consideration of the subject upon which I have been asked to read a paper, I am relieved from at least one task. It is not incumbent upon me to prove that our churches have any religious influence at all; or, rather I am not called upon to disprove the assertion that our churches exert no influence, an assertion so frequently made, that some even amongst ourselves have, so it seems, come to believe it must be true, at least if we are to trust certain despairing wails that now and again go up from our midst. It may, therefore, be taken for granted that we do exert a religious influence, and we may leave those who enjoy taking a miserable view of our state, to continue their cheerful revelries while we proceed to more serious business. At the same time, it cannot be out of place to consider at the outset what is exactly the kind of religious influence we of the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches do seek to exert, because, as it seems to me, there is a good deal of misconception on the subject, and for the proper consideration of the question before us that misconception ought to be cleared up.

I take it that our point of departure from the other Christian sects is to be found in this fact, that Reason, which we believe to be a Divine gift, plays a more important part in our conception of all matters pertaining to religion than it does with them. We pay far less respect to what is generally known as “authority” than do our orthodox brethren, and that because reason and authority must necessarily be antagonistic, although they may arrive at the same conclusions. It is essential that this fact should be kept in mind, because, lying as it does at the root of our religious being, it cannot fail to affect the methods we must employ to extend our influence. When, therefore, some among us deplore that we are not like other sects, or urge us to adopt the same measures that these do, they lose sight of the fact that before we can do this, we must, as it were, recast our nature, and cease to be ourselves. While believing that no sect of the Christian Church is the sole repository of all that is true and essential in religion, and while maintaining that Unitarians will stand a favourable comparison in this respect, we must not lose sight of the fact that every sect contributes its share towards the general result, and that it is just a little foolish when we imagine that we ought to give up our share, and try to be faithful copyists of others. Not that we are to ignore those others, nor to refuse to learn of them when we can; we are not so perfect that we can afford to despise everybody but our noble selves. We may admire the organisation of the Roman Catholic and Wesleyan Churches, and, in so far as that organisation does not interfere with individual conscience, may see how much of it we can adopt; we may respect the fervour of the mission preacher, or the zeal of the Ritualist, and try to find out if it be possible for us to emulate these qualities. But we are bound not to lose sight of our essential character, and in striving after effective organisation, not to sacrifice our liberty, or in emulating the fervid zeal of Evangelical or Ritualist, not to set aside all considerations of prudence or propriety.

What is the influence that our churches have hitherto exerted? Few fair-minded persons will deny that the theological conceptions prevailing in most of the orthodox churches to-day differ very considerably from those that prevailed some fifty years ago. The doctrine of eternal punishment is far less insisted on nowadays; the doctrine of the Atonement has been very considerably modified, and in some of its modified forms would have found acceptance with many Unitarians of less than half a century ago; the plenary inspiration of the Bible finds no defender from any person having the slightest pretension to scholarship; and even the miraculous element as recorded in the Gospels has ceased to form a strong point in Christian evidences. If it be asked how all this has come to pass, I cannot help thinking that it is largely due to the influence exerted by the Unitarian churches, which have stood as living protests against the harsh form in which the doctrines just mentioned have been presented. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that some who have been repelled by these doctrines have gone to the opposite extreme, and have denied all religion. Upon these our churches have at times not failed to exert a good influence, often providing a place of refuge, which was sorely needed.

Have we, then, done our work? No; it is far from finished yet. There is still too much deference paid to correctness of belief, too much fear of that disbelief which the churches regard as deadly and destructive. We have still to show to the world that conduct is more important than creed, character than belief. There is still a call upon us to declare, that the true unbeliever is not the man who will not believe more than he can honestly consider as proved, but he that believes too much, in the hope that perhaps some of it will be right, and that at any rate he will be on the safe side. We have still to maintain that belief in God is best shown by trusting in Him, and that we have no terror, because doctrines are held by some well-informed persons, which are contrary to those held by our fathers or ourselves.

Thus far I have endeavoured to lay down in a general way what seem to me to be some of the principles, that lie at the root of whatever influence we possess. It now remains to be considered how we can most effectively extend that influence. And first I should like to say a word or two about some of the modes that have been recommended to us, but which certainly do not commend themselves to my judgment. One of these has been of late somewhat persistently advocated, though not by a very influential or numerous party among us. In effect, if not in actual words, we have been told that the one thing needful for us is a creed! That is to save us from drifting hopelessly I know not where. Now, I have very little sympathy with the man who hesitates to proclaim his exact position, whatever it may be, or who talks so vaguely that he may be in religious matters anything or nothing. I think that a man who, professing to teach, is not quite sure of his teaching, had better hold his tongue till he has learned a little more. But I have far less sympathy with those who imagine that they have got hold of all the truth there is or can be, and desire to shut out all possibility of change or prospect of better knowledge. Whatever taunts Unitarians may have had thrown at them, or even may have deserved, the charge of hypocrisy they have hitherto escaped. Will it be denied that the adoption of a fixed form of belief has led to hypocrisy, to paltering with words in a double sense, and an insincere conformity? Let him who denies it carefully study the history of religious thought, and see there if he does not find that creeds have never failed to be instruments of oppression to the earnest seeker after truth, and have acted either as fetters to the human mind, or as provocatives to a hollow insincerity. No! The adoption of a creed or authorised statement of belief we may, I think, pass over as wholly unfitted to give practical effect to our influence; rather it would be the coffin in which to bury it.

Then we are recommended to adopt the plans by which some of the orthodox succeed in attracting great numbers, at any rate, for a time, to listen to them. It has been suggested that we should adopt some unconventional mode of religious worship, in the hope that an unusual method may attract large numbers to our chapels. The mistake that our friends make in this matter seems to me to be that in their desire to see larger numbers in our chapels they are prepared to make too great a sacrifice, and that they are setting up the standard of quantity as against quality. They are seeking to make their religion popular in the lower meaning of that term. I will not deny that some good is done by an eccentric presentation of religion, because if the intention is good, good must flow from the intent, only it is apt to get diluted, or rather, I should say, adulterated.

Then we are told that religion should make itself part of the work-a-day life of the world; that it should not keep itself apart from ordinary concerns, whether of business or amusement; and that we are peculiarly well fitted to carry such a view into practice. Now, I heartily sympathise with the spirit of that sentiment; but, unfortunately, we find that the application of it more often tends to give a lower tone to religion than to give a religious tone to secular affairs, and, therefore, it is necessary to receive it with circumspection. In order, as it is said, to attract young people to us, things are done which reflect but little credit upon our churches. From time to time I read accounts of what is done in connection with them, which make me wonder whether those who take part therein realise in the smallest degree the work that lies before them. As an instance of this, I refer more especially to the growth of a frivolous spirit among us, which finds a vent, in season and out of season, in dramatic performances not always of the best character, and very often of very questionable taste. Now, personally, I am no despiser of the theatre, and think that much of the evil that there is to complain of in that institution might be considerably lessened, if a discriminating countenance were given to it by those who now stay away altogether. But that is a very different thing from seeking to bring some of the elements connected with the theatre as accessories to the work of our churches. To wind up a congregational meeting, called to welcome a minister to the duties of his high calling, with a performance of a farce or scenes from the School for Scandal, is scarcely the appropriate finish for what may fairly be regarded as an occasion of great interest, and one provocative of serious, if not of solemn thoughts. Whatever may be the best way of extending our religious influence, it is not by such incongruities as these that our churches will aid in the spread of religion. It is true that some persons may be attracted for a time, but you are training them for the music-hall, not for the Kingdom of God.

There is another way in which some seem to think that our influence is to be extended, and that is by providing an æsthetic ritual in our chapels. If the object of our religious services be, as it ought to be, the worship of God, whatever leads to the due and effective conduct of that worship is to be respectfully considered. But if the simple object be to appeal to the refined and cultured feelings of those who might otherwise prefer to stay away, then a low ideal is set up, and in the endeavour to compete with those who are able to do that kind of thing far more effectively, a taste is being fostered which, though it is perhaps better than the taste for dramatic performance already alluded to, is much the same kind of thing, only in a more refined degree. Let things be done decently and in order, by all means, but let it ever be borne in mind that the end and aim of all our religious services is the worship of God, the kindling of religious emotion, the strengthening of religious purpose. Having now exhausted, so far as I am concerned, the things which, as it seems to me, we should not do, it now remains to consider what we should do.

And here I can do little more than give expression to general ideas, because the conditions under which our churches exist differ so largely one from another that much which is suitable to one is wholly inapplicable to another. I have said in a former part of this paper that we stand distinguished from other churches by our habit of looking at things from an intellectual standpoint, which largely affects our whole religious position. But if it be said that reason alone is to be our authority, I demur to this view, unless it be allowed that certain emotions or feelings are to be reckoned as elements in our mode of reasoning. We desire to blend reason and emotion, tempering the excesses of each with the other. Now it ought to be one of the great objects of our Church life to cultivate this judicious blending, so as to form a perfect character. That being our aim, how are we practically to carry it into effect, with the view of extending the influence it has upon us to others?

We have several difficulties to overcome, and one, by no means the least, is that we have a bad name. I do not mean that if we were to formally renounce the name Unitarian it would help us; it is the thing for which the name stands, which with many is the cause of offence; and were all the Unitarians in the United Kingdom to meet and pass a unanimous resolution that for the future they would be called Free Christians, or any other name they might determine on, the difficulty would not be overcome. The only way in which, as it seems to me, this objection is to be surmounted is by living it down. Depend upon it, that the Church which has the longest life in it, is that which serves God in what is about the only way it can do so, that is by serving man. The closer we can keep to this aim the better shall we be able to command the respect of others, the stronger to make our influence felt. I do not mean that we may expect to become popular, in the ordinary sense of the term, nor should I desire it, but we should make our influence felt in the very best way possible.

In every case a Church has two duties, the one to those in its own communion, the other to those outside it, and more especially to those unattached to any other communion. To the former it owes the duty of fostering and preserving, to the latter the duty of, at least, offering a religious home when the time comes that the want of that home has to be satisfied. And these duties can, and ought to, be carried out in no sectarian spirit, though in the spirit of mutual loyalty. We have every right, and, indeed, I think our obligation to the truth impels us, to assert our views in religion, and to insist on their importance. We are bound, by the same sense of fidelity to truth, or, at any rate, our conception of it, to train up our young people in that faith which has been a blessing to us, and we are especially called upon to find for those young people opportunities for enabling them to take their share in the work of our churches, be it ever so humble. I do not advocate that our young should be made to save up their pennies for promoting the conversion of South Sea Islanders to a spurious kind of Christianity, but there is no reason why they should not be early trained to recognise, that they have duties towards those, of whom they may know but little personally; that of their abundance, be it what it may, they are called upon to give to those who need it. Of course, this is primarily the duty of the parent, but it is essentially the duty of the Church to insist on it. At this time of day it is hardly necessary to urge the importance to the churches of the religious training of the young, whether in connection with them or not. But I think that we shall far better exert an influence for good by making our Sunday-schools what they ought to be, religious institutions, than by turning them into semi-scientific classes, or even dancing academies.

It would be well, too, if some plan could be devised of introducing our young people into the membership of the Church. Church membership should not be a mere question of money, or, if it is, the money payment should be so low that no great obstacle is placed in the way. It certainly would not be offering a practical suggestion if I were to advocate the putting aside of all money considerations whatever, but very frequently personal active service is of far more value than an annual subscription, and such service ought to be considered in fixing the terms of membership. There ought, too, to be some distinct act of recognition of new members, and especially of young ones, by the older members; and if it were to partake somewhat of the form of a Confirmation service, provided that it was a voluntary act, and not made a test or condition of membership, I do not think much harm would be done.

Then, as regards those of our young people who have become members, or are capable of becoming such. You cannot make use of them too soon, or take them into your councils too early. Get them to work in the numerous ways that nearly every Church can provide, but which are often influenced by local or personal considerations. Not as zeal for the particular Church alone should any of this work be carried on, but simply as a means of carrying out the duties that God has given us. What is generally understood as the work of charity has not yet ceased to be essentially the work of our churches, although we may hold very strong opinions as to the impropriety of indiscriminate almsgiving, or the undesirability of purchasing a seeming conformity to religious observance, by the gifts of blankets or soup. Helping those, who often find it difficult to help themselves has not yet ceased to be an act of pure and undefiled religion.

To a large extent the work of primary education has been taken out of the hands of the churches; but there is one way in which those who took a strong interest in this sphere of practical religious labour can render assistance to the cause they had at heart. There is not a Board School visitor, nor any member of a Board, that does not know, that in many cases there is a hard struggle on the part of some parents to enable them to send their children to school. It is as much a duty of the churches to see how far they can help these parents now as it was, before 1870, for them to provide the means of giving the much needed instruction. To seek out such cases, to render assistance, temporary or otherwise, in cash, clothes, or any other way that the facts may warrant, is a work which we are called upon to execute.

Now, with respect to the religious services in our churches. I have already stated what the object of those services ought to be, viz., the worship of God, the cultivation of our own religious faculties. I do not pretend to lay down any definite rules as to attaining these aims; all I contend for is, that these aims should be made paramount to everything, and kept steadfastly in view, and that nothing should be said or done that is calculated to jar upon the reverent and devotional feeling of any religious minded man or woman. A very safe rule to follow, when we are in doubt as to whether any particular thing will offend, is to give those whom it may be thought likely to hurt the benefit of the doubt, and abstain. While speaking thus in favour of reverent and devout worship, I see no reason why there should not be as much cheerfulness imparted into the surroundings of our worship, as it is possible.

Should the meetings for worship be confined to the Sunday? There is no great reason why they should. On the other hand, there is every reason why a forced and unnatural devotionism should not be fostered. If a spontaneous desire is felt for public worship, by all means let it have full and fair scope; but there is no use in manufacturing an artificial religiosity, that certainly would not extend our influence.

It will be seen that thus far I have spoken of what our churches should do for those in close communion with them, or who are dependent upon them for aid. To a very large extent, I believe that the best way of enlarging our influence is to do our utmost to consolidate existing churches and organisations. Make these strong centres of active work, and you may hope to radiate fresh energy in other directions. A number of attempts to establish what are but weak efforts, only bring discredit and discouragement upon the cause. I admit that it is very often earnest zeal which is at the bottom of these attempts, but zeal, unless tempered by discretion, is apt to lead to serious mistakes. At the same time, I recognise the fact that we are called upon to enlarge our borders. How shall we do this most effectively?

It seems to me that our work in this way lies in the strengthening of small outlying congregations, in the establishment of new churches in the suburbs of our large cities, and in towns where no such churches already exist. This can best be done through some organisation, either local, such as our district associations, or general, like the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and by the employment of some of our best men as Missionaries. And the sense in which I use the word "best" is this: men who are persuasive rather than controversial, clear in statement, rational in exposition, reverent in manner, and tender towards what they may regard as intellectual error. Then with respect to the ground to be tilled. The seed ought not to be sown hap-hazard. Careful inquiries should be instituted of those who know the locality well, and before any attempt is made to commence proceedings, it should be ascertained whether there are a sufficient number of persons who are willing to form a nucleus of a congregation, and not only whether there is a sufficient number, but whether they are at all likely to carry out the scheme successfully. This has to be carefully kept in view, that in founding a new church, the object is not to erect a building where once or twice a week men can come and listen to a carefully prepared and thoughtful discourse, but one where men and women can meet together to worship God, to strengthen each other by the very fact of their being associated in the same object, and to utilise that association for directly religious purposes. If, therefore, those, who only care for the intellectual Pabulum they may get when they feel inclined to seek it on the Sunday, are amongst the number that desire the erection of a new church, you must not expect to do great things, and it may be well to wait for better auspices under which to commence work.

It frequently happens that a difficulty presents itself in starting a new church, which is almost insuperable. There is no room adapted for religious purposes in the neighbourhood, or, if there is, it cannot be obtained by Unitarians. It has sometimes happened that under these circumstances rooms have been hired which are altogether unfitted for the purposes of worship. I know it may be said that the worship of God is independent of place or time. While assenting to that entirely, I say that we make a grievous error, when we lay the foundations of a church in a place, where the surroundings are calculated to give offence to the feelings of devotional reverence with which we draw together to worship. This is no mere aesthetic objection, but one which I believe to be founded in common sense. But how are we to surmount the difficulty? We may take a lesson from some of our orthodox friends here. A similar difficulty frequently meets them, especially in country districts, and I have seen in use among them, at any rate in the summer season, what they call "A Gospel Tent," which can be and is moved from place to place. Now, would it not be possible for our associations to possess themselves of one, or more if need be, iron chapels to be set down in some district for a time until the congregation has grown capable of forming itself into a district church and providing a building of its own. The exterior of an iron church is not the most pleasing object you can have to gaze upon, but it is infinitely superior to using a room in which the odour of stale smoke, or the tawdry surroundings of a third-rate concert room, offend the senses of both smell and sight. The cost of an iron chapel is from 15s. a sitting, and there are few localities where there is not a vacant plot of land, which the owner will not be glad to let, at a reasonable rate, for temporary purposes. But if the number of persons whom it is possible to draw together at first is not large enough for such an effort as this, will it not be possible to foster the young church in the private houses of some willing members? I cannot but believe that in this way there might be laid the foundation of many a strong church. Of course, it must be regarded as a temporary expedient, and the hope of something larger always kept in view. The effect upon our young people of this testifying for conscience sake, this refusing to pretend to a conformity that does not exist, cannot fail to be good.

What has been said points to the strengthening of our existing organisations, because it must of necessity be that all efforts at propagandism come through these or similar ones. But it is not only by means of the opening of new churches that the influence of those that exist can be extended; or, rather, we have to work for the extension of the principles that lie at the foundation of our faith. This can be done by means of the printing press. The delivery of the lectures on the Affirmations of Unitarianism last year no doubt helped in this direction, and their subsequent publication in a cheap form has, I believe, aided the work of promoting a better knowledge of Unitarian Christianity. But we want more of that kind of thing; a lecture corresponding to that given every year in connection with the Congregational body might be instituted; not necessarily on any disputed doctrine, but on some subject connected with religion, and which, approached from a Unitarian standpoint, would help to throw some light on that position. It may be said that we can get this kind of thing from the denominational press, but that press rarely gets into the hands of people outside the denomination. I do not think that it always gets into the hands of all inside the denomination; perhaps if it did those who conduct it would see their way to effecting several improvements. But such a lecture as that to which I have referred might be delivered under conditions which would attract more attention, and therefore be productive of more good.

In order to get over the ill effects which isolation so often brings about there ought to be more frequent interchange of pulpits between ministers in a district; it is good for the ministers and good for the people. It should be more systematic and far more of a recognised thing than it is. And this points to the importance of forming District Councils, not simply for the purpose of hearing a paper read, and a more or less interesting discussion afterwards, but for considering and devising the best means for making the work of the churches in union more effective. Of course, the joining such a Council would be a perfectly voluntary act, and care would have to be taken that a large amount of congregational liberty should be preserved. The minister, and at least two properly selected members of each church in union, should represent that church at the Council, and while the joining the Council should be voluntary, the leaving it must be equally free. At this Council, which might do pretty nearly anything which the churches in union authorised it, at least it would be possible to render substantial assistance, and very often to give sound advice. The Council should meet not oftener than twice a year, unless special circumstances demanded it. It should have very little to do with the spending of money, and certainly nothing with the congregational property. It might, however, plan out combined action in its district, and do its best to carry that out; but chiefly it should confine its operations to the taking counsel together, and to deliberation with a view to congregational action. I am not aware that any of our existing Associations or Unions quite occupy this position; most of them are burdened with the charge of one or more churches, and this fully occupies their attention. Such a Council as I have suggested would have no such care. Putting its value at the lowest, it certainly would provide a useful interchange of thought upon practical work.

All that has been said, however, about means sinks into minor importance before the greater question of aim. It is useless, too, to speak about Church or Congregational action, unless the individual members of the Church are in accord as to the object. It is not the minister, or the committee, or wardens, or whoever may be the managing body, that have to make our churches effective; it is the members who have to do this; the inspiration or the suggestion may come from others, but it is the members who are to translate that into solid realisation. Let, then, our aim be not simply the glorification of our particular Church, but the bringing about of the kingdom of God upon earth, using the Church as a means to that end. Let the faith we have in God and in man be shown by our works, and in our consistent adherence to doctrines which we have learned to value as the best expression of the truth that has yet come to us.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, who opened the discussion, said the difficulty he was in was that he did not believe in any scheme for extending Church influence, but in every member of the congregations doing that which their hands found to do. He thought the paper of the afternoon was really identical in scope with that of the morning. When they were as interested in their religion as they were in politics and the success of the man who had to be pulled in, he did not think that they would have any necessity for Conferences such as this, although they might meet to thank God for the progress they made. Referring to the remarks of the last essayist, he did not believe that the people followed the Salvation Army because a more hellish hell and a more devilish devil was preached, but because they found in that army, in spite of its vulgarity and a great deal of nonsense—which made one hang down their heads for shame—there was at the heart of it a very splendid, human, beautiful, and early Christian effort to save the drunkard and cure the wife-beater—(applause). He believed the thing to be taken care of was ourselves, and if we got to be more in earnest and more religious, believing in religion as though it was a reality, the whole thing would shape itself for us. Speaking of the coldness of certain congregations, he said it reminded him of a man who was somewhat miserly, and who complained that he could not get his house warm. "Did you ever try coals?" once asked a waggish friend; and so it was with such congregations. He did not believe some congregations had tried a single scuttleful of coal. He expressed his thanks to the committee for organising so magnificently successful a conference, and remarked that Manchester, Birmingham, Nottingham, and other towns had done their duty, and it remained for London to follow suit.

Dr. W. B. CARPENTER (London) dwelt on the necessity of bringing up the young in a religious spirit, and of the extension of liberal thought and definite scientific habits of thought. His experience whilst lecturing on scientific subjects in various towns showed him that Unitarian ministers and congregations had taken the greatest interest in such proceedings.

The Rev. W. CAREY WALTERS (Kidderminster) protested most earnestly against the way in which the action of those who like himself encouraged amusements in connection with their Churches was criticised. He regarded it as his duty as a minister of a Christian Church to make that Church as much as ever he possibly could the home of the young people—(hear). He held it to be his bounden duty to provide them—especially those who could not obtain it at home—a pure means of recreation, and he offered his personal testimony that those young men and women to whom he would go with the greatest confidence for help in Christian work were those who took part in the recreation. Speaking of the urgent necessity of work amongst the masses, the rev. gentleman paid a tribute to the Salvation Army as a body, which reached men who hitherto had seemed beyond the scope of help from existing Churches.

Thé Rev. T. TIMMINS (Portsmouth) advocated prayer meetings and praise meetings as an important action in developing religious influence, and he also thought that in every large town where there were two places of worship one place should be made as grand and imposing as possible and as effectual in its ritual as it could be made, so as to take in those who were drawn in that manner; one Church should be strongly Ritualistic—(laughter), and the other as simple as the Salvation Army, to go into the highways and byeways and give the people the gospel—(applause).

Mr. G. ST. CLAIR (Birmingham) as a delegate of a Church, the members of which would not like to be committed to Unitarianism, thought the tone of the Conference had been somewhat too exclusively Unitarian, and he was glad to notice remarks which indicated that this was not really designed. He spoke of the narrowness that still lingered as between religious sects, and expressed the wish that this should be removed.

The Rev. HENRY SOLLY (London) congratulated the Conference on the success which had attended it, and he thought they might be equally congratulated on the fact that those who had arranged it had placed it upon a broad Christian and unsectarian platform. He argued that real earnest work was the surest way of developing healthy religious life. He instanced the revival in the Baptist body at the commencement of the century, which was distinctly traceable to their undertaking the work of foreign missions and sending out the noble-hearted Carey. In self-sacrificing earnest Christian effort was to be found the surest incentive to active religious life. Persecution in past times had been a great strengthener of religious life. Now where were they to look for that?—(hear). Referring to the subject of dramatic performances, when they were undertaken in a spirit of love to man, and in the spirit of grace, the work was to be commended.

The Rev. J. E. STEAD (Stratford, Essex.) insisted upon the temperance work as being an important one in Christian effort; and was glad to note the extent to which it had been recognised in that Conference.

The sitting then closed with the singing of a hymn.

THURSDAY.

The proceedings were resumed at ten o'clock on Thursday morning in Hope-street Church, Mr. C. H. JAMES, M.P., presiding. There was again a large attendance. After the singing of a hymn, and prayer by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, B.A.,

The CHAIRMAN, in a brief speech, recommended that, as there was a good deal of business to be disposed of, the speakers should strictly confine themselves to the time allotted for each.

Professor J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., then read a Paper on "The Education and Supply of Ministers or our Pulpits.

THE EDUCATION OF THE MINISTRY.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

All systems of professional education necessarily receive their guiding lines from the general conception of the end which they are destined to subserve. The physician, the lawyer, the engineer, each enters upon the work which he chooses as his life task through a series of studies carefully designed to prepare him for his subsequent duties. They do this in part by infusing into him a certain quantity of special knowledge, and, still more, by providing him with the means of hereafter utilising his own experience. Their chief value is that they teach him how to learn.

It cannot be requisite for me here to plead that a similar professional training is indispensable for the minister. Nor need it be argued at any length that this training must be shaped in accordance with the aim of the minister's life; it must qualify him for precisely those functions which he and no other (as society is at present organised) is to perform. It might be proper at this point to offer some definition of the scope and purport of the ministry; but about this, I imagine, however it be phrased, there can be little need for disquisition, and it seems more fitting to pass on to topics which may arouse more difference of opinion, and concerning which discussion may be more profitable. It need only be observed at the outset that the minister is in the first place a man; that he ought to lay wide and deep the foundations of exact knowledge; and that his special training must be preceded by the largest attainable general culture. In this, historical and scientific studies appear to me to deserve a large place; historical for purposes hereafter to be specified; scientific for reasons which can only be briefly noted. Not in order that the future minister may be able to undertake the difficult, but apparently popular, task of reconciling science and religion; for a study that is approached with such a preconceived aim can be of little use as an intellectual discipline; but to gain some insight into its methods of proof, to understand the security of some of its demonstrations, and to share its enthusiasm for the pursuit of truth.

In passing to the narrower range of studies for his particular calling, it must be remembered that the higher part of the minister's education lies outside the teacher's hands. He who is to quicken the souls of others must first have opened his own to the touch of God. The communications of the spirit are not to be embraced in any course of critical investigation, or distilled by analysis out of any books. This learning comes not of hearing lectures, but of grace. Of these inward mysteries the education for the ministry cannot take formal cognisance. No college can offer to its inmates the insight of the seer. The genesis of faith and hope and love is not among the tutor's functions. It is, indeed, his privilege to welcome and foster them; it is the responsibility of his position that he can starve and chill them, though he cannot create or revive them; but the life of devotion, the depths of piety, the springs of affection, are not at his command, and to open the blind eyes and unstop the deaf ears is reserved for a loftier power. Yet even in the schools of the prophets, we may suppose, some kind of training was imparted, and if the secrets of the soul are in a higher keeping, the guidance of the mind may be assigned to the teacher as his proper sphere. What, then, must be the landmarks of his endeavours?

It cannot, at the outset, be too earnestly enforced that no scheme of college instruction can possibly do more than map out ground which the student must himself traverse and retrace again and again. No mistake can be more fatal either for congregations or ministers than the assumption that the years of college labour form the student's complete equipment. They can only teach him how to use his weapons; he must forge and wield them for himself. He learns much before he enters a pulpit that he will assuredly soon after forget, though he may have for special purposes a few years later to acquire it all over again. The problem is to minimise these superfluities, and withal enable the future minister to make his whole subsequent career a continuous and never intermitted education; for it is essential to bear in mind that, as Bossuet said two centuries ago, "preparation for the priesthood" (and the remark of course covers the ministry) "is not, as some men think, a matter of brief study, it is a life-long training." Now, it was a maxim of one of the greatest teachers of our century, the late Prof. De Morgan, that education ought to include something of everything, and everything of something. I may not pause to unfold or discuss this pregnant remark; but if I shall seem to lay out a wide field which will embrace something, if not of everything, yet at least of many things, it must be understood that the everything of something is not forgotten, though it is of necessity left to the student's aptitudes and tastes. More important is this further qualification. Ought we not to recognise that the ministry, under existing social conditions, contains within itself at least two distinctly marked types, though they continually tend to approach each other, and some strong men can unite the two? Is there not the ministry of thought, and in its lower form of scholarship, and the ministry of practical philanthropy? Do we expect the same services from the one as from the other? And should not any systems of education be sufficiently elastic to give tolerably free play to the faculties that lead to either, at once by supplementing and invigorating the weak, and at the same time by opening the lines of development to the strong? Must we not beware of insisting on a too uniform adoption of the same courses of study by all alike? If we desire to cherish individuality and promote independence, ought we not to recognise diversities of gifts and varieties of ministrations?

Be this, however, as it may, the ministry of thought and scholarship on the one hand, and the ministry of public work on the other, have one supreme function in common, though it is quite possible that in some future readjustment of the church organisations of this country a third order might acquire prominence, viz., the ministry of utterance. All ministers, whether their contribution to the welfare of their fellow men be through the pursuit of truth, or by the amelioration in some form or another of human wrongs—all ministers must pray and preach. The one duty which cannot be omitted is the persistent and regular endeavour to nourish the religious life of the community in which they live by public speech concerning divine things. Whatever else they may do or leave undone, this they must do, whether well or ill. That they should do it well is above all things to be desired, and to this end must their training be largely directed. I pass by here (though it is of no small account) the lesser arts of speech, of composition, and delivery, in which perhaps more help might be given than is usually offered, to deal at once with the weightier matters on which all teaching must be founded. In the first place, the great change effected in the bases of belief through the surrender of the external authority of a church or a book, throws more stress than ever on the study of the springs of the moral and religious life within the soul. He who would persuade others must first have attained definite convictions himself. He must know their rational ground, he must have clear ideas of the power of the understanding to frame and sanction beliefs concerning things transcending sensible verification. He must recognise the weak points, the difficulties, of his own arguments, and the strength of his opponent's. He must take his stand, as far as possible, not only on the incommunicable experiences of his own soul, but on the lines of thought and feeling common to all, or at least to many, men; that the structure of faith which he raises may seem no airy and unsubstantial fabric, but a veritable temple of the living God. The study of philosophy and the grounds of belief might well include also some insight into what may be designated religious psychology. The lives of the Saints of all Churches contain innumerable records of spiritual crises, of the processes of their interpretation, of the trusts erected on them. The meaning and the validity of these, the student should learn approximately to comprehend, to test, to weigh. The severe rationalist is disposed to brush them all aside at once with the contemptuous phrase "illusions of self-consciousness," because they do not come within the lines of his own formulæ; but a wider sympathy (for which I shall plead directly in a similar connection) will correct this narrowness, and lead to a perception of deeper affinities than are at first suspected. This is particularly the case with a branch of thought closely allied to the philosophical studies just named, though commonly treated with scanty courtesy, viz., mysticism. Mysticism is not peculiar to any one Church, or even to any one religion; it appears in many. It may almost be said to represent a certain permanent and universal element in the human mind. So far is it from being the dream of a few amiable enthusiasts or misguided devotees in the past, that it is receiving fresh expression in the present age from many sides, for the doctrines of the unity and order of nature afford it a powerful intellectual support. Our current poetic literature is deeply tinged with it; and the boldest scientific atheism and the positive philosophy have alike sought its alliance. Towards the forms of emotion awakened by the facts of the universe and of life, and the perceptions connected with them, the student must play no Gallio's part; he must learn their seemingly unintelligible speech, and reckon with them.

But the intellectual convictions born of philosophy must be reinforced, extended and quickened by the careful culture of the historical aspects of religion. Foremost among these must, of course, be placed the study of the Bible. It may be well that this should be supplemented by the investigation of the records of other great faiths, but this at least is indispensable. Much might be here said of the changed conditions of this study; it must suffice to make the obvious remark that it may be pursued on several lines, and with various gifts. It is one of the misfortunes which the Bible has suffered at the hands of Christendom that its interpretation has until recently been relegated to professional castes among the Churches, and that no unconsecrated hand was permitted to touch the sacred page. But those who reject the plea that a supernatural revelation requires supernatural guardianship, must desire to throw open the literature of religion as widely as possible, and invite laymen, as well as ministers, to seek the highest technical scholarship, and expound the books of Hebrew faith with the same minute care which they would bestow on the dialogues of Plato or the discourses of Gotama Buddha. On the other hand, is it of necessity that all ministers should possess this scholarship? Is it not well here to recognise that for diversities of future operation there should be diversities of preparation? That some men should always pursue the laborious ways of Biblical learning is no doubt essential. The entire comprehension of the Bible requires the contribution of innumerable minds, familiar at once with the minutest niceties of philology and the ever-changing forms of human interest; but the knowledge of the original languages is surely not necessary for all, and too often imposes on the student a burthen which he is ill fitted to bear, and is thankful on his release from college discipline to throw off. It is not impossible, even without this knowledge, to impart some insight into the meaning and methods of textual criticism; and the far more important questions of historical criticism depend upon it only in a remoter degree. With these, indeed, all students must be acquainted. In outline, at least, some scheme of the meaning of the Bible as a whole, or perhaps separately, of its two great constituent parts, the Old Testament and the New, must be presented to them. They must understand the reconstruction of the rise and development of a religion, the growth of its institutions, the character of its polity, the significance of its manifold literature. They must drink deep of the wisdom flowing from the pure heart of Christ, if they are to convey his message and infuse his spirit; they must learn, as far as possible, to disentangle the manifold strands blended of contemporary expectation and of the believer's retrospect, which have been inwoven in the Gospel narrative; they must follow the track of the truths committed by the Teacher to his followers, and comprehend the forms which they assume in the different types, national and legal, universal and spiritual, philosophical and transcendental, connected with the names of Peter, Paul, and John. Nor must they pause here. The investigation of the Old and New Testaments, rightly conducted, will reveal to the student modes of religious life far different from his own. He will find there conceptions which he has far outgrown; he will also find conceptions so high above him that he will strive in vain throughout his whole life to realize their full meaning. Within this range he will discern many variations of spiritual altitude; he will see the scattered hints, the fragmentary utterances, the snatches of argument, upon which systems of doctrine have been reared, and churches founded, and the beliefs of men centred with passionate conviction engaging the whole forces of their being. Of all this he must take account; and the study of the origins of our religion in the Bible must be continued through the development of the mighty organisations of Christendom. By this I mean more than the political history of institutions, such as the Papacy or the Anglican establishment, more than the survey of the social and moral influences which they have exerted upon the nations amid which they were planted, more than the rise and decline of particular doctrines associated with specific Churches, Catholic or Reformed, Orthodox or Free. These are all necessary, but something more is wanted. Rather is it the different types of the spiritual life presented under varying forms by successive ages, countries, creeds, that must occupy the student's attention, the elements of human experience out of which they have grown, the specific needs to which they correspond. It is one of the perils of rationalism that it can with difficulty look with intellectual respect on any other forms of thought and feeling than its own. But it ought to be one of the endeavours of the ministry of the Free Churches to sympathise with faith and hope which may seem steeped in error, and yet, being wrought into the religious life of Christendom, may still thrill and vibrate at this hour. No man, says Goethe, really knows his own language till he knows another also. This is no less true of religion. Not till we have endeavoured to live in the spirit of a religious life different from, nay, perhaps antagonistic to, our own, to penetrate into the inner experiences of which its doctrines are the imperfect and symbolic expressions, can we possibly learn the strength and meaning of beliefs which, when tested by reason and conscience, seem absurd or even immoral, and yet feed the noblest devotion, and sustain the most heroic sacrifice. This is the complement, at once historically and spiritually, of that religious psychology of which I have spoken. If we would comprehend the power over life of the vast schemes of doctrine and polity which Christianity has produced, it is in this direction that we must look for them. And he must be presumptuous, indeed, who can rise from the great books of the Christian consciousness, from the records of its piety, from the testimony of its saints, with the conviction that they are only chapters in the "tale told by an idiot; full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Thus far I have dealt with matters which by common consent have formed part, in more or less completeness, of every scheme of education for the ministry. The difference lies in the modes of treatment; in the principles which shall guide the student's inquiries, in the method of dealing with the questions of philosophy, of criticism, of religious doctrine and devotion which he will encounter. I cannot think, however, that these subjects, extensive as they are, exhaust the whole field of preparation. The preacher who enters on his work with this equipment is apt to look back with wonder, and perhaps with discontent, that the things which he has learned at college with so much labour are of so little use to him. He cannot discourse perpetually of the last theory of the composition of the Pentateuch, or be for ever exposing the imperfect logic of the materialists. The fact is that he is confronted with life, and life is the one thing which he does not yet know. But the changed conditions of preaching declare emphatically to the minister that this is the one thing which he must know. The time is past when the preacher's duty was supposed to be discharged by the exposition of the scheme of salvation in every sermon. As soon as the profession of particular doctrines ceased to be regarded as of chief importance for acceptance with God, the stress of preaching tended to pass from dogmatics to the moral and spiritual energies. To ennoble character, to elevate conduct by inspiring great purposes, and linking the inner forces of the soul with the divine organisation of the world, becomes one, perhaps the foremost, of the preacher's aims. By the public worship which he leads, he has to help the men and women round him to go on unto perfection. He has to show them where to find strength in their trials, rest amid their agitations, guidance in their perplexities. And these are just the things he has not learned, or has only learned in a limited degree. Now it may be true that the only way to possess experience is to get it; but it is precisely the drawback of this process that it demands not only teachableness, but time, the one commodity of which the young minister has none to spare. I wish, therefore, to propose to the fathers and brethren of the Churches the possibility of presenting some kind of view of the requirements of the Christian character in the diverse phases and relations of modern life. I have spoken already of its different types as they emerge from different dogmatic bases; I desire now to speak of it as it appears in the actual circumstances of our daily existence. To write a new Imitatio Christi for the nineteenth century is, no doubt, a task of extreme difficulty, but that is no reason why it should not be attempted. The study of contemporary pulpit teaching of many schools of thought, and the culture of dramatic imagination by the highest works of fiction, are aids which the student may privately employ; but it might be possible to throw such materials into a more systematic order. Those who know anything of the Catholic books which serve as guides to the spiritual life, and as manuals to confessors, will perhaps comprehend what it might be wholesome to adopt, and what it will be imperative to avoid. The exhibition of the grounds and manifestation of specific virtues, the analysis of specific temptations, may be made to rest upon heroic example or sincere avowal, for which history and biography furnish abundant materials. Nor need the skilful teacher degrade his portraiture to the level of a collection of wax-works, or the specimens of a pathological museum. I cannot but think that the popularity and effect of such a book as Law's "Serious Call" were partly due to those incisive characterisations across every one of which was written "know thyself," "thou art the man;" while the applause which followed the recent appearance of the little volume on the duties of women, by Miss Cobbe, indicated that there might be ample room for corresponding treatment of the duties of men. And if these be fit subjects of speech to the public at large, why are they to be excluded from the training of that public's teachers, unless it be on the poor plea that it will add a fresh risk to the possibility that they will turn out prigs?

Under peril of wearying your patience this topic must be pursued yet one step further. The minister must learn to know life; but life is not only individual, it is also social. He is to preach the kingdom of God; and the kingdom of God, as Jesus announced it, has been described as an immense renovation and transformation of society. Is it less so now? Can we, any of us, believe that if Jesus of Nazareth were to become, as Theodore Parker said, Jesus of London, he would be content with what he found? The same message must yet be proclaimed, and it still receives the same interpretation, an immense renovation and transformation of society. But do we all understand what society is? Is it not the fact that we have only recently arrived at the conception of society as a whole, at the thought that it has a history, a life, a unity, of its own? Must not any effort for its amendment be in danger of missing its end, or at least of involving an unnecessary expenditure of strength, when the forces against which it is aimed are only imperfectly understood? Who can contemplate, for instance, the immense energies of English philanthropy without grief at the apparent poverty of the result? Yet do we not feel a secret conviction that the cause of failure lies not only in false estimates of the magnitude of the evils and the adequacy of our resources, but also partly in ignorance; and is not the lack of knowledge chargeable, first of all, upon those who have been entrusted with the greater share in the direction of the nation's goodwill? This is but one of the numberless instances which present themselves at every turn. What of the bases of law, the real chaacter of its obligations, and the limits of its rightful application; what of the treatment of wrongs, the resistance of injuries, the place of war in a civilisation that aspires to be Christian; how are we to reconcile the police-court and the barrack with the Sermon on the Mount? What of the whole industrial scheme of our society, its competition, its accumulation of wealth, compared with the ideal presented in the New Testament? Is it wonderful that the weary and suffering in our large towns should be alienated from a religion which seems to promise for them so much, and to perform for them so little? And if these difficulties confront the young minister as soon as he enters the homes of the people, and are urged on him by the men whose ear he is most eager to gain, is it not desirable that his previous training should include some delineation of the constitution of society, some synthesis of the forces which make it what it is, some forecast of the lines upon which all efforts for its improvement must be laid?

Such appear to me to be some of the main themes for consideration in all plans for the education of the ministry. I have named only those topics which can be treated more or less effectively in the college courses, or the private study, of the future preacher. Of the great supplement to such education which might be provided by the combined benevolence of congregations and of senior pastors, who should offer to the younger brethren that initiation into the actual work of the ministry which life alone can afford, time forbids me to speak. It must suffice to point out, in conclusion, that the ultimate character and efficiency of the ministry must rest with the congregations who supply the men, and whom they afterwards serve, rather than with the colleges which train them. To this free conference it has not seemed desirable to submit any denominational statistics; we have assembled rather to consider principles than to discuss sectarian details. Now, the causes which are likely to increase or diminish the supply of ministers are, to a large extent, those which lead to the growth or decline of religious life among the Churches, which have already engaged the attention of this assembly. It must be in the last resort with them that the duty of meeting their own demands, and the proportionate demands of the community at large, will rest. It may be in part a matter of professional status and remuneration. Men will not adopt an occupation which does not offer them a reasonable chance of making a livelihood. But this is, at any rate, a small part. The needs of religion have always been found in the long run to triumph over those of appetite or fashion. Where faith and love are strong, they will not fear hard work and scanty pay. The future of the Churches can lie but in one place—with themselves. It is for the ministers who preside over them to seek out amongst the young those most fitted by natural gifts for this high charge, and encourage them by their sympathy, and by inviting their participation in simple preparatory works. It is for the laymen who constitute those Churches to withdraw obstacles, to relinquish projects, however cherished, which might interfere with this election. Fathers, count it an honourable calling for your sons. Mothers, rejoice when for this service they leave the dear home circle. Nor is this all. It must be yours not only to remove difficulties, but actively to promote the supreme choice. Interest yourselves in the religious education of your children. Cultivate in them habits of private devotion and of public worship. Inspire them with admiration and reverence for all that is heroic in unpopular witness to the truth, all that is sublime in unflinching adherence to conviction, all that is saintly in the self-sacrifice of love, and then the future of the ministry will not be doubtful. Creed may change, and beliefs be shaped anew. Institutions may decay, and the needs from which they sprang may create other forms to meet the old wants under fresh circumstances. But the joys and sorrows of men do not change; their hopes and fears do not decay; their weakness will still cry aloud for support; their strength will ask for direction, and still will there be found souls who will stand in the presence of the Lord and, trembling at their own boldness, answer, when the divine voice calls

"Whom shall I send?" "Here am I, send me!"

The Rev. HENRY LEBSON, M.A., in opening the discussion, agreed with the reader of the paper as to the importance of ministers understanding political economy and similar subjects. It would be a very good thing for ministers generally to make themselves thoroughly familiar with the kind of thing they would have to encounter when they came in contact with the hard-headed working men of our towns—(hear, hear). For instance, to be able to explain to working men what were the true principles of wages would be a most important service for a minister to undertake. He thought there was one way out of the difficulties pointed out by Professor Carpenter. Their ministers had to make their own way, to find out their own work, and to do their work independently of any help whatever. He did not know why it was that ministers met with so little help from others, but he believed that independence of character, together with a thoroughly Christian spirit, would go very far to make a new way for the ministers, a way which would be thoroughly effective in reaching the hearts of the people. Whatever method a man found good he ought to adhere to strictly in the lines of his own simple conviction. The more in earnest the ministers were, and the more they felt themselves able to rest upon that religious object they set before themselves, the more would they have the sympathy of the people, and great good would be the result—(applause).

The Rev. C. HARGROVE (Leeds) said the duties of a minister were two-fold, viz., those which he had towards his congregation out of the pulpit, and those which he had towards them in the pulpit. He advocated a thorough apprenticeship to the work of the ministry, quite independent of the training which the student obtained. If they could give a young man a term of say one year, or even six months, in some Church under an older and experienced minister, it would be a very great gain to the younger man and not a little help to the elder—(hear). Then with regard to the duties of ministers it should be borne in mind that what was interesting to ministers had very often no attraction whatever for their congregations. For example, the people, as a rule, did not care at all for the subtleties of biblical criticism, which did not all affect the difficulties of their daily life. What they wanted in the pulpit was to understand the hearts of men, what they were thinking about, and what were the trials of their everyday life, to be able to sympathise with them and to give them the help and consolation they required, and the power of doing this was what the professors in the colleges should strive to impart to the students under them—(applause).

Mr. JAMES HEXWOOD spoke in favour of modernising the system of education, of diminishing the quantity of ancient learning taught, and increasing the quantity of science. By the latter change a minister would be able to make himself interesting to a larger body of his congregation. He had for instance followed Professor Henslow through Kew-gardens, and heard him discourse with the knowledge of a master on botanical subjects, and it would be a great advantage if a man like his friend Mr. Crosskey were to take a body of Sunday scholars to a Museum, even if it were on a Sunday—(hear). This was a great time for the revision of the Scripture texts, and he thought that as they were going to have a revised Hebrew text, there was no necessity for young men to be specially trained in Hebrew. What men and women wanted to know was how they might be made better and happier, and they did not care about the differences in particular words.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS (London) said he had had no special training himself, and his view from experience and observation was that preaching was useless unless a man had the inward call. Sometimes training spoiled a man—(hear). One essential, in fact the greatest essential, was the prayerful and devotional spirit.

Mr. HARRY RAWSON followed with a Paper on "Ministers' Stipends and Augmentation Funds."

MINISTERS' STIPENDS AND AUGMENTATION FUNDS.

BY MR. HARRY RAWSON.

About eighteen years ago my excellent and valued friend—the late Mr. Robert M. Shipman—frequently called attention to the inadequate remuneration of the ministers of the Unitarian and other Free Churches of England. His active brain and earnest sympathies supplied the ideas and suggestions which, under his guidance, I threw into the shape of correspondence with ministerial friends and communications to the Press. He also introduced the question, in lucid and persuasive speeches, at several meetings of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire; and invited a large number of laymen, from different parts of the country, to a social meeting in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, when an animated discussion ensued. His liberal purse furnished all the funds required in this unpretending but useful agitation. I say "useful," because it elicited a number of valuable facts and suggestions; and that some permanent good resulted from it is presumable from one fact alone, viz., that whereas I could at that time count on four fingers the stipends reaching £500, I cannot now reckon them on all the fingers of both hands.

But when I acceded to the request of the Conference Committee to take up this important question on the present occasion, I resolved to make my inquiries at once more extensive and systematic than had ever before, to my knowledge, been attempted. In addition to the matter of stipends, I deemed it advisable to seek for the fullest information attainable as to the existing means—by funds, endowments, and societies—for augmenting the incomes of "poor and deserving ministers of the gospel," and for aiding them and their families in other ways.

In the first place, I despatched to every Unitarian and other Free Church minister in charge of a congregation in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, a circular, asking for replies to a number of questions as to income, place of education, length of service, the mode in which the church funds were raised, and so on; enclosing a form for the answers he might be kind enough to supply, and an envelope addressed and stamped—of which a copy will be found in the appendix to this paper. The number posted was 284. Most of the replies came back with great promptitude, evincing much kindness and confidence. I have received in all (a most satisfactory response) 258. In some forty to fifty cases I was favoured also, in addition to the official paper (if I may venture so to call it), with letters containing a mass of information, minute, varied, and valuable—with numerous particulars (some of them sufficiently painful), many excellent suggestions and recommendations; and most generous offers of any supplementary statements that I might require. To all these, my respected correspondents, and to the thirty-eight friends—mostly laymen—who not less readily furnished answers to my inquiries as to Augmentation and other Funds, I now offer, collectively, the grateful acknowledgments that it has been impossible to make in every individual case. From the sources thus indicated I have compiled the following tables, which will also be found in the appendix.

- The districts whence the answers have come.
- The colleges, and other academical institutions at which the ministers have been educated.
- The university degrees, or literary and scientific distinctions they have earned.
- The number of years up to this time spent in the ministry.
- The number of settlements in which they have been engaged.
- The official designations of their chapels.
- The stipends they receive, including value of parsonage, contributions in aid from Missionary Associations, &c., but not including grants from Augmentation Funds.
- The geographical distribution of stipends under £100; and of those of £100, but under £150.

Anxious, as far as possible, to respect your limitations as to time, I shall make only the briefest reference to any of these tables save the one marked (g).—On table (b) (compiled from my letters and from the "Unitarian Almanac") I remark, that of 288 ministers on active duty, 24 report themselves as prepared in schools, by ministers, or by private study and tuition; whilst 57 others give no return as to the place of their education.*

On table (d) I find the interesting fact that nine faithful men have spent over 50 years in the service, viz.: three of 50 to 55 years; three of 55 to 60 years; two of 60 to 65; and there is one veteran of 66 years.

* I observe in the "Congregational Year-book" a list of Congregational ministers in England, from which it appears that of 2,036 ministers, 549 are not described as having had a collegiate training. Of this class our statistics indicate a somewhat larger proportion.

I now return to table (g), which I must, if you please, consider in detail, as it forms the basis of most of the statements and suggestions which it is my duty to submit for your consideration. This return shows that there are—

45 stipends under £100
56 stipends of £100 but under £150
70 " 150 "	200
33 " 200 "	250
10 " 250 "	300
10 " 300 "	350
10 " 350 "	400
6 " 400 "	500
13 " 500 and upwards.

I estimate the total income of the 253 returns in which this item is supplied to be £46,543, which gives an average of about £184.

When one considers what privation is implied by forty-five stipends under £100 a year, and fifty-six which, though reaching this humble figure, yet fall short of £150, one desires to look narrowly into the several cases to seek what particulars they disclose. I find several instances where intelligent and excellent laymen are keeping open—for a pecuniary acknowledgment which hardly defrays their travelling expenses—chapels too impoverished to maintain a minister; and which, but for the surrender every week-end of hard-earned leisure, must inevitably be closed. There is another case where, for a nominal consideration, the active and laborious secretary of a popular educational institution gives up his Sunday rest to preach to a small but faithful band. Yet a more remarkable illustration is contained in the following quotation from a letter:—"Mine," says the writer, "is a peculiar case. There has been no regular preacher here for more than forty years; and I have kept the Unitarian chapel open for services every Sunday, with few exceptions, for all that long time. The only salary I have had has been £5 annually from Jones's Fund. I am half way through my eighty-third year, and have to work hard at gardening when weather permits." And this worthy man concludes with the following suggestion:—"My impression is, that we had better sell our chapel, and give the money it would bring to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It's only a waste of money and time going on in our present position. It is a hopeless case." Supporting himself mainly by non-professional engagements is an excellent man, who, for about £30 per annum, officiates at four places of worship in the course of a month. "On Sundays," he says, "between two churches I walk a distance of eleven miles, preaching at each place of worship. The alternate Sunday I walk between the return journey a distance of thirty-four miles, ministering twice each Sunday. Thus you see that, in the course of a month, I walk ninety miles; preaching twice each Sunday for the pittance I receive."

But besides self-sacrificing laymen there are ministers who, after surrendering their professional vocation, have retired into country districts for a restful old age, and who have in pure kindness, or for the merest acknowledgment that a decayed interest could supply, again undertaken pulpit duties; and are keeping together, by their ill-requited services, a little society that else must speedily expire. One case there is of a peculiar and most gratifying kind, in which a few pounds a year are accepted as a nominal stipend, but really to be expended eight or ten fold in a ministry conceived in a spirit of noble self-sacrifice; and in which culture and leisure and wealth are devoted without stint, and with a zeal truly apostolic, towards the moral and spiritual welfare of a poor population in a dull manufacturing town. But, alas, there is a large number of instances where private resources and arduous labours are not thus found in happy combination.

With respect to the localisation of the forty-five stipends under £100, I find that (Table k)

4 are in Ireland.
14 " in Wales.
11 " North of the Trent in England.
16 " South " " "

Of the fifty-six which reach £100 but are under £150,—

1 is in Scotland.

14 are in Ireland.

1 is in Wales.

18 are North of the Trent in England.

22 " South " " "

Several of the most unsatisfactory of these miserable stipends are found in a group of churches in the South of England and in Wales, the congregations of which appear to have parted with almost every spark of vitality. It is, perhaps, a sanguine hope that they can ever be so far revived as to supply a tolerable living to the occupants of their pulpits. A serious question thus arises whether, if some provision could be made for their ministers, and the chapels disposed of, the interests of religion would not be thereby consulted, and some worthy men be removed from a position depressing and irksome in the last degree. Very sad are many of the cases reported to me from Wales. In the whole of the principality I can hear of but two stipends of £100 and upwards. I am informed that payments in kind are not infrequently made, which, in some degree, help a shadowy income. But a new source of privation threatens many excellent pastors in this way,—that whereas they have hitherto supplemented their resources by school-keeping, there has of late been an increasing tendency to send to large educational establishments the children of the rich, whilst those of the poor are being absorbed into the Board schools, now finding their way into even the remotest parts of the country. One minister of twenty-three years' service—all in one charge—receives £26 per annum; two others, after eighteen and twenty years respectively, are paid £30 each—these gentlemen are alumni of a well-known college. One, who was a student at the same institution, and subsequently at yet another, and who holds a University degree, receives £75; and another, a Master of Arts of a Scotch University, is paid the stipend of £50. These cases, distressing as they are, I give only as samples of a large class. In the South of England (as we have seen) there are sixteen congregations, which raise stipends of less than £100 each. Here one of the main causes of decay has been that the tide of emigration to the larger centres of trade has carried off the young and enterprising, leaving their unfortunate ministers

"Bound in shallows and in miseries."

Here, too, in these rural districts, as in Wales, many of the more learned divines kept boarding schools, or, as they were commonly termed, academies—doing an invaluable work in the promotion of liberal education, when the Universities were closed against all dissenters from the national Church. Thus furnished with their chief means of support, they were "passing rich on forty pounds a year," their accustomed professional income. Their congregations, therefore, anxious not to waste their resources, paid their pew-rents on the scale of a judicious economy. But when the tutor lost his pupils the minister became dependent solely on his stipend, which, however, displayed no undue haste to meet the new requirements, but remained steadily attached to the old standard.

Another prolific cause of the failure of the present and some former generations, reasonably to recompense their religious teachers and guides, is the vicious system of relying exclusively on the foundations bequeathed by pious forefathers. Here is an illustration:—"The congregation contributes nothing to my income. The endowment comes from a farm, and is £150, when I get it. I keep a school, or I couldn't live." Another, where the minister's income is £231, including parsonage, the endowments are £340. About £20 a year is the produce of congregational zeal. These endowments are like a "dead hand," paralysing all present effort. It seems literally true, in some instances, that the churchyard rather than the church supports the ministrations of the place. A frequent form of congregational parsimony is developed in this way. A parsonage, or other endowed property, gets out of order. The treasurer of the congregation calmly deducts the costs of repairs from the inadequate stipend of the minister, and this whilst the members give not a tithe of the income derived from their ancestors. In one instance, most of the endowments were left to the minister; but they were appropriated years ago for cleaning, lighting, &c. A correspondent remarks:—"I wish I could convey to you the strong sense I have of the corrupting influence of these old endowments when (as is common) they flow through hereditary channels, and the trouble they have prepared for ministers who seek to exercise an independent and spiritually powerful ministry. The love of patronage they foster in some, the servility they breed in others, constitute a real and often a fatal hindrance to true growth." At times there is a want of honourable consideration towards ministers, which is lamentable to contemplate. Instances are supplied to me where agreements to pay a given stipend are entirely disregarded, and remain unfulfilled. Often, too, there is a censurable lack of punctuality in the payment of the stipend, and who does not know how seriously the inconveniences of a limited income are aggravated when uncertainty prevails as to the receipt of it? The treasurers are often, it would appear, merely the bankers of the church, and decline to pay a penny over what they have actually received, and, of course, the minister suffers thereby. It would seem that the same cause of just complaint is given on the other side of the Atlantic, for a minister there remarks, in one of the newspapers:—"If I should tell how my salary is allowed to run on; how I have borrowed money at eight per cent to keep from debt while the church was owing me; how, in a recent collection for a poor missionary church, I was obliged to give over one-third of the entire amount to make up the required sum; you would think that somewhere in this great city there was something wrong." In a strictly business spirit, one treasurer, I learn, compels his minister to pay five per cent. out of his pittance of £70 per annum for the collection of the pew rents; and another minister generously contributes to his own stipend, in order that it may be sustained for the benefit of his successors. I have heard of a transaction which did not redound to the credit of either party. A minister applied to a fund for a grant, which, however, it appeared, could be made only where the salary was under £100. His income being exactly £100, it was arranged that his congregation should pay him £1 less than that amount. The benefaction of £5 was then obtained; whereupon the astute worshippers dropped the stipend to £94, on the ground that their minister would still receive, with the new contribution, the £99 which he had expressed his willingness to accept from them!

I am gratified to learn that, in several quarters, these intolerable evils have compelled increased attention to financial matters on the part of certain congregations. In a number of chapel reports kindly sent to me from various parts of England, the accounts are presented in a form which leaves nothing to be desired. From Ireland, too, I have received several valuable documents of this kind. The Presbytery of Antrim has issued some admirable suggestions on this subject, accompanied with model forms for keeping church funds which, for simplicity of arrangement and fulness of detail, are highly commendable. Everything ought to be done that is feasible to diffuse accurate information among religious societies as to their secular affairs, so as to attract the interest of every member to the condition of the common funds.

I cannot leave this part of my subject without earnestly asking your attention to one prolific cause of dissatisfaction, weakness, and decay. I allude to the extraordinary haste, the defective information, and the general want of prudence with which the congregations sometimes elect their spiritual pastors and guides. A couple of sermons or so, and the important selection is made! An ill-assorted match ensues—"married in haste," both parties "repent at leisure." "We ought," says a valued correspondent, in referring to this point, "to be so thoroughly organised ecclesiastically, whilst perfectly free theologically, that no one could enter our ministry without a recognised qualification any more than he could enter the medical profession; and we have suffered, and are suffering, serious loss for want of such an understanding." Unfortunately the Free Churches pay, as is perhaps inevitable, a certain price for their liberty of action. They have no elaborate apparatus for sifting the qualifications of their candidates. In this respect they differ from every other religious body with which I am acquainted. We all know what the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church is in this matter. In the Episcopal Church of England the Bishop—in the Scotch Church the Presbytery—with the Methodists the Conference—are severally charged with the duty and responsibility of assessing the competency and character of an aspirant for religious work in their communion. Among the Congregationalists and Baptists, as I understand, at least a double and a weeding process takes place—first, the Church, i.e., the communicants, and, secondly, the congregation, deliberates and decides. As a matter of course, our Free Churches could tolerate no conceivable interference with the absolute independence of each. But this consideration renders it surely all the more expedient that the selection of a minister should be regarded as a most solemn, delicate, and responsible duty; that ample guarantees should be obtained not only that he has enjoyed a suitable education and training for his important work, but that his qualifications should be adapted to the special requirements of the congregation. A minister well fitted for one sphere may prove unsatisfactory in another. The round man should not be put into the square hole. Of course, one of the causes of a brief and unsatisfactory connection may be that a minister insufficiently appreciates the necessity of pursuing his work with system, industry, and good sense. It is, perhaps, more necessary than is commonly supposed that he should apply to his professional duties many of the qualities which make the successful man of business, who, in the first place, has chosen a line of life for which he has a special aptitude; who has served a long and painstaking apprenticeship; who, when emancipated from it, makes his work his first and paramount consideration; who tries for success in one way, and, in case of failure, then attempts another, in an energetic and enterprising spirit. At the same time, I must add, that unreasonable requirements from a minister are also a frequent source of disappointment and mischief. People demand the maximum of qualification at the minimum of remuneration. Harper's Magazine relates that the faculty of one of the largest theological seminaries in the United States received, some time since, a letter, in which the inhabitants of a small town in Kansas applied to them for a young clergyman to take charge of their spiritual education. The long and formidable array of qualifications which the minister must possess, and the extremely meagre salary attached to the position, threw the good doctors of the faculty into something akin to despair. After much thought, one suggested that the reply should run thus:—"The only man of whom we know who could satisfy you is our revered college president, now dead some few years, and who, having accustomed himself to heavenly food (air) could perhaps eke out a bare subsistence upon the salary which you propose." This, after due deliberation, was rejected, and the next proposal was listened to. "We know of no one, excepting the apostle Paul, who approaches to your standard of piety; he might preach of a Sunday, and get his living by sail-making on week-days." This was at length rejected, and the following reply was finally hit upon and despatched:—"We know of no man good enough for you, or who could possibly live on the salary you mention. We therefore advise you to make an effort to secure the angel Gabriel, who could board in Heaven, and come down on Sundays to preach."

Several of my ministerial correspondents have expressed their opinion that the present quality of pulpit ability is not equal to the average of former times, and that merely giving better stipends will not fully meet the case. "The labourer is worthy of his hire," says one, "and no more." Whilst, however, I think it impossible to fix too high a standard, I desire to record my impression that many of our pulpits are, at the present moment, graced with eloquence, earnestness, and culture, equal (taking the men age for age and experience with experience) with those of any previous period. I hold, nevertheless, that there is still too much of inadequate preparation and training; and that if the Free Churches are to maintain their position, they must rigidly exact the highest qualifications obtainable alike in character and in scholarship.

A few remarks may here be admissible on the different modes which prevail of raising church revenues. The method most in vogue is that of paying a stipulated quarterly sum for one or more sittings, or for a pew. This system appears, perhaps, in its best form when, as seems increasingly the case, a very low rate is fixed per sitting—one that practically excludes none who are wishful for membership; and then a voluntary subscription list is opened, through which every one can contribute in proportion to his means, be they small or great. There is a case where they range from £1 to £25 per annum. This plan claims the great merit of elasticity. One minister writes:—"We place our reliance entirely on voluntary subscriptions. Since we adopted them, and abandoned pew rents, our income has nearly doubled." I do not observe any extension of popularity for the offertory, pure and simple. Indeed, I suppose there are not more than two or three instances where it is maintained as the sole means of support. In a number of cases it has been found necessary to supplement it by subscriptions, so as to correct its inconvenient fluctuations, and to secure a fixed income for the minister. It is charged against it by some that it tends to isolate a congregation from general sympathies and interests; and that when an offertory is devoted to an external object, it extorts perhaps three-fourths the amount from the minister. Of course, if the congregation rose to its duties by adequately augmenting its contribution for the special occasion, this hardship would not be inflicted. But, practically, the bags are not then made exceptionally productive. In several letters I find sentiments corresponding more or less to the pithy remark of a correspondent who says:—"I emphatically condemn the offertory. It is too good for ordinary human nature."

Leaving this branch of my subject, I now proceed to that of augmentation and other funds. I have compiled a series of tables from the valuable information courteously supplied by numerous friends, exhibiting the resources now existing for supplementing the stipends of ministers, making provision for their widows, assisting them in the education of their children, and also for the aiding of young men in the prosecution of their studies for the ministry. These tables, and a number of descriptive notes on the history and constitution of these funds, I reserve for my appendix. I must disclaim all pretence to entire accuracy, though I have spared no effort to make these returns as complete as possible. They are as follows:—

- (1) Funds for augmenting ministerial stipends.
- (2) Funds for widows.
- (3) Funds for aiding students for the ministry.
- (4) Funds which contribute to some or all of the foregoing and kindred purposes.
- (5) Funds supported in whole or in part by annual subscriptions.

It is impossible to withhold the expressions of one's admiration for the generous consideration and substantial beneficence implied by these tables. A similar illustration of kindly interest in the comfort and welfare of their ministers and families is displayed by the Congregational body, in whose "Year-book for 1882" I find about thirty societies or endowments, established to supplement insufficient stipends, and for other equally meritorious objects. Yet I, for one, cannot but regret that, from any cause, so vast an amount of eleemosynary aid should have been called forth for an order of men whose education and social position, and the nature of whose services to religion and society ought to have secured them an absolute and dignified independence of charitable aid. The question presents itself,—would such measures have been required had every recipient of their counsel, instruction, and sympathy competently assessed the extent of his individual pecuniary obligations towards them?

This imperfect appreciation of the claims of the ministry is not peculiar to the Unitarian and other Free Churches. It is by no means

"A fee-grief due to some single breast."

It is the opprobrium of all Churches,—Orthodox or heterodox, Established or Dissenting. I have reason to believe that in the Baptist Connexion the average of stipends is under £150 per annum. According to the last report of the "Baptist Union Pastors' Income Augmentation Fund," no fewer than 186 churches have sought its assistance, and 179 have been helped. No pastor is eligible for a grant whose income reaches £150, and the larger number receive less than £100 per annum. During the last seven or eight years I have no doubt that some improvement has been effected in the incomes of Congregational ministers; but in the official year, 1873-4, the conference of deacons maintained that "no minister ought to receive a smaller stipend than £150, and that in cities and towns there should be a proportionate increase." But of the 1,527 Congregational ministers then in actual charge of pulpits, there were 668, or rather more than 43 per cent., whose professional income was below £150. The same low scale of—not remuneration—but say of acknowledgment, prevails in the Church of England. In the annual report for the year 1880 of "The Curates' Augmentation Fund," it is stated, as a melancholy fact, that "while the average stipend of the curate of fifteen years' service is but £136, there is a steady decrease of about £1 each year, until the average stipend of the curate over fifty years' service falls to the pittance, in his old age, of £100 per annum!"

Now, in all these Churches the almost sole remedial measure has been to establish societies and funds in aid of salaries which ought, from the first, to have been made adequate to the comforts of a decent subsistence. What is wanted—urgently, promptly—is, that the general estimate of religion, as represented in its public and other offices, should be materially enhanced all along the line of our different Churches and denominations. Certain ordinary arguments for stinted contributions towards this end should be utterly discountenanced. It is sometimes urged, for example, in extenuation of an inadequate stipend, that the minister has private means, or if he hadn't "property," he had been where "property" was, and had married a rich wife. Imagine how impertinent such an argument would appear if applied to the fees we pay our doctors, or the bills sent in by our lawyers! The fact is, there is the most pressing need for a change in this matter so radical as to amount to a revolution. "The constituency of givers has to be developed and educated," is the observation of an American writer; and he adds this salutary advice:—"Our ministers and laymen should see to it, that this subject is talked over in all the parishes, and the persuasive word spoken in the ear of those who would themselves be benefited by giving large help to the cause."

But I shall be expected to offer some practical suggestions by way of summarising and closing this too lengthy paper; and I will do so very briefly. What practical measures are immediately demanded by the circumstances of the case? Well, I confess, that in the face of existing means so copious as those presented in my tables, the establishment of any new fund requires some consideration. Undoubtedly, the stress lies chiefly in Wales, and in country districts in the South and East of England. Several of my correspondents are of opinion that, by friendly co-operation among the authorities of existing funds, there could be secured to every deserving minister a minimum stipend of £150. One exceedingly well-informed friend declares it to be within his knowledge that there are trusts south of the Trent more than equal to the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund (Liverpool). With more unity of operation they could be rendered possibly yet more efficient, and able to cover every valid claim.

I am disposed to offer the following recommendations:—First and foremost, and as of the supremest importance, that we laymen should devote immediate attention to the just demands made upon us by the ministry for the invaluable and multifarious services it renders to us personally, to our families, and to society. There is needed an uprising of the general conscience in this particular, and a determination to make those efforts which, involving some conscious sacrifice, are alone worthy of the cause. Without this I have no faith in organisations for the supplementing of stipends. With it I believe the energies of our ministers would be so stimulated, and their pulpit and other powers so expanded, as to radiate a new and invigorating influence on us and on the world. Their hearts and ours would then be baptised into a fresh spirit of confidence, courage and hope, kindling an unwonted fire on the altar of our common endeavours after righteousness, piety, and truth. In the second place, as "waste not, want not,"

is a maxim of universal application, it may perhaps be suggested, with all respect, that the administration of existing funds should be scrutinised, with a view to any possible improvement. In all cases, I venture to think the rule should be inflexible,—1st, to make grants of a substantial amount; 2nd, on proved merit in the applicant; 3rd, with the requirement of a simultaneous and proportionate effort on the part of the congregation. Thirdly:—That, if possible (and I cannot despair of its being done with the entire respect for the independence of every trust), some common understanding should be effected among the various committees and managers, to prevent what may be termed “overlapping” in their operations; to see that, on the one hand, modest men lose nothing by reticence, and that, on the other, success is not achieved mainly by persevering application. Fourthly:—That as the multiplication of machinery is not always contributory to a desired end, I respectfully suggest one of these to courses, either that the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—as a central body composed of proved and trusted men representing the Non-Subscribing Churches, and holding relations of confidence with the ministry everywhere, should be requested to take up this matter as an integral portion of its functions—or that the committee of this Conference, if reappointed, should prosecute the inquiry which it has this day begun. If its conclusion be that existing resources are insufficient, then let it consider itself empowered to make an appeal for additional supplies—an appeal which, I believe, will meet with a prompt and adequate response. Wisely administered, such aid would lift a load of care from many anxious hearts, and prove “twiced blessed,”—“blessing him that gives, and him that takes.”

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN, of London, thought the chief comment that could be made on Mr. Rawson's admirable paper was that it was eminently creditable to them as a denomination that their ministers should be in the position described—(hear). But he entirely disagreed with the suggestion that some of the small and poor congregations should be discontinued. He hoped they would never do this, that they would never abandon a spot where they had once raised the banner of free religion—(applause). He thought the last recommendation in the paper was one that should be carried out at once.

The Rev. H. IERSON pointed out that the words in the paper in reference to the poor churches were “where they had lost every spark of vitality.” Mr. Rawson was the last man to see any church given up if it could be avoided.

The CHAIRMAN then moved the following resolution:—“That in the opinion of this Conference it is desirable that a sustentation fund be established, in addition to the fund which now exists for the augmentation of the stipends of ministers, and that this resolution be referred to the Conference Committee.” Unless something further was done than had been done so far he did not see how they could go on. What was the duty of people to those who were less fortunate in the world than themselves but to give them help? Many of their ministers had done good service in the cause of free religion, and had helped to keep up a standard of Unitarianism in England, and it would be a shame to set them aside when the fruits of their labours were now being enjoyed. He thought that the congregations generally all through the country were very remiss indeed in the scale of stipends which they gave to their ministers, and they ought to feel thoroughly ashamed of themselves, and to be shamed into doing more than they had even done before.

Mr. WILLIAM RATHBONE, M.P., seconded the resolution. He thought it was most important in making this movement successful that the committee to whom the subject was referred should go thoroughly into all the details, and ascertain clearly what sum would be required to give each minister a decent stipend, hoping always, of course, that the congregations would supplement those amounts. He suggested that the committee should place themselves in communion with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and ask their assistance in carrying out the scheme—(applause).

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL read an extract from a letter received from Dr. Vance Smith expressing a hope that something would be done at once towards commencing an augmentation or sustentation fund, and offering to be one of a hundred persons each to subscribe £100 towards the object in view. Mr. Steintthal also stated that an offer had been made to him by a gentleman who was willing to be one of twenty to subscribe £25 a year each for five years to come—(applause).

Mr. COLLIER and Mr. SPEARS supported the resolution, which was put, and carried unanimously.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL moved a resolution expressing the sympathy of the Conference with the American free Churches in the great loss recently sustained by the deaths of three men closely connected with the Liberal religious communion, viz., H. W. Longfellow, Dr. Orville Dewey, and Dr. H. W. Bellows.

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN seconded the resolution, which was carried, and acknowledged by the Rev. HOBART CLARKE on behalf of the American Unitarian Association.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER, treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, moved a resolution, appointing a committee empowered to call another similar Conference at any time they might think desirable.

The Rev. H. IERSON seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. J. LUPTON moved a vote of thanks to the Reception Committee, and to those who had extended their hospitality to the members of the Conference. Before doing so he announced, amidst loud applause, that a gentleman who did not wish his name to be mentioned had just intimated to him his wish to subscribe £1,000 to the Sustentation Fund. He (Mr. Lupton) felt sure that this would be only one of a number of offers of a similar kind.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, and carried by acclamation, and Mr. H. W. MEADE-KING having acknowledged the vote on behalf of the Local Committee, the proceedings of the Conference were brought to a close with singing and prayer.

[It is now well known that the donor of £1,000 is Mr. Henry Tate, of Streatham-common, London, formerly of Liverpool, the son of a late well-known Unitarian Minister.]

THE SOIREE.

On Wednesday evening a soirée was held in the Philharmonic Hall. Mr. D. AINSWORTH, M.P., presided, and there was an attendance of about 2,500 persons. Many objects of beauty and interest were exhibited, and an excellent programme of music was provided.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, acknowledged the energy which the local committee had shown in arranging for the Conference, and the hospitality which they had experienced. He referred to the absence of the Rev. Dr. Martineau through advancing age, Mr. Richard, M.P., Mr. Price, and other friends; and read letters of cordial interest in the Conference from some of them. He was afraid that the very fact of this Conference being, in the first instance, somewhat initiated by the Unitarian body had had something to do with keeping some away, some that they would willingly greet as friends amongst them that night. In all these measures of social improvement and advancement somebody must begin, and as nobody else began it, they decided to begin it this year. They had had a brilliant example set them in America by what had been done there. Certainly none of them that night could regret the steps they had taken, and they could only hope that on some future occasion, when their views might be better understood by the other Nonconformist and Free Churches, they might have them amongst them, and working with them. They had not met for speeches that evening, but for social conversation and relaxation. They had had a hard day's business. Three gentlemen had a few brief remarks to offer. They all knew that in another place there was so much speechifying that they were obliged to introduce measures to curb that volubility, and he hoped there would be no necessity for taking similar measures there—(hear.) He would now call upon the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, F.G.S., to state the objects of the Conference—(cheers.)

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY said that everyone present would, he was sure, realise the deep and abiding joy of his heart at the tone and spirit that had characterised the meetings of this Conference—(hear)—at the broad and kindly and generous spirit with which every subject had been discussed; and especially at the fact that the one great element which had come to the front, and had awakened attention and had emphasised the meetings, had been the devout and religious spirit in which all their proceedings had been conducted. They did not meet as vain speculators only caring for problems for which no solution could be found—not chiefly desirous of opposing established dogmas and attacking received beliefs—(hear, hear)—not as men who would add yet another petty creed to the already multifarious professions of faith in Christendom; but as friends of worshipping bodies, bound together by old historic association, and uniting freedom of thought with devoutness of heart—(applause)—furnishing havens for those who might reject many superstitions as they believed, and yet retained an earnest desire to worship God, believing in that Gospel as the most potent weapon with which to meet the sins and passions of the world, and to establish the Kingdom of God. What purpose did they believe had been accomplished at this Conference? In the first place, the opinions—the intelligent opinions—of those present would be extremely diverse. Some of them would hold one theory touching the composition of the Bible; others believed that the great order of nature was the eternal miracle of God; and that anything which broke in upon that order, and was commonly called a miracle, was but legend. Others believed in theories touching Jesus Christ and his place in the rank of being, which others might reject; and some turned simply to the ideal character that his life presented; and others to certain signs and symbols that were associated with it. Some held one theory touching the Creation; and some believed that in Darwin they had a man who stood by the side of Galileo and of Newton in the history of the world—(applause). But what came from all their meetings but this? The first thing they desired was to take together the communion binding them to the Spirit of the great Master of Nazareth, and the very thing that came uppermost in their discussions was the religious life of their Churches—(hear) Wild and random words had been spoken touching the tendencies of the Free Churches of England. They had been charged with becoming Agnostic and Atheistic. Strange slanders had been flung against them; but he was proud to know that many to whom the mystery of the world is dark worshipped amongst them; and God forbid that they should drive from their places of worship one single soul that found peace therein—(applause). But they scarce need say—it was like saying that they were not thieves and liars—that those who ministered in their Churches, those who conducted their devotional work, were those whose greatest desire it was to bring the Spirit of God into the hearts of His children. Then there had resulted from the Conference a clearer understanding of the special position of these Churches. They united two principles—the one, ecclesiastical freedom with the frank expression of personal belief. Union in worship must be brought about not by artificial means, but by natural sympathies. When they asserted their freedom they did not mean that opinions were of no consequence; that an Unitarian could not say he was an Unitarian, and that because of his freedom he lost the right to profess his personal belief. Such a contention, to him, would falsify freedom. He was an Unitarian of Unitarians; and because he was a free man, and a worshipper in a free Church, he claimed the right to express his convictions. In no finite human words could they define the infinite truth of God. Neither did they consider that there was any necessity for union of spirit in worship; but of course, as in common life, sympathy must come with more or less kindred convictions, and union in worship must come from natural sympathies. They held the proof of this to be the fact that as men worshipped together they saw what things were great and what were small, and the sanctities of the Kingdom of God shining in upon them were greater than the technicalities of theological debate—(applause). Another point which was true of this Conference was that it had thoroughly established that they were one people, that these non-subscribing Churches now constituted one body, and that there was no probability or possibility of any disunion existing amongst them—(loud applause). Some friends thought that the stress and strain of their differences was too great for unity; but this Conference had established beyond dispute the fact that they were one in spirit, one in religion, and one in worship, despite their intellectual differences—(hear). There was one word which he should be glad to see banished from their vocabulary, and that was the speaking of the old school and of the new school of advanced Unitarians, and of unadvanced Unitarians. He knew nothing of those divisions. He could not for the life of him say whether he was advanced or unadvanced, or whether of the old school or of the new. He only knew this, that he held that view of life which shone to him with a divine radiance from the pages of the gospel, and that he sought in that love of God the redemption for human sin—(hear, hear). With a world of sin and passion before them, with the great truth of God for them to follow, with His spirit in their hearts, for God's sake let these war cries of bitter debate pass away from their midst, and let them be one people, with one heart and one mind. Some people said they were of the school of Channing, others of the school of Theodore Parker, others of the school of Priestley, and others of the school of Martineau. But here, again, he knew no separate school. The religion of these men was one and the same. Who could say one word against the religious spirit of discipleship to Christ of Theodore Parker, or who would venture to say that in the fabric which he had constructed he did not believe on the foundations on which the eternal temple stood, and in the sublime self-sacrifice of himself was kindred with Channing and a prophet with Martineau—(hear). There was but one school, and just as the apostle had rebuked those who said "We are of Christ," let there be no separate cries of party amongst them any more than in all the times that were gone. They were all baptised into one spirit, the ideal of one divine life, the grandeur of one eternal hope, and the love of one most merciful God—(applause). There was only one other point that he would dwell upon, and that was the sympathy between ministers and laymen, and between congregation and congregation, which would be the happy result of this conference. Ministers knew their deficiencies perhaps better than laymen did. He knew that he could put his finger upon the weak points of his own ministry a great deal better than some of his critics; but he believed this, that the ministers who were serving this great body of Churches were men to whom their generous fellowship and help would be most acceptable, as he believed it to be most deserved. Just let them think a moment on the position of many of their ministers in lonely villages and small towns scattered through the land, where theological enmity meant social division. They had to struggle with hard poverty, and against all the powers that were arrayed against them, and they had often to hear men, who preached the very thoughts that they preached, praised and honoured, while they themselves were only treated as saying things which were matters of course. They were often leading lonely and unfriended lives, and they deserved the kindest and heartiest sympathies from the great body of their Churches and the good-hearted fellowship of the laymen. These kindly sympathies would bind them together, ministers and laymen, into one people, because every layman was as much a minister of God as they were. Every layman who was baptised in the Spirit of God and of Christ was a prophet of God as much or more than any one who simply had to speak upon sacred things. The kindly sympathies quickened by this meeting would bring forth abundant and blessed results. It was in this union as it was in the union of home. Where there was love a thousand misunderstandings were impossible; where hearts were divided, trifles light as air would break the peace of the day. Let there be a baptism of holy love of ministers and people, and they should be as one, and the Spirit of God would descend upon their hearts. He for one, who, had been brought up from childhood in these Churches, whose whole life had been given to such service as his powers could render, had longed and prayed for the day that had come upon them now. He had moaned over their divisions, he had sorrowed over many bitternesses; but now he heard all the melodies of diviner music conquering all their petty divergencies, and they were baptised with the Spirit. This was the day of their renewed consecration. The people might say, what practical work have you done? He said that if they had quickened religious life, if they had awakened religious sympathies, they had opened a fountain of waters that should heal the life of the world. What practical work did Jesus Christ do? He preached and taught, and in preaching and teaching changed the civilisation of the world. Let their hearts be baptised with this spirit, and say, "let the heavens open." This was the day of their consecration, and he heard, as it were, the voice of our Lord saying out, "Ye are my beloved children in whom I am well pleased," because they knew their weakness and inefficiencies; but, looking upon them as the representatives of the Free Churches of England, seeing in their varied Churches the homes of a pure and a free and reverent faith, he did hear the voice of the Master himself as saying, "Ye shall be my beloved children, helping to redeem my world from its sins and passions, bound together in heart and life from this day forward, one people with one heart, baptised with one spirit"—(loud applause).

The CHAIRMAN said among the friends on the platform were two gentlemen who had come from America. Unfortunately the time at their disposal would not allow of hearing them both, but he would call upon one of them to address the meeting.

The Rev. PITT DILLINGHAM, who was very cordially received, then addressed the meeting. He said he could not help thinking as he came over, one day when they struck into the gulf's stream, that had it not been for that wonderful current which washed the shores of England that country could not be what she had been, or what she was. And now he struck another gulf stream of deeper and more vital consequence to England than that which came from the tropics—the gulf stream which flowed from the hearts of the English people, the stream of faith in God, and of hearty good will towards men. He was not instructed on the other side to make a speech. The eloquent lips of the denomination on the other side were on their way here, and they would hear from them later on—(applause). His colleague and himself had come to play the parts of eyes and ears—to see all they could and to listen, to get rather than to give. He must also say they played the part of the hand, and it would be pleasant to grasp the right hand of fellowship of the Conference. If there was one thing they welcomed on the other side it was the "Positive Aspects of Liberal Christianity" in England. They had lately received something of the kind in America, and while they welcomed that book still more did they welcome the sight of that Conference, not only for what it promised for the future—and surely they all trusted it was but the beginning of what was to come—but for what it bore witness to in the present. They were all impressed on the other side when the programme reached them with the practical nature of the subjects for discussion. All the world wished to come to England to learn to be practical, and they were all impressed by the way in which the Conference came to the vital centre of the whole problem, even the development of the religious life. He rejoiced that he should be able to say to those on the other side that the body in England appeared to be beginning where they in America had left off. After nearly seventeen years of life they had come in America to settle down to practical work. They had learned to agree to disagree, and to understand that both wings were necessary for flight. He and his colleague were heartily glad to listen to such words as they had just heard, and to mark the deep accord which had been given to them by the assembly. This Conference of theirs, seventeen years old, had gone through nearly all the dangerous diseases of childhood, and was approaching not only a strong youth, but was in lusty manhood and was getting every day more and more practical; and one outcome of it which was evident to them he might put into a phrase of this sort. Whenever the ministers went now to Saratoga, the one thing they felt bearing upon them was the laymen's desire for work. There was nothing that rejoiced the heart of the minister more than that. "Here is not only my purse, but my hand," was the cry, and "Don't spend time indulging in fine talk, but let us do something." And they were doing something—(applause.) If he had time he might say a word about one of those offshoots of this National Conference movement—the Unitarian Club which had been organised in Boston. No ministers were allowed there; it was composed of the laity—the (leading business and professional men in the community, and at its head presiding over it was the governor of their commonwealth. He thought he might venture to prophecy that if any of the English brethren should go to America a few years hence they would not have to hunt out the head-quarters of the denomination in some obscure corner, but would find an imposing building in a handsome portion of the city. This thought filled them on the other side more and more—that there was great opportunity which they must rise and fill—an opportunity not only outside but inside of them. They must make opportunity. They might be certain that as life came organisation would follow. In closing his remarks he wished to thank the assembly for the hearty goodwill that had been evinced towards his colleague and himself, and to express to them the deep, loving sympathy which was felt on the other side towards every movement of this kind, a sympathy which was limited only by their knowledge of what was being done. Let them one and all, whether they remained in England or went home further away, take these words to heart, "whatsoever our hand findeth to do, do it with all our might"—(applause).

The CHAIRMAN said he was sorry to announce that they had heard from the Rev. E. Armitage, M.A., of Oldham, whom they had expected to deliver an address, that he was unable to be present. He was sorry for the disappointment, and would call upon the Rev. Professor James Drummond, LL.D., of Manchester New College, to speak next.

Dr. DRUMMOND, who was received with loud applause, said he considered it an exceedingly great privilege to be called upon to address so vast an assembly on an occasion like the present, but he feared they were already sated by the ample banquet that had been spread before them since the meetings opened on the previous night. He feared he should not be able, after so many points had been touched upon by the other speakers, to say much that was new, but he would endeavour to gather up a few crumbs that had fallen from the banquet and present them in a fresh form. No subject had been assigned to him, and he therefore committed himself to that which most readily pressed itself upon his mind. What was the meaning of that great assembly—what was the meaning of their freedom and their non-subscribing position? He could only present one aspect of this great subject. It seemed to him that it arose from their solemn conviction that the spirit was the parent and not the child of theology, and that the offspring of the spirit was never competent fully and completely to represent the spirit itself. Throughout this Conference again and again unity of Christendom had been brought before them. It was a thing they were coming more and more clearly to recognise, and if for a moment they could lay aside their varying opinions, and go to the real heart of the Christian religion, did they not find that this unity was a reality, and that the varying Churches had one grand ideal, viz., a human life clarified by the spirit of God? This was the great ideal which Christ laid before his Church, and the ideal which all denominations in their various methods were endeavouring to realise; but the ideal itself was so pure, so comprehensive, that they saw it under various aspects; and when from their imperfect view they attempted to shape their division into the forms of thought, and to establish a theology, they must necessarily differ more or less from each other. If they believed that their theology was a complete and lasting representation of the Eternal Spirit, then only could they take a standard and judge all others by their acceptance of the same forms and creed. But if, on the other hand, they practically realised their own imperfections, and really believed that the truth of God was something higher and larger and grander than they had yet fully seen, then they were prepared to admit that the plans of their thought must necessarily change and grow, and that many with whom they were not able to see eye to eye nevertheless aspired after the same ideal, and had the same great goal in view—(applause). It was not only their group of Churches which recognised that position at the present day. In most of the denominations there were a number of men who were coming practically to recognise this broad position, and to feel that there was a real underlying unity of the spirit, and that throughout our various creeds we, nevertheless, worshipped the same God, and served the same Master, and aspired towards the same eternal life. It was the duty of all who felt this to work practically to promote the unity of Christendom; but they must do so not by any impracticable scheme of amalgamating into one great organisation—(hear)—and certainly not by sinking all their theological differences, for the open announcement and the prediscussion of theological differences was the divinely-appointed way by which they grew in their knowledge of theological truth—(applause). They must study the practical recognition on all available opportunities of the reality of this brotherhood by the welcoming into their hearts and homes of all whom they could feel to be the children of God, and of all who were seeking that fairer life and diviner truth. If they would really promote practical religion in their Churches, and make them grow in prosperity, it must be by recognising these great broad ends. A noisy self-assertion, an imitation of sectarian ways might for a time create a seeming prosperity, but never could advance the Kingdom of God, which was surely the aim of all Christian Churches. If they were willing to sacrifice this, and by all means which God might place in their power promote a deep, earnest, divine life amongst men, then, because they had not sought it, they would be able to gather men into their fold, and they would be able truly to feel that high religious life which had been spoken of in the earlier part of the day, and prove that they had not in vain professed themselves of that Master who gave them all that he might win them to God. He could not but believe that, in the present day, if they acted upon this truth they should find that a better fellowship was opening out to them; that those who differed widely from them in creed would yet welcome them to their hearts as Christian brothers, and that they should receive from them increase of grace and strength. But, should it be otherwise—should they, in many of their little stations throughout the country, find that by the breadth of their own sympathies they only incurred hostility, yet they might receive consolation by remembering that He who was broadest and deepest in love, whom this world had known was also the most lonely, and that it was not all loss to be compelled to step forth from human associations and artificial rights and to stand in silent and lonely awe, beneath the vast all-including dome of Heaven in the light of the everlasting stars—(applause).

This concluded the speeches, and the remainder of the evening was occupied in a conversation in the spacious hall of the Philharmonic Society, which, filled with ladies and gentlemen in all parts, presented an appearance of great bustle and animation.

A programme of music was rendered with such efficiency as to obtain the hearing and applause of the assembly, notwithstanding the temptation to inattention.

The interesting objects of vertu and scientific instruments placed on the tables for the inspection of the audience included microscopes, fossils, photographs, models, Japanese metal work, volumes of illustrations, collection of autographs, collection of foreign post-cards, collection of etchings, cases of Brazilian butterflies, stereoscopes, shells, collection of sponges, &c. The exhibitors included the following: H. C. Beesley, B. L. Benas, J. T. Ellerbeck, George Eyre Evans, Miss E. Fidler, S. C. Gregson, Malcolm Guthrie, the Geological Association, E. Grindley, Dr. Hicks, F.R.M.S., C. W. Jones, the Rev. H. Kendall, H. E. Kidson, A. Leicester, H. W. Meade-King, Alfred Morgan, G. H. Morton, jun., N. E. Norway, Dr. Nevins, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., Benson Rathbone, Wm. Russell, P. H. Rathbone, W. H. Raffles, Chas. Symes, Ph.D., Wm. Thomas, I. C. Thompson, F.R.M.S., Joseph Wall, G. G. Walmsley, Charles A. Wells, W. Woffenden, the Library and Museum Committee, Geo. E. Evans, G. F. Moore, and J. Chard.

The following letter from Dr. Martineau was sent to the Chairman of the Soirée, and was circulated in a printed form during the proceedings:—

35, Gordon-square, London, W.C.,
April 13, 1882.

My dear Mr. Ainsworth,—In the interview with which you and Mr. Clayden recently honoured me you so kindly accepted the reasons which withheld me from the approaching Conference at Liverpool that I cannot disregard your request for a few words of greeting and sympathy to the "friends in council" assembled there. Not that I have anything to say that will not come far better from the living voice of more competent advisers; but if I can contribute nothing to the impending discussions, I may at least prevent my silence from being misinterpreted. For this purpose it suffices to say that, had it been possible, I should have fervently joined in the services of next week; and that no joy will be sincerer than mine if its deliberations should quicken the faith and love of even a single congregation, and strengthen the hands of a single devoted minister.

At a crisis when many heads are dizzy and many hearts alarmed by the rapid changes in thought and in society, it may not be out of place for a veteran, himself not unaffected by them, to avow his unabated confidence in the Christian Congregation as the most beneficent of human institutions—the best guardian of the sanctities of life and the asylum of its sweetest affections. Among those who are alienated from it there are doubtless some who may sustain themselves in a higher atmosphere, and many who intellectually occupy a level above its average teaching. But, on a wide comparison of the population within the churches and that without, the former, I am persuaded, will be found to contain, in spite of its minority, by far the greater part of the conscience, the humanity, the purity, the nobleness, which are the cement of society and the backbone of national character.

When I look at any choice example of this institution, and ask myself what have been the real springs of its power, I find them in three conditions:—

- (1.) That its members unite purely for Fellowship and Growth in the Christian life and mind.
- (2.) That, in its external action, it bears down with Missionary zeal on the Paganism and irreligion and neglected suffering which it sees around.
- (3.) That on other Churches it looks as on confederates, moving upon different lines in the same sacred warfare.

So that these three, viz., Sympathies of Godliness within the congregation,—Aggression on Sin and misery without,—Loyal Affection for comrades under other banners,—are the animating principles which make even a small Christian Society a haven of moral health to a neighbourhood ten times its size.

The first condition embraces two aims, of Fellowship in the Christian mind, and Growth in it. Among persons various in age and position these two are unequally felt, and for their furtherance should resort, I think, each to its own methods. All the Public Services are the proper medium and ailment of Fellowship; while for Growth provision should be made by Special Classes and Fraternities, which each member may accept or decline. The people as a whole need a kindling voice to interpret and deepen their common trusts and settled affections; the Minister as an individual needs scope for fresh convictions of duty and lights of thought; and it is not well that either need should be made absolute, to the prejudice of the other. It is indispensable to provide, not only for such training of the young in moral and spiritual truth as may bring them to the Christlike mind, but also for acquainting all willing learners with the present aspects of theological knowledge. But it is one thing to open congregational classes in which the grounds of conflicting opinion may be systematically explained; it is quite another to dis-appoint an assembly of thirsting souls, that come to drink from the fountain of life, with dry criticisms or philosophical abstractions. And so with respect to current questions of social reform and political obligation, e.g., temperance, war, &c. It is inevitable that every faithful man should make a conscience of his belief upon these things; but he cannot on that account, if he be the head of a society where beliefs and consciences differ, assume more than his individual right of free action and persuasion within the circle that sympathy gathers round him. If in early life I had distinctly conceived the rule here laid down, I should have avoided some mistakes. And I could earnestly wish that my younger brethren might reverence their office, more than I have done, as representing the collective piety of a mixed congregation.

The second condition assumes, what experience has at last brought home to us, that no Christian Society can subsist upon its own internal relations alone, and like a monastery, shut out the confusion and the cries of the world around. We acknowledge, with all Christendom, that the Missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life; and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of Christ, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Where there is no sorrow felt for those to whom God is dead and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing Fate into the grim arms of "the last enemy," no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of God or "enthusiasm of humanity"? No Christian Society gives any adequate expression of its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work. It ought not to satisfy us that we institute and equip Mission stations in parts of our large towns that need them most. Every visible place of worship needs a character, a significance, a spiritual physiognomy upon the spot. It should be more than brick and stone to the eyes that daily see it. Even from the outside let it look upon the passers-by with a gaze of tender mercy and solemn warning and recovered hope. Our Town Missions would be a doubtful blessing to us, if we made them an excuse for surrendering an essential function of every Christian Church. I remember nothing more cheering in the contemporary history of our churches than the admirable experiment of Mr. Beard in Liverpool, and more recently of Mr. Hopps in Leicester, for extending the circle of religious sympathy to classes that too rarely feel its embrace. From my heart I honour the faith and courage evinced in these efforts, and wonder what we have been about that they have not sooner been born within us, and more widely awakened us to our duty.

When I speak of the missionary spirit as a Christian characteristic, I mean the attitude of a religious soul towards an unreligious, of devout faith towards no faith, of clear-visioned conscience towards moral blindness, of a beloved son towards an orphaned outcast; and I do not mean the attitude of one school of theology towards another. The difference of the two relations is surely plain. Where the interval between myself and another is moral and spiritual—where he lives by righteous rule and I by chance-passion—where he is strong and calm and bright, and I am neither master of myself nor in the hands of a divine deliverer—there is at the heart of both a secret consciousness of their real position: he yearns to lift me up; I feel that he is above me; I am prostrate in my weakness before him, and easily persuaded to stretch forth the hand of dependence. My conscience invests him with an authority which silences the vain pretence at equality, and places me with docility at his feet. It is otherwise where the interval is one of mere intellectual judgment as between two thoughtful theologians. Each has a self-preference which is without response in the other; and neither has, by natural or divine right, any Master-function relatively to the other. The presumptive equality between them is perfect; and I can never usefully study and compare them, except with the belief that I have as much to learn as to teach; and that what has sustained the life of many wise and saintly souls cannot be without its hidden store of truth and good. Hence (let me confess) I could never take, and could never approve, a missionary attitude towards any of the differing Churches of Christendom, or help feeling repelled by missionary approaches on their part. It is easy to avoid such reciprocity of arrogance without lapse into doctrinal reticence or indifference. Let questions of theology and morals be investigated, like all other questions, on pure grounds of evidence, and dealt with, not by the advocate, but by the Judge; or, if this rule be too severe, let the advocate's part never be taken except in reply, in order to rectify polemical distortions and restore the balance disturbed by party zeal. In all other cases, the third condition should come unreservedly into play; the various faiths of Christians around us should be treated with deference, as allies in foreign dress. Leave to the schools definitions of doctrine; let Churches address themselves, with one heart though in many tones, to the redemption of human life from guilt and sorrow. In the presence of great duties, under the inspiration of high affections, men are always drawing nearer to one another; in the eagerness of argument and the encounter of clashing beliefs, they are usually parting further from each other; and for one error that is struck down by the blow of controversy, a score will silently vanish because unable to breathe the air of a new age. Either every Church is bound to attempt the conversion of every other, or else all must live together in the harmony of mutual respect, and commit whatever is special in their cause to the arbitrament of time and the widening of thought. We all see Divine things "through a glass darkly;" but sure I am that my doctrines cannot be right unless that Church is dearest to me which is most deeply rooted in the love of God and of richest fruits in the love of man.

The principles of true congregational life are the principles of all associated religious life, and whatever union is formed of a number of societies must simply give extension to the bases of each. More than this it is needless to say, for your Conference does not aspire to the position of a "General Assembly," or even of a "Convocation." Did I take it for more than a council of friends seeking help from each other in their duties,

I could not expect your forbearance to this long excuse for my absence.—I remain always, dear Mr. Ainsworth, Yours very faithfully,
JAMES MARTINEAU.

THE AIM OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR.—It seems as if many "advanced" educationists, including your correspondent of last week, do not recognise the due proportion of the aims of Sunday-school instruction. These (all will agree) are to make children happier, more intelligent, and better, all worthy aims; but the last, surely, is by far the most important. The cultivation of the sense of the beautiful in Nature and Art, and instruction in Science, promote the two first; but only indirectly and occasionally, when the teacher is himself religious, do they promote the last. All history abounds with the examples of the co-existence of refinement and culture with gross immorality and irreligion. For goodness we need every incitement of precept and example to uprightness, command over the passions, moral courage; in short, to religion, or self-surrender to the Will of the Highest.

The history of great men and noble deeds, high thoughts, and the constant elevation of duty above pleasure, will help in this, not the self-indulgent (though innocent) sensuousness, or smart knowingness, too often unconsciously encouraged nowadays. Surely noble examples and precepts are to be found in abundance in that much-despised Old Testament, which is nothing less than the whole extant literature, during its best period, of that nation of antiquity which had the highest moral ideal, and from which sprang the most divine soul that ever dwelt in mortal flesh; which has, besides, so penetrated all Christian literature and art, that to be ignorant of it is to be ignorant indeed. The very simplicity of the state of society represented in its pages, and the picturesqueness of its narratives, make the stories usually attractive to children when they are not overlaid by comment and criticism. That teacher must be deficient in common sense who cannot omit the unsuitable portions. There is no need to limit the sources or subjects of Sunday-school instruction, but it is necessary for teachers to bear in mind how short the time at their disposal is, and that their chief efforts should be directed to make their scholars Christians in thought and deed.

A CONSTANT READER.

FREEWILL AND NECESSITY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR.—Dr. Travis maintains that if a man after having committed a sin for which his conscience reproaches him looks back on "the process of causation by which it was produced," he sees "what the result was and was to be;" in other words, the sinner on reflection becomes aware that the character of his personal agency in the sinful choice was the inevitable consequence of his mental constitution and of the motives which influenced him at the time when the self-determination took place.

Such is not the conclusion at which I arrive when I look back upon those features of my past conduct for which my conscience upbraids me. My conviction is that under the circumstances I could have acted differently; and it is solely because of this conviction that I recognise the justice of that condemnation which conscience, or the voice of the Father within me, passes upon the evil choice I made. If I were once convinced that I was no "first cause" (and, as I understand it, a first cause is the only real cause) in relation to my sinful self-determinations, so that all my actions, good or bad, were simply inevitable links on that chain of secondary causation (?) which is wholly dependent on and wholly determined by the "supreme causation" of the one First Cause, I might still look upon other men and myself as beautiful or ugly products of this supreme causation, but I should certainly thenceforth feel the absurdity of regarding human nature as either praiseworthy or blameworthy. As I said in my former letter, the sentiments of approbation and disapprobation find their source and their justification not simply in the consciousness of self-determination, but in the further consciousness that the person approved or condemned could under the circumstances have determined himself to a different line of conduct.

If conscience asserts that I am to blame for having yesterday yielded to self-indulgent cravings, and reason at the same time assures me (as Dr. Travis says it ought to do) that my conduct could not have been other than it was, then surely conscience and reason are hopelessly at variance. To bring conscience and reason into accord, it is clear that either conscience must cease to condemn us for our past conduct, or reason must admit that man is within certain limits a first cause. I take the latter alternative; Dr. Travis virtually accepts the former, for although he still uses the words "praise" and "blame," and speaks of his doctrine as only "qualifying very beneficially our moral disapprobation," it is evident, I think, from the general drift of his letter that he is not blind to the fact that his theory of "causation" as applied to human conduct not only "qualifies," but very effectually extinguishes "moral disapprobation" in the ordinary sense of these words.

Of the two elements which blend in the ordinary idea of punishment, namely, justice and compassion, consistency requires Dr. Travis to ignore the former altogether, for there can be no justice in punishing a man for conduct which could not possibly have been other than it was. Justice is, accordingly, as is usual with Determinists, branded with the opprobrious title "vindictiveness," and so disposed of, and prisons are to be nothing more than moral hospitals where punishment is administered "in the humane spirit of the feeling surgeon who finds it necessary to have recourse to his operating instruments." The inquiry naturally suggests itself whether "the feeling surgeon," on finding that some scoundrel is beginning to suffer the sharp pangs of an awakened conscience, should humanely administer an anodyne by saying, "My poor fellow, you are unnecessarily distressing yourself owing to the erroneous idea that 'you are the primary or independent cause of your determinations and acts'; make yourself quite easy; things could not have turned out otherwise than they have done. If blame is to be directed to any quarter in reference to this sad business, it is the 'supreme causation' or 'evolution' that must be regarded as the original and responsible agent. We all warmly sympathise with you in your very unfortunate moral derangement, and we especially regret that we see no other way of restoring your spiritual health, and of preventing the spread of the infection than by a painful course of peral servitude. But take comfort in the reflection that those who have charge of your interesting case are wholly free from those 'feelings of unkindness' which they might have entertained towards you had they not been fully convinced that you have not been in any sense a primary or independent cause of your very objectionable determinations."

I hope this will not be thought an unfair caricature of the necessary logical consequences of Dr. Travis's views; it describes, at all events, the tone which I should feel compelled to take were I fully assured of the truth of Dr. Travis's doctrine of causation in relation to human conduct.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION.—We understand that the Rev. A. Fairbairn, D.D., Principal of Airedale College, author of "Studies of the Life of Christ," and of Lectures recently delivered in Edinburgh on the Philosophy of Religion, is likely to be elected as chairman of the Union for 1883.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD reassembled on Thursday after the Easter recess. A motion by Miss Helen Taylor in favour of free education in all the schools of the Board gave rise to a long debate. The motion was got rid of by means of "the previous question," which was carried by a majority of nearly two to one.

PROFESSOR RAY LANKESTER, who was a short time since appointed by the Crown to the Presidential Chair of Natural History, Edinburgh University, in place of the late Sir Wyville Thomson, has tendered his resignation.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Religious Intelligence.

CHURCH OF THE DIVINE UNITY, NEW-CASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The twenty-eighth anniversary services of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, were held on Easter Sunday. The Rev. Eli Fay was the special preacher on the occasion. Large congregations assembled morning and evening, and expressed great satisfaction at the eloquent sermons that were delivered by Mr. Fay. His subject in the morning was, "Inspired moments, the indication of the true aims and possibilities of life;" and in the evening he gave "An explicit definition of religion." The anniversary soirée took place on Easter Monday, in the schoolrooms. A respectable company assembled; and after partaking of tea, provided by the ladies of the congregation, an adjournment to the church took place, where a public meeting was held. On account of the absence of Mr. Payne (the pastor of the church), who had been detained on a return journey from Sheffield through the delay of a train, the chair was taken by Councillor Ellis, and he was supported by the Rev. Eli Fay, Messrs. G. G. Laidler, J. Glover, J. Johnson, J. B. Ellis, J. Dixon, &c.

The CHAIRMAN having explained the reasons why he had been so unexpectedly called upon to preside over the meeting, said he was very glad to have to report that all the institutions of the church during the past twelve months had been in a most flourishing condition, and had been doing a good work. From year to year they had to lament the death of some members of their congregation; and during this last year they had lost one of their oldest and best members; he referred to Mr. William Clayton, the late treasurer of the church, who had served them in that capacity for something like forty years. A loss like his must be felt by their church. But they had been extremely fortunate in securing the services of Mr. J. T. Southern as treasurer. The Chairman then referred to the repairs which had been necessary in the church edifice, which had incurred an expense of something like £300. Nearly the whole of that sum had been already subscribed; and he had every confidence that the remainder would shortly be forthcoming. He then alluded to the great success that had attended the bazaar held at Christmas. The Sunday-schools also continued to be in a satisfactory condition, thanks to the management of Mr. Fred. Slater and Miss Mary Lambert, the superintendents, and to the staff of earnest teachers in both schools. The number of depositors in the savings-bank connected with the schools and the amount deposited had been most creditable. The Band of Hope had also done good and satisfactory work. During the year an effort had been made by the Sunday-school teachers and scholars to furnish the schools with seats and tables; and a great deal of the expense had already been paid by them. The Chairman then alluded to the pleasure he experienced in listening to Mr. Fay's sermons on the previous day, and at his presence there that night.

Mr. JOHN GLOVER moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Fay for his services at their anniversary, and said that the discourse in the morning was one which, perhaps, touched the very loftiest heights of Christian experience, and showed the necessity of persistent effort to attain to a high development in the religious life. In the evening Mr. Fay eloquently discoursed on that theme which was so common to Unitarian congregations—the theme of the duty to God and man as the foundation of all religion. He wished to bear his personal testimony to the excellence of Mr. Fay's sermons, and to the great benefit he had personally experienced from them. He therefore had much pleasure in proposing that the thanks of the meeting be conveyed to Mr. Fay for his services.

Mr. G. G. LAIDLER, secretary to the congregation, briefly and cordially seconded the resolution, which on being put to the meeting was carried by acclamation.

The Rev. ELI FAY, on rising to respond, was greeted with loud applause. He hardly knew, he said, how to thank them for the vote. He was almost amazed at its heartiness. He could assure them he had enjoyed the services of the previous day because he felt that his audience were on a level with him. He felt that his words had been taken up by the congregation. He was pleased to learn that the various institutions of that church were in a good and healthy condition. It was a grand thing for a congregation to thoroughly believe in their minister, and to stand by him and help push the work on; and if they did so, though they might not be able to accomplish great results in a single month, yet in the course of years they would see that they were growing. He narrated instances of the good effects following upon steady persistent work, and expressed himself as not having any doubt that the congregation would heartily co-operate with their pastor. As an incentive he narrated the improvements that were going on in his own place of worship, showing that in the best sense of the term they were pushing on the general interests of the cause. He was led to think that his English Unitarian friends were, however, mistaken on one point. He did not know how it was in the north, nor yet in the south, but he had told his own congregation that they almost pride themselves on being unpopular. Ask many Unitarians to do anything for their cause—and they immediately put forward the plea of unpopularity. There was just a little in it, perhaps, but they must not make too much of it. They might depend upon it that other sects did not wish to make martyrs of them, and they would be allowed to live and do their business in their own way. Earnest work by them would receive some reward as in other denominations, and in Sheffield at least their people had begun to see that they could accomplish some work as well as others. Years ago this plea of unpopularity might have been allowed, but others were beginning to believe that Unitarians had hold of an important phase of Christian truth, and were thus willing to meet them. He then referred to the fact that many outside all denominations were in complete sympathy with them in their theological ideas, which showed that the way was as open before them as before any other denomination. Let them do the work that was lying before them now. There never had been a time when the opportunity was so great. And do not let them be afraid of a little aggressive work, for their preaching tended to make true men and women. The principles they held and the doctrines they preached tended to form character, and high character. Therefore they might push on their work. He advised them to pay great attention to the work of the Sunday-school, and to the various institutions of the church, and uniting loyally with their minister's endeavour to push on that work which was God's means of regenerating the world. Mr. Fay resumed his seat amidst loud applause.

After some musical performances by the choir, Mr. Fay, at the request of the Chairman, again rose, and made some interesting observations upon the Unitarian churches in America.

The Rev. ALFRED PAYNE, who had by this time arrived, and was received with hearty applause, next addressed the meeting. He said another year of their congregational life had gone past, and it had been in many respects a source of gratification and pleasure. As the years passed they could scarcely ever assemble without remembering that the hand of death had been amongst them, and taken from them some honoured members. He looked back with a great deal of satisfaction upon the general work of the Church. This last winter he had not, as was his custom, given a series of controversial lectures, and he had looked with a great deal of interest upon the character of the evening congregations. He had been glad to see that though there had not been the usual means taken to attract the attention of the public, they had had more satisfactory attendances than he had known since he had been their minister. He would not now refer to the general institutions of the Church, except to the very magnificent success which had attended their last bazaar. In taking anything like an outlook upon their denomination he could not but feel that, like other denominations, they were passing through a crisis. It was most important that they should perceive very clearly what was their duty with regard to it. A great many of their people became exceedingly frightened because there were theological changes which they could not follow. And because they saw various phases of doctrine passing away, they said Christianity was in danger, and the days that are to be will be nothing like those that have been. They were, however, altogether mistaken. They ought rather to think upon these crises with a certain amount of trustful gladness. When there things occurred it simply brought to the front the fact that Christianity was adaptable to the wants of all the ages of God's human family. In every one of those crises, too, there was a grand opportunity for a re-statement of their position. In showing that the fundamentals of Christianity were adapted to the wants of modern times, they would feel that a new burden was laid upon them; and they ought to go forward bearing it more faithfully and zealously than they had hitherto done. What they wanted at that time was to follow out the ardent admonition of St. Paul when he said,—“In diligence be not slothful.” Mr. Payne having referred to the conference about to take place in Liverpool, said he turned to a very pleasing duty which had been committed to him, namely, the presentation of a testimonial to Mr. J. Barker Ellis, the respected honorary choir-master of the Church. Mr. Payne referred to the great exertions which Mr. Ellis had made during a considerable number of years to improve the musical portion of their services,—efforts which had been crowned with great success,—and concluded by presenting to Mr. Ellis in the name of the subscribers a solid silver grape basket with silver scissors, all overlaid with gold, and an ivory baton richly mounted. The basket bore the following inscription:—“Presented to J. Barker Ellis, Esq., in appreciation of his long services as hon. choir-master of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Easter, 1882.” On the baton was inscribed—“Church of the Divine Unity. J. B. E., 1882.”

Mr. G. G. LAIDLAR having also spoken of the improvement in the musical services. Mr. J. BARKER ELLIS, who was most heartily received, responded in a suitable and appropriate manner, in the course of his address expressing a hope that, as now they had got one of the best choirs in the town, the day would not be far distant when they would also have an organ second to none in the district.

The Rev. R. COWLEY SMITH then delivered a short address, during which he referred in feeling terms to his contemplated severance with the district, and to the many kindnesses he had received whilst in the North of England.

Various votes of thanks having been spoken to, the interesting proceedings were brought to a conclusion by hymn and prayer. Several anthems were sung in the course of the evening by the choir of the Church in a highly meritorious manner, Mr. Stephenson presiding at the organ.

THE DEAN STANLEY MEMORIAL FUND.—A few weeks after the meeting held in the Chapter House of Westminster, in December last, as soon indeed as it was clear that the movement then inaugurated was receiving general sympathy and support, an intimation was made to some of Dean Stanley's friends in America that their co-operation in the work of commemorating his public services and character would be heartily welcomed on this side of the Atlantic. It was suggested in the course of the correspondence that such co-operation might, if thought well, take the form of a separate stained glass window in the Chapter-house, to be presented by contributors from the United States. The suggestion was cordially welcomed, and at once put into execution. On the 11th of last month a draft for the amount of £1,064, a somewhat larger sum than had been named, was despatched from Boston, together with the names of about 300 subscribers, and a letter from the Rev. Phillips Brooks, of Boston. The list of subscribers, headed by the Hon. R. C. Winthrop, of Boston, who took a leading part in the matter, includes the name of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, following that of Oliver Wendell Holmes, and followed by those of Ralph Waldo Emerson and John G. Whittier. Independently of the American contribution, the total sum thus far contributed amounts to about £4,000. Of this it appears that as much as 2,000 guineas, a larger sum than was at first expected, may be required for the monument in the Abbey, a small model of which, a recumbent figure supported on a tomb, has been prepared by Mr. Boehm, and will be submitted to the committee shortly after Easter. The sum that remains will, after deducting necessary expenses, be barely sufficient to defray the cost of two of the three large and one small windows which will remain after the completion of those which will be given by her Majesty the Queen, by the late Dean himself, and by the American contributors. It is hoped, therefore, that the sum necessary for the entire completion of the work—i.e., about £1,500 more may yet be raised by the friends and admirers of one whose loss is still so deeply felt.

Two of the Free Church Synods decided last week in favour of liberty to use instrumental music—Aberdeen by 24 to 14, and Fife by 16 to 10. The new Free Church Hymnal is now issued, containing the “Te Deum,” the “Gloria in Excelsis,” and a selection of Scripture sentences.

Obituary.

THE LATE JONATHAN ROBERT OGDEN.

Mr. Ogden, the composer of “Holy Songs and Musical Prayers,”* was born at Leeds, June 13, 1806. He was the only son of Robert Ogden, a merchant, who, though residing at Leeds, was in partnership with Mr. Thomas Bolton, of Liverpool, once mayor of that city. Robert Ogden died when his son was only ten years of age. His widow, whose name had been Glover, frequently visited Liverpool with her only son and daughter, so that the intimacy with Mr. Bolton's family was maintained. Seventeen years later Mr. Ogden married Mr. Bolton's daughter. He received his education at several schools in and near Leeds, the last being that of the Rev. Dr. Hutton. His school-days being ended, the choice of a business or profession had to be considered. A surgeon in Leeds required a premium which Mrs. Ogden thought too great. Subsequently, Mr. Bolton invited young Ogden to take a place in his office in Liverpool, with a view to entering into the business. But the experiment failed, the drudgery of an apprentice's work proving too irksome. His extraordinary musical talent had long been manifest. He was constantly asked to play. The piano was his instrument, though there is a story that he once played the violoncello at a concert when so young that he had to stand up to it as if it were a double bass.

His indulgent mother was proud of her son, and with a view to gratify his wish for the best musical instruction, she soon left Leeds with her children and took a house in London. Here Mr. Ogden became a pupil of Moscheles, from whom he experienced great kindness, but whom he never esteemed as a composer. Through the aid of Moscheles, Mr. Ogden obtained the great privilege of studying the theory of music under Kollmann, “Organist of H. M. German Chapel, St. James's,” an excellent master, whose system he always spoke of as superior to that of any other writer. Later in life, however, he maintained that Kollmann's system might be simplified. In London music formed the bond of union for several years between Mr. Ogden and several young amateurs, with whom he spent much of his time, playing the violin as well as the piano. At length, acting under the advice of Moscheles, who gave him introductions, Mr. Ogden went to study abroad. He resided in Paris for a year, studying under Pixis. His mother and sister also went to Paris, returning home at the end of the year, while Mr. Ogden proceeded to Munich. Here he remained about three years, studying music under Stuntz. He never spoke much in detail about his residence abroad. He has mentioned having composed an overture at Munich, which was performed by the band of the opera, and he has spoken of a visit to Vienna shortly after the death of Beethoven, in 1827.

Mr. Ogden returned home after his residence in Munich, and, after a few years' residence with his mother, interrupted by continental tours with other relatives, he was married in 1834. A residence in the country was decided upon, and after a long search for an abode, Mr. and Mrs. Ogden began living at Lakefield, near Esthwaite, thenceforth their home, a “nook of English ground” uninvaded yet by railways and unspoiled by new buildings. Mr. Ogden found plenty to do. He delighted in fishing and other excursions. Throughout his life he had amused himself with astronomy and mathematics, and though he had never attempted drawing previous to his marriage, his progress as an artist was remarkable. He has said in his usual depreciating tone about himself, that his music was worth little, and that he sometimes thought he might have done better as a painter.

Mr. Ogden had always a morbid dread of social gatherings, shirking parties when he could. This nervousness his life of comparative solitude was not likely to mitigate. Though in other respects an excellent magistrate, he always experienced nervous apprehension on leaving home to take his seat at Hawkshead, and suffered from exhaustion afterwards.

This shyness, in connection with the modesty of true genius, would undoubtedly have allowed the world to remain ignorant of his music but for the "happy accident" which led him to try to be useful. Dr. Martineau, when compiling his first hymn-book, wanted tunes of unusual metre, and, after much persuasion, his friend undertook to try to supply the want. Though requiring to be kept up to the task by the persuasion and sympathy of his wife, and the delighted encouragement of Dr. Martineau and his family, the composition and arrangement of these tunes was doubtless a source of great interest to their author. Almost every edition was enriched by added music, some of the later pieces having been the result of requests from the Rev. Charles Beard. The book has been the Sunday music in many homes since it first appeared, and many congregations have kept it in cherished use. The style is not that of the Church hymn music of this day. But it may be said without reserve, that as the expression of religious aspiration and true devotion, Mr. Ogden's music, in the esteem of many, ranks with the best. Hearers, musical and unmusical, love it. His extraordinary extempore playing many years ago was never dull, though correct and scientific, and the same may be said of these "Holy-Songs." Objections have been made to the adaptations contained in the volume. And it may be hard to understand how a disciple of Beethoven so devoted as Mr. Ogden could divert the purpose of any of his music, and make the inevitable alterations. With regard to the hearer of the adaptations, his approbation seems to depend upon his knowledge or ignorance. Should he not know the original (and, forty years ago the music of Beethoven was not familiar as it is now), the adaptation is simply an excellent tune. And, may it not be added that, in the seventh edition of Mr. Ogden's work, from which the adaptations are omitted, some of us miss them grievously? It may be of some interest to know that among the earlier tunes Mr. Ogden preferred "Fulfillment," "'Tis finished," and that of more recent ones he gave the preference to the "Lone-wing," that dreamy, sympathetic setting of Bryan's poem.

Having spoken of Mr. Ogden's shyness in society, it would be wrong not to say something of his geniality among friends. All who have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Ogden at Lakefield will remember how kind and considerate he was as a host, the best of companions, the most lively and witty of talkers, and when intimacy had been attained, he was the most affectionate and constant of friends. A singular charm of appearance and manner won all ages and classes, and children and servants, no less than others, became deeply attached to him. He had a grace of expression which always made his letters seem too short. He had a keen sense of humour, and used to say he could stand an examination in Dickens. He was remarkably exact and punctual in matters of business. His parents belonged to the Church of England, but he was a Unitarian from early life.

For more than ten years Mr. Ogden's health had been failing, and, though his greeting of a friend was as warm as ever, he looked with less and less interest on the affairs of life. After a few days' illness he passed away on the 26th March, and on the 31st was laid in Hawks-head church-yard by the side of his son, whose daughter is his sole lineal descendant.

DEATH OF CHARLES DARWIN.—The death of this gentleman, whose investigations more than those of any other man since the times of Galileo and Kepler mark an era, took place on Thursday at his residence. Mr. Darwin was in his seventy-fourth year. He was the son of Dr. R. W. Darwin, F.R.S., of Shrewsbury, and grandson of Dr. Erasmus Darwin, F.R.S., author of the "Botanic Garden," "Zoonomia," &c. He was educated at the grammar school at Shrewsbury. In 1825 he went to Edinburgh, attended the lectures at the University for two years, entered Christ's College, Cambridge in 1827, took the degree of B.A. in 1832, and that of M.A. in 1837. Captain Fitzroy, R.N., having offered to give up part of his own cabin to any one who would volunteer to accompany H.M.S. Beagle as naturalist, Mr. Darwin offered his services, and sailed December 27, 1831, in that vessel for the survey of South America and the circumnavigation of the globe, returning to England October 2, 1836. Mr. Darwin published "Journal of Researches into the Geology and Natural History of the various Countries, &c.," which appeared with a general account of the voyage by Captain Fitzroy, but has since been published separately. In 1839 Mr. Darwin married the granddaughter of Josiah Wedgwood, F.R.S., the well-known improver and manufacturer of earthenware. His "Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection," published in 1859, which has gone through several editions at home and abroad, has given rise to much controversy. It was followed by numerous other works. Mr. Darwin, who has been elected a member of various foreign and English scientific bodies, received from the Royal Society the Royal and Copley medals for his various scientific works, and from the Geological Society the Wollaston Palladian medal. He has been created a knight of the order Pour le Mérite by the Prussian Government; and in June, 1871, he was elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Vienna. The University of Leyden conferred upon him the honorary degree of M.D. in February, 1875. His teachings in biology, founded upon the most rigid and painstaking investigations, have met with heated clerical denunciation, but have been all but universally acknowledged and accepted by the scientific world.

Short Notices.

A Census of Religions (Longmans) is simply a republication of the essay which the Right Hon. J. G. Hubbard, M.P., contributed to a recent number of the Nineteenth Century, with the addition of two short papers on "Denominational Worship," and "The National Church." Mr. Hubbard vindicates the State Church from the High Churchman's point of view, and disputes the accuracy of the figures relating to the census of religious worship in large towns, which Mr. Miall, of the Nonconformist and Independent, has collected with so much care.

Sacred Similes. Being Notes for Teachers of Bible Classes and Others. By P. E. Vizard. (London: Sunday School Association. 1882.)—The idea of this little book is a very good one. The author takes a number of Scripture metaphors (forty) and devotes a short chapter to each. He points out their most suggestive features and the lessons they convey. "It occurred to the writer that a series of lessons might be devised, each lesson of which should consist of a single simile, and that by thus detaching it from its surroundings, giving it a setting of its own, looking more fully into it and around it, and handling it in a free and unconventional manner, good and ample material for a lesson might be furnished, and that it would be an agreeable and legitimate deviation from the beaten track with regard to lesson subjects." We can say that he has carried out the idea very successfully, and written a book which we have no doubt will be found helpful by many Sunday-school teachers. The religious teaching given under each simile is excellent, and the treatment of the whole is just adapted to the more intelligent scholars. The teacher, however, who would use the book with the best effect will be careful to follow the instructions given by the author and regard the lessons as simply suggestive, as merely the skeleton and framework of a lesson which he has to clothe and animate by working it up well and supplying the illustrations briefly hinted at. These notes are not offered without experience; the author tells us they have "been used with the result of having made, certainly interesting, and, it is hoped, useful lessons." We congratulate the Sunday School Association on the excellent book it has published of late for the use of teachers and scholars, and hope that its efforts will be appreciated and encouraged by our Sunday-schools throughout the country.

Tales of Trust (S. Bagster. 1882.)—A series of tales "embracing authentic accounts of providential guidance, assistance, and deliverance," written and selected by H. L. Hastings, an American. They abound in those well-known accounts of special providential interpositions which only provoke sceptical mockery. They would go far to make us disbelieve that good Providence which extends its impartial care over all, were not our faith too well-grounded to be uprooted by foolish stories such as these "Tales of Trust."

Prayers for the use of Families. By Travers Madge. Third Edition. 1882.—A few weeks ago we gave a cordial reception to a new edition of the well-known reception of prayers by the late venerable Thomas Madge; now we record with equal pleasure the publication by the Sunday School Association of a new and handsome edition of the prayers by his son Travers, a true Catholic saint, if ever there was one, and in the best sense of those greatly misused words. They are exquisite in their simplicity, and are saturated through and through with the spirit of the purest devotion and the loftiest Christianity. The best wish we can express for the Liberal Churches is that either of these manuals may come into general use in our families.

THE REV. F. SUMMERS gratefully acknowledges the receipt of 2s. 6d. from "S. G. O."

ROTHERHAM.—At the recent contested election of Guardians for the Poor the Rev. W. Blazebey, B.A., Unitarian minister, was elected Guardian for Rotherham.

NINE cases have arrived at the British Museum from Bagdad, containing contract tablets of the later Babylonian period, found at Abre Habba or Sippara.

THE National Training School for Music finally closed last week. There is a balance in hand of about £1,000, part of which will be devoted to the private instruction of the most promising pupils, and the remainder handed over to the Royal College of Music.

ACCORDING to the Academy, Mr. Edwin W. Streeter has been engaged for many years in collecting materials for something like an authoritative history of the world's famous diamonds. In collaboration with Mr. Joseph Hatton and Mr. A. H. Keane (an oriental scholar), he has completed a volume, entitled "The Great Diamonds of the World."

STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN CHAPEL.—The committee of this chapel have invited the Rev. W. Wooding, B.A., to continue to conduct the Sunday morning services during the current year. In according to the request Mr. Wooding is not required to sever himself from the Congregational body, of which he is an attached member.

A BILL has been issued to amend and consolidate the law of copyright in works of fine art and in photographs, and for repressing the commission of fraud in the production and sale of such works. It is proposed that the duration of the copyright should extend in the case of paintings and sculpture to thirty years after the death of the artist, and in the case of engravings to fifty years from the time of publication. In the case of photographs the term is also to be fifty years; but photographic portraits taken on commission are not to be sold or exhibited in shop windows without the consent of the person photographed. The Bill bears the names of Mr. Hastings, Lord Sandon, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy, Sir Gabriel Goldney, and Mr. Agnew.

BRISTOL.—On Friday a successful concert in aid of the fund for obtaining a piano for the Band of Hope connected with Lewin's-mead Chapel (Bristol) was given at the Maudlin-street schoolroom. The Band of Hope, which was established about two years ago, now numbers two hundred members. Mr. Herbert Thomas is the president; the vice-presidents are the Revs. W. Hargrave and A. N. Blatchford, and Mr. W. Butcher, and Mr. Gillard is the secretary. The concert was organised by Mrs. Parsons, who undertook and successfully carried out the whole of the arrangements, and the lady obtained the generous co-operation of many friends outside the congregation as well as those connected with the Lewin's-mead Chapel. The large room was crowded to the doors.

BAMPTON.—The annual tea-meeting was held on Easter Monday, in the girls' school-room, which was well filled, and beautifully decorated with hot-house plants and a profusion of wild flowers. After an interval for social intercourse and music, the meeting assembled in the chapel, when the Rev. R. L. Carpenter took the chair, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. W. Robinson, of Crewkerne, the Rev. J. Davies, Mr. Robinson, (M.N.C.), Mr. T. Male, and the Rev. T. Reed of Poole; and a vote of thanks was moved by W. Colfox, Esq., and Mr. F. W. Matterface. The meeting was closed with hymn and prayer, and interspersed with anthems. The Rev. Teesdale Reed's very interesting and instructive address was on "Religion in India," where he had been a Baptist missionary for nine years. He had been led by the inquiries of the natives to search the Scriptures for himself, and this resulted in his change of doctrine and the resignation of his office. He thought that many members of the Brahmo Somaj would be prepared to embrace Unitarian Christianity if it was properly presented to them.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.

ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE, and the word CHLORODYNE coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness, and as being the same thing. Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD, STATED PUBLICLY in Court that DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE was UNDOUBTEDLY the INVENTOR OF CHLORODYNE, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See The Times, July 13th, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a LIQUID MEDICINE which ASSUAGES PAIN OF EVERY KIND, affords a calm, refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and INVIGORATES the NERVOUS SYSTEM when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC FOR CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.

The GENERAL BOARD of HEALTH, London, REPORT that it ACTS as a CHARM, one dose generally sufficient.

Dr. GIBBON, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states: "TWO DOSES COMPLETELY CURED ME OF DIARRHŒA."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC. PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

COUGHS, COLDS, &c. From W. VESALIUS PETTIGREW, M.D., formerly Lecturer at St. George's Hospital, LONDON.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an Anti-Spasmotic and Sedative. I have used it in Consumption, Asthma, Diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

From W. C. WILKINSON, Esq. F.R.C.S., Spalding.

"I consider it invaluable in Phthisis and Spasmodic Cough; the benefit is very marked indeed."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the TRUE PALLIATIVE in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and Co., Horncastle.

"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmotic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other Sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION. THE IMMENSE SALE of this REMEDY has given rise to many UNSCRUPULOUS IMITATIONS.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

SACRED SIMILES; being Notes for Teachers of Bible Classes and others. By P. E. VIZARD. Cloth, with large margins for additional notes. Price 1s.

"Specially useful to any one who has to conduct young people's services, and who wishes to have Bible subjects and illustrations."—Truthseeker.

"These Notes are written by a practical teacher, and we trust that all who use them will be as successful as the author appears to have been in the young men's Bible-class where they were first delivered."—Church Worker.

"Mr. Vizard has taken a number of the more frequent and striking similes and metaphors occurring in the Bible, and made a study of each of them, bringing together into one view the different truths suggested by the figure as originally used, and taking it as the text of a religious or moral lesson of present application. The idea is a good one, and is well carried out."—Modern Review.

SHORT SERMONS TO CHILDREN

By THREE COUSINS. Cloth 1s.

"Unusually suitable and suggestive; simple yet sensible; interesting and earnest."—Christian World.

"A book parents might be glad to possess. The sermons abound in wise counsel well and pleasantly put."—Sunday School Times.

"This book ought to be welcome in our Sunday schools and in our homes. In many a family these short sermons might be read aloud with advantage to both old and young."—Inquirer.

"This is a good, wise, and winsome book."—Truthseeker.

"Written in pleasing, plain, practical style, illustrated by anecdotes."—Unity (Chicago).

STORIES FROM THE BOOK OF GENESIS.

By RICHARD BARTRAM. Cloth, 1s.

"Its reasonable, yet religious, treatment of the subject may not suit some old-fashioned readers of the Bible, but even to these it may be commended as clear, intelligent, and always on the look out for some good lesson to be learned from the Old Testament narrative."—The Disciple (Belfast).

"This little book deserves a warm welcome on this side the Atlantic. Such a book is very much needed, and yet is not often to be found. The treatment throughout is reverent and dignified, without showing any of that weak cringing to popular ideas which with so many passes for piety."—Christian Register (Boston).

"Excellent conceived and carried out."—Unitarian Herald.

"Written for children in a style which is sure to engage their attention."—Christian World.

"Well adapted to the wants of the Sunday-school teacher, who wish to take up the Old Testament lessons, and have not means to work out the lessons for themselves with the aid of fuller text books and teachers' meetings."—Unity.

"Mr. Bartram has produced another very readable and useful little book."—Christian Life.

OUTLINE LESSONS IN RELIGION.

By the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A. Cloth 6d.; interleaved 8d.

"Mr. Armstrong is a gifted and devout man, well qualified to teach many by these examples, how they may get at the minds of children and youth."—Christian World.

"It is admirably adapted for both our schools and our families."—Inquirer.

STORIES FROM THE LIFE OF MOSES.

By R. BARTRAM. Bound uniformly with the same author's "Stories from the Book of Genesis." Price 1s.

"Mr. Bartram has followed up his 'Stories from the Book of Genesis,' by a not less successful attempt to apply the same 'rational' method of treatment to the traditions of the life of Moses without too much disturbing the impressions of the naïf freshness and picturesqueness of the original stories. The little book will be, like its predecessor, of real service to those who are unable any longer to 'teach the Bible' to their children or scholars on the old lines, and yet who wish them to feel the charm of its early pages, and to enter afterwards into the varied meaning and interest of the national history to which they are the introduction."—Modern Review.

"The spirit in which the book is written is excellent, and it is in every way a valuable addition to the religious library of the young. . . . The lessons drawn from the narratives are always so good, that we could almost wish that the whole story had been re-told in the author's simple and effective style."—Inquirer.

"His little volume is but of modest pretensions, yet its method and its spirit should make it useful in many homes and schools. The old stories are told in the old words, but each is preceded by a commentary of the best kind for little children. They are told as stories, which, like the child's other story books, may be true or untrue, or partly true and partly untrue. But their morals are freely drawn."—Modern Review.

CHARLES DARWIN.

DURING the forty years existence enjoyed by this journal its columns have never had to record the close of a life so remarkable as that of the amiable scientist who on Wednesday week passed away from his fruitful labours. The nineteenth century, indeed, has given to the world no grander name than that of CHARLES DARWIN. Moreover, since NICOLAS COPERNICUS, no man's works so strongly mark off an epoch of human thought as do those of the subject of this note. And the revolutionary character of the hypotheses which he established, as affecting all philosophy, is of no less phenomenal significance than the marked success of his teachings within the limit of his lifetime. The Titanic ravings which greeted the publication of "The Origin of Species" in 1859 have ceased, and public opinion in England, on the Continent, and in America, is now unanimous in acknowledging the magnificence of the results which have sprung from the painstaking, patient observations, extending over half-a-century, of this one man. It would not be pleasant to recall the bitter things which were said during the few years immediately following 1859; we only rejoice at the splendid change which has since come over the scene. The Pall Mall Gazette says "The world was convinced; the higher minds readily, the mass slowly and grudgingly, but convinced at last against its will. Indeed, it was curious to observe how much more spontaneously the new lights were followed even by those who had no special knowledge of biology, but whose minds were of the right type for appreciating the full value of the harmonious evolutionary system, than by those narrow specialists who could only think of difficulties involved in the interpretation of this particular weedy-flower, or that particular butterfly's wing. Calibre told more than speciality: the picked men of all classes were the first to come over to the new opinions." We have heard a friend remark that it was the proudest thing in his life that he was able to accept the Darwinian theory, long before the clerical howl of execration had ceased, seeing how widely its influence was now extended, and how the present generation had come to revere its author. The Daily Telegraph laments that Mr. DARWIN in his lifetime received no royal recognition of his merits. Our feelings do not at all coincide with our contemporary. Mr. DARWIN, although the last of men to look for honours—his character was so unostentatious—has had high honours bestowed upon him. It has, indeed, been his lot to live to see his theories all but universally received, and no greater honour than that could be possible, considering their extraordinary and far-reaching importance, and the tremendous consternation and opposition they occasioned at first. The fitness of his remains receiving their resting-place in Westminster Abbey—now not so much an Ecclesiastical edifice as a burial place for the noblest of her sons whom Britain delights to honour—was fully borne out by the very imposing gathering in that place on Wednesday last, met to pay him the last token of respect. The scene was such as has rarely been witnessed in the Abbey.

Of Mr. DARWIN's many amiable qualities of mind and heart we need only say that the bitterest opponents of his fundamental teachings give them the fullest acknowledgment. The Duke of ARGYLE was even one of the pall bearers at his funeral. Whatever may be the destiny of the theory which bears his name, all concur in admitting that Mr. DARWIN's investigations were carried out with exemplary and almost super-human patience and perseverance, and that his methods of making known to the world the results arrived at were as unassuming as they were just and careful. After the publication of the "Origin of Species" it was soon seen that the strongest arguments against Evolution had been stated in the most forcible way by the author in his own book. Professor HUXLEY, in a lecture on "The Coming of Age of the 'Origin of Species,'" delivered two years ago at the Royal Institution, well showed how during the twenty-one years a succession of important discoveries removed the most plausible objection which existed when the work was issued, viz., that from Palæontology. Mr. DARWIN said: "On the doctrine of the extermination of an infinitude of connecting links between the living and extinct inhabitants of the world, and at each successive period between the extinct and still older species, why is not every geological formation charged with such links? why does not every collection of fossil remains afford plain evidence of gradation and mutation of the forms of life? We meet with no such evidence, and this is the most obvious of the many objections which may be urged against my theory." How differently the case could be stated to-day those who are specially concerned in this direction know best. Mr. HUXLEY says, if the doctrine of evolution had not existed, Palæontologists must have to-day invented it, so irresistibly is it forced upon the mind by the study of the remains of the Tertiary mammalia which have been brought to light since 1859. Another passage which adverse criticism made merry over was this: "We may thus account even for the distinctness of whole classes from each other—for instance, of birds from all other vertebrate animals—by the belief that many animal forms of life have been utterly lost, through which the early progenitors of birds were formerly connected with the early progenitors of the other vertebrate classes." It would, perhaps, have been easy to foresee the delightful chuckle which this passage would afford the jealous guardians of the old views, but students of Palæontology can tell of the extraordinary justification which Mr. DARWIN has since received—justification which it was impossible to anticipate. A fine series of forms have been brought to light which connect indubitably birds with reptiles, remotely distinct as the two classes appear externally. And although none of the new discoveries in themselves prove the theory, yet it is remarkable how all seem to require it. No better confirmation of the soundness of a hypothesis could be wished for.

DARWIN'S work not only gave an immense impulse to biological investigations, but caused a revolution in all departments of thought. Most have found a modus vivendi between their old prepossessions and the new theories propounded in the "Origin of Species," and those who have not already done so probably never will. But Mr. DARWIN, building for all time, has received the rare distinction of seeing his thoughts appreciated by the world at large ere came the lamented close of his life.

MINISTERS' STIPENDS AND AUGMENTATION FUND.

VALUABLE as were all the papers read at the Liverpool Conference there can be no reasonable doubt that Mr. HARRY RAWSON'S, from the nature of the subject, attracted the most interest and attention, and will lead to the most immediate practical results. The condition of the ministry is everywhere the test of a standing or falling Church. It must be so from the nature of the case. The experiment of forming Churches which shall be dependent solely upon lay services has invariably failed in the long run, and the lay-preacher has usually passed into the ranks of the ministry, often with the scantiest possible qualifications for his self-assumed vocation. The question is one which concerns both ministry and laity alike, for on the lowest view of what is generally and very properly styled a "sacred profession" and dismissing all mere Ecclesiastical theories, the ministry is the public voice of the solemn prayers and thanksgiving of the Church, the recognised agency through which it exercises its chief influence on the surrounding community, and takes its place among the foremost beneficent and educating influences of the age. And while we continue to criticise our ministers with the candour which is the charming characteristic more especially of that portion of our laity which does little or nothing for its support, it would be well to bear in mind that the ministry always and almost inevitably reflects the life, or the absence of life, whatever it may be, in our Churches. An educated laity creates an educated ministry. A careless and indifferent laity almost insensibly lowers the whole tone of the ministry. A generous and self-sacrificing laity will surely produce a generous and devoted ministry. "Like people, like priest," is an old prophetic saying, which is just as true of the relation of ministers and congregations this day as it was of priests and people in ancient Israel.

And so all the papers and discussions at the Liverpool Conference are naturally summed up in this one vital question of the condition of our ministry. It is comparatively useless to talk about the "development of the religious life within our Churches," unless our Churches have a ministry who are in a position to devote their best time and thought to the culture and development of that religious life. We shall discuss in vain the "practical means by which our Churches can best enlarge and extend their religious influence," unless we have an efficient ministry, on whom, from the very nature of the case, our congregations must chiefly for the extension of their religious influence rely; and even the question of the "education and supply of our ministers" largely depends upon that other question—Are our Churches really able and willing to support an educated ministry?

It was indispensable that this question should be left entirely in the hands of the laity. It was well that the layman who has made it his own should be one of such wide experience, keen intellect, and commanding influence as Mr. HARRY RAWSON. On matters affecting their own worldly position high-minded ministers are for once voiceless. Their lot is to suffer and endure, and work on as best they can amidst all the manifold discouragements of their position.

The ideal of the Christian ministry is that it shall be regarded as a position of such high honour and usefulness that our foremost men, the sons of our best families, possessing from their birth the richest opportunities, shall vie with those who have made their way to the front through sheer force of mind, in their eagerness to devote themselves to the service of God and man. The only motive should be a divine "enthusiasm for humanity," for which earnest men would be as willing to sacrifice themselves as others give up their time and fortune in the service of the world. If our ideal could be realised men would press as eagerly into the ministry as some men aspire for seats in Parliament, and others on Boards of Guardians, and Municipal Councils. But this ideal is only for Utopias, Isles of the Blest, and other poetic places, and not for this busy, working-day world. We have to face the fact that in our own churches, to a greater extent than in a well-endowed State Church, we have a ministry, which, however spiritual in its aims and self-devoted in life, is almost entirely dependent on the scanty stipends which are usually given by our congregations. Now we believe there are still men of the old heroic type amongst us who are willing to sacrifice themselves and live a life of poverty in order to devote their whole energies to the Christlike work of elevating the poor and lowly. But it is quite a different thing to ask men of high intellectual culture and refined tastes to devote themselves to poverty, and in many cases social ostracism in the service of a Church comprising not a few wealthy laymen who make no perceptible sacrifice for the cause they profess to value. If we realise the true brotherhood of ministry and laity knit in the bonds of a common faith we have a right to expect that the burden should be shared alike, and that the sacrifice should not be all on one side. It is this consideration which gives all its point to Mr. RAWSON'S almost exhaustive paper, revealing so wide a disproportion between faithful ministerial service and the acknowledgment—we cannot say reward—of that service. The statistics tell their own painful tale, and one which is by no means new or unexpected to those who are well acquainted with the state of our denomination.

The main results of Mr. RAWSON'S inquiries are these. He sent out 284 circulars, that number including the names of all our ministers in active service. He received responses from 258. In addition to these he obtained information from the trustees of various Augmentation and other funds. The returns are systematically arranged in clear tabulated form under eight heads. Under the head of Ministers' Salaries he finds that there is a greater number of more than £250 a year than there was eighteen years ago. The average is about £184, which is larger than was expected, and higher than in the Congregationalist and Baptist denominations. The unsatisfactory feature in the returns is that there are 101 stipends—or more than one-third of the whole number—under £150, the minimum at which really efficient service should be supported. Forty-five of these are under £100 a year, chiefly in Wales and in the South of England, where some of the congregations "appear to have parted with almost every spark of vitality."

Under the heading of Ministers' Augmentation and other Funds Mr. RAWSON has revealed some startling facts. Few of our readers were probably aware of the number and extent of these endowments, which show the most generous consideration for the well-being of the ministry on the part of munificent donors in the past.

We reserve further comments on this and other points until the statistical tables are published; but from our own knowledge we can amply confirm the testimony of a well-informed correspondent of Mr. RAWSON'S that "there are Trusts South of the Trent more than equal to the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund in Liverpool." We know not whether Mr. RAWSON has included in his returns the Hibbert Trust, which was undoubtedly founded for the purpose of promoting the higher education and improved position of the Unitarian ministry, and the cause of pure Christianity, and no other purpose whatever. We must again express our emphatic opinion that in our times no Trust has been more signally perverted from the original intention of the founder, and we regret that the opportunity was lost of eliciting a decided expression of the public opinion one way or other of our Churches assembled through their representatives at the Liverpool Conference. It may be very instructive for a few of our Metropolitan ministers and laymen to hear admirable lectures on Comparative Religion from such men as MAX MULLER, RHYS DAVIDS, KUENEN, and others, who already have the ear of the public for whatever they choose to say or write; but we fail to understand how the present action of the Hibbert Trustees in this way or in their scheme of Travelling Scholarships—given to men who have not the slightest connection with the Free Churches—promotes the elevation of the Unitarian ministry or the cause of pure and simple Christianity.

The main practical question suggested by Mr. RAWSON'S returns was that in the face of existing resources, so copious as those presented in his tables of Trust funds, the establishment of a new fund required some consideration. He [evidently] leaned to the opinions expressed by some of his correspondents that by friendly co-operation among the authorities of existing funds, so as to prevent "over-lapping," and by giving larger grants in acknowledgment of efficient service, a minimum stipend of £150 could be easily secured to every deserving minister. The subsequent discussion brought out this one satisfactory fact, that our leading laymen are ashamed and disquieted at the revelations now made, and are determined to make a vigorous effort to rescue all ministers worthy of their salt from the heavy burden of grinding poverty. The whole question is submitted to the Conference Committee, already comprising some of the foremost ministers and laymen in the body, with power to add to their number, and as they will, no doubt, vigorously prosecute Mr. RAWSON'S inquiries, and gain, if necessary, still further information, the result may be left with confidence in their hands. But if this great work is really going to be successful, it is essential that simultaneous efforts should be made to improve the social and educational position of our ministers. We have no wish to offer further pecuniary inducements to tempt half-educated and needy men to enter or to remain in our ministry. The existing system of doles may bring some comfort to very poor ministers, but it often tends only to perpetuate an inefficient ministry of miserable and decaying Churches, which we entirely agree with Mr. RAWSON had better pass away altogether when every spark of vitality is extinguished. A new Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund on a large scale can only be useful if its resources are expended under wise and judicious management in substantially aiding only: (1) ministers of approved educational qualifications and really efficient service, and (2) congregations that give adequate evidence of vitality and self-sacrificing zeal for their own cause. We want no more half-starved inefficient ministers who are simply "hanging on," not even leading a forlorn hope; and we want no more decaying and spiritless congregations, who are simply cumbering the ground, dragging on a hopeless existence on ancient endowments which might be better applied to more useful objects. In the present state of our body our Free Churches will tolerate no interference with their absolute independence. But we are suffering from this absolute and exaggerated freedom; and for our own part we confess our entire sympathy with the views of another of Mr. RAWSON'S valued correspondents, who says:—"We ought to be so thoroughly organised ecclesiastically, while perfectly free theologically, that no one could enter our ministry without a recognised qualification, any more than he could enter the medical or legal profession; and we have suffered, and are suffering, serious loss for want of such an understanding." Our much-prized liberty often costs more than we know.

We cannot but wish in common with Mr.

THOM, whose letter on this subject we publish in another page, that the Conference had been able to give its whole time, or at least a whole day, to the consideration of Mr. RAWSON'S paper, with the view of working it out to a practical result. The discussion on the morning of the last day, after Mr. RATHBONE'S memorable speech, was necessarily short and hurried, and several important questions suggested by an invaluable paper received no attention whatever.

A BELATED PILGRIM.

A SERMON preached a few weeks ago has been put into our hands by one who heard it. On the cover it is stated that it has been "published by request." We have no desire to quarrel with other people's tastes, but certainly we should like to know the exact reasons of those who requested its publication for doing so. The author is the Rev. ARTHUR CONNELL, F.R.H.S., Rector of St. Mark's Parish Church, West Gorton, Manchester. The sermon is a remarkable one, and yet there is not a single eloquent passage in it, from its first page to the last; nor one that rises above the dullest level of common place. There is no great power of reasoning, no gleam of humour or flash of wit—but it is remarkable in as much that it should have been "published by request," by, we suppose, some of those who heard it delivered. There is nothing in it that any man of ordinary intellect might not have written. It makes one pause to think what must be the common run of sermons delivered in "St. Mark's Parish Church, West Gorton," that this one should be "published by request." It purports to deal with a great and widely prevalent evil, but it is with as much success as he would have who held up a reed, and hoped by that means to stay the rush of the storm-wind. It is evident that Mr. CONNELL is one of those belated pilgrims of time who mistake the nineteenth for the eighteenth century. The subject, "Non-attendance at Church," is one that is troubling the minds of many good people at present; and there is no doubt that it is a vital one, not only to our churches, but also to the moral and spiritual welfare of the future of our country. For even from a utilitarian point of view it is important, as the religious spirit is the source and surest guarantee of high morality. Many reasons have been given for "Non-attendance at Church"—(we wonder what reasons many good people would give for attending if they were asked the question)—some of them good, others we consider altogether beside the mark; but of this we are sure, however others may have fared, the Rev. Mr. CONNELL fails to understand what he believes to be the great ailment of the times, for which, nevertheless, he prescribes with so much assurance what he calls a remedy. He tells us that he "has given a good deal of thoughtful consideration to the subject." But we are afraid that he has made his inquiries and gathered his facts within very narrow limits, and that he has taken the "murmurs" of his own immediate set for "the murmur of the world." It is what we are all more or less prone to, and it is only by getting outside our own circle, and hearing a multitude of voices, that we can gather what public opinion really is. Thus does the reverend gentleman state the result of his "thoughtful consideration":—"I have arrived at the conclusion that the illegal and unscriptural innovations which have taken place in the services of some of our churches have tended, not a little, to drive some to the Dissenting Chapel, and to alienate others altogether from the public worship of God." Thus it is seen that it is not the larger question why religion suffers diminution of influence in our day, but why his own particular sect is not as prosperous as he would like it to be. Of course in the estimation of men of Mr. CONNELL'S stamp there is no other Church than the Episcopal one, which, because it happens to be by law established, is called "the Church of England," of course so far as it is supported by incomes drawn from national property, and so far as it is one of the branches of government in our anomalous country, with its democratic rule and aristocratic and monarchical forms, we must acknowledge it so to be—just as much as the army is the army of England, and the navy the navy of England, but no more and no less. But the real Church of England is made up of the churches in which Englishmen gather week by week to draw near to GOD in social worship; where they bow themselves and own their sins, and seek to strengthen themselves for arduous duties by communion with the mind and heart of the common father of all. No single sect is or ever can be the Church of England; nor ever will there be such a church in reality until the blessed time arrives in which doctrinal differences are counted of secondary importance, and men are content to unite in one great church having for their bond of union the religious spirit, which will combine them for the purpose of social prayer and mutual instruction, rather than for the purpose of opinion and its spread.

Mr. CONNELL goes on to utter his plaint against the present condition of things in the Episcopal Church, and at some length he describes the services which are common among the Ritualists. He asserts that these people are doing the work of the Church of Rome; that they not only know it, but that they do it consciously and of set purpose. And yet Roman Catholics look on, he says, and while gaining largely by their allies in the camp of the Lord, hold them in utter scorn as only mock and not real Catholics. These Ritualists are the terrible bugbears who are driving people away from the services of the "Church." He says:—

When worldly-minded people see men who have sworn allegiance to their Queen, canonical obedience to their bishops, and who have given their assent and consent to the Thirty-nine Articles, refusing to be governed by the laws of the realm as administered by her Majesty's Judges, disregarding the admonitions of their bishops, teaching doctrines diametrically opposed to the teaching of our Thirty-nine Articles and Book of Common Prayer, and substituting the Romish Mass, or some colourable imitation of it, for the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, they become reckless and indifferent, throw off all religious restraint, and plunge into the depths of infidelity.

We imagine if the reverend gentleman had to look a little deeper into the causes of the alienation of so many people from public worship, and why others are "driven to the Dissenting chapel"—nay, if he would take a wider survey and not even go deeper below the surface than he has done, he would find that those same "Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer," and the demands they make on the power of faith, go beyond the credence which men in our time are able to give. The quickened conscience of our age, and its enlarging knowledge, revolt at the demands made upon credence. The three creeds alone—the Apostles', the Nicene, the Athanasian—each of them containing things impossible of intelligent acceptance in our day, and the latest of them revolting the moral sense, are three powerful causes, which act as a centrifugal force to drive off members of the Episcopal Church of this country. And it is astonishing to find an intelligent man insisting as a remedy for disintegration on those very things which are most potent as disintegrating causes. But, nevertheless, it is so in his case:—"Is it to be wondered at that Christian people who have been cradled in the principles of the Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer, and who have been educated in the doctrines of God's Word, should become alienated from the Church where such things are tolerated and sanctioned, and seek the shelter of the Dissenting chapel? I trow not."

Ritualism so fills the forefront of his vision that he can see nothing else for that. The sun of science that is daily growing in brightness and showing nature, condemned by his theology as under a curse, as the sacred word of GOD, the enlarging thoughts of man, the growth of democracy, which means the development of humanity, and its stepping into its rightful place; the better apprehension and appreciation of the principles of Christ, are all nothing to him, though they are the great facts of the age. Ritualism is near to him, in his own branch of the Church, so that he is rendered blind to all the great realities of the time. And yet, according to his own account, the Churches where Ritualism prevails have but a scant attendance; then why should they be able to wield such a sinister influence? If the facts be as he states them, the people who have deserted these places, and "taken refuge in the Dissenting chapel," could not have been very ardently devoted to either Episcopacy or State Churchism, or they could easily have joined some one of the congregations which are never far away from those they have left where "Evangelical" services are conducted. But we had always understood before that Ritualistic services attracted largely by their music and florid decorations, while the churches where the music was of an ordinary kind and the services "bald" failed to attract. But it seems we have been mistaken, though we have heard it said over and over again, and attributed to evil principles in human nature. The fact is that the Church, like other less sacred bodies when it has an ailment it does not understand, and yet suffers from feeling its strength lessened and its enjoyment of life detracted from, seems apt to fall back on imaginary causes, and to look to fanciful remedies. But what is Mr. CONNELL'S remedy for this ailment of his Church? He says:—

Evangelical ministers in the present day must feel more fully their responsibility in relation to the solemn trust committed to them, and set forth the distinctive doctrines of our common Christianity; such as the Unity of the Godhead, the Trinity of Persons in the unity of the Divine essence, the fall of man, the natural depravity of the human heart, the atonement by the sacrificial sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus, justification by faith alone in the merits of Christ, the necessity of a spiritual regeneration and sanctification by the operation of the Holy Spirit. In a word, they must preach with no faltering voice—Ruin by Adam, Redemption by Christ, and Regeneration by the Spirit of God, and all those collateral truths which stand inseparably connected with these fundamental doctrines.

The person who put the sermon into our hand is a member of Mr. CONNELL'S church, or at least an attendant on its services, and when he did so it was with the words, "read that, and see what nonsense our minister can indulge in." Surely there is something significant in this sentence, and is one of the instances out of many more that proves that the preacher had been mistaking his own private meditations for the thoughts of the time, and his own voice for that of the nation. It is not the first time that the ministers of the Episcopal Church have been mistaken in supposing that they represented the prevailing views of their congregations'

From what we hear, if he and other preachers of a like way of thinking would but hold more frank theological intercourse with their flocks they would find that it is not a return to the theology of the sixteenth century or that of the fathers that is needed; but the going back further still, even to the simplicity that was in Christ. And the doctrines of sacramental grace, and that of Apostolic succession—the roots from which Ritualism grows—and Athanasian intolerance, and the presumption bred of exclusive State privileges, will have to be got rid of, before the stain of Ritualism can be purged from the Established Church, and the growing alienation of the thinking portion of the community can be stayed. It has a wonderful history, in spite of its numerous failings; the nation owes something to it for its services in the past; it has been "reformed" once before, why should it not be reformed again? It was separated from Rome, to its evident benefit; why should it not be separated from the State without injury in our day? Perhaps Mr. CONNELL will be able to answer these questions when he reads these words.

W.M.

THE CONFERENCE SPEAKERS.

Many of the readers of our National Conference reports last week must have been struck, as we were, with the great disproportion between the ministers and laymen who took part in the proceedings. The Conference Committee wisely selected three ministers and three laymen as the readers of the six papers, and it would have been well if a similar proportion had been maintained throughout the discussions. It would have added greatly to the interest and real value of the proceedings if it could have been arranged that a minister and layman should have been called on alternately. As usual, ministers who have so many other opportunities of addressing audiences on religious subjects, rushed to the front, and we were left with but few opportunities of hearing the sentiments of our leading laymen. In the first morning's discussion we find that two laymen spoke—one of them a lay-preacher—and ten ministers. In the afternoon of the same day six ministers spoke, and only one layman! At the soirée, on Wednesday, of four speakers only one, the chairman, was a layman. "But one halfpenny-worth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" On Thursday morning, after Mr. Estlin Carpenter's paper, three ministers spoke, and no layman. Mr. Harry Rawson's paper on "Ministers' Stipends and Augmentation Funds" was one which more than any other called for an expression of opinion on the part of our laymen; but even here two ministers led off the discussion, and it would have been a purely ministerial debate again, had not the Chairman (Mr. C. H. James, M.P.) promptly moved an important resolution and called upon Mr. William Rathbone, M.P., to second it. Even then two ministers again followed, and no time was left for any real expression of opinion on the part of our laymen. The speeches on the whole were exceedingly good and to the purpose; there were but two or three which added little or nothing to the value of the proceedings, and perhaps only one which might just as well have been left unsaid. But the occasion was a very remarkable one; the assemblage comprised an unusually large number of our foremost laymen from every part of the country, men who are social powers and leaders of the liberal movement in their respective localities, some of them gifted with rare power of speech; and it was certainly mortifying and disappointing to us, as it must have been to many others, to find that so few of these valued friends had the opportunity afforded them of expressing their well-weighed sentiments on subjects which concerned them quite as much as our respected ministers. If it is not too early to offer suggestions for the guidance of the next Conference, we would venture to throw out the following:—

(1) That ministers, as a rule, should impose upon themselves a self-denying ordinance, and that those of them who have obviously nothing to say should reserve it for the next little tea-meeting or Sunday-school gathering in their own locality. (2) That laymen should be specially requested to send up their names as speakers; and that the chairman, guided by the secretaries if necessary, should select from the various names thus submitted to him those speakers who are known to be best qualified to interest and instruct the meeting. An occasion of this kind is so rare and important that not a single minute ought to be wasted in useless or irrelevant speech; and there are, unfortunately, some ministers who need to be reminded that there are other opportunities of making themselves conspicuous, and more fitting places for expressing their opinions or "ventilating" their crotchets. We may add that among the silent brotherhood were several highly respected ministers, whose voices would have added to the value and dignity of the whole proceedings.

CONTEMPORARY OPINION ON THE LATE MR. DARWIN.

To-day, and for a long time to come, he will be mourned by all those in every land who can appreciate his vast services to knowledge and who honour a lifelong devotion to truth; but with the mourning there will be joined the thought that he was happy in living so long, surrounded by devoted friends, and spared not only to do the work that he had set himself to do, but to see it accepted on every side. The storm which howled around "The Origin of Species" at its first appearance has subsided. Even the orthodox are "adapting themselves to their environment," and are beginning to regard Evolution as a hypothesis which may in a measure be harmonised with their first principles. The story of such scenes as those which took place at the celebrated meeting of the British Association at Oxford, in 1860, and of the battle royal between Bishop Wilberforce and the young and ardent Mr. Huxley, reads at the present day like a scene from ancient history; like an episode in the persecution of Galileo, or a preliminary to the excommunication of Spinoza. The time has gone by when it was conceived possible to extinguish a scientific hypothesis by authority. Moreover, in little more than twenty years, that which is called the Darwinian hypothesis has established itself as, practically speaking, one of the accepted generalisations of science. It is not too much to say that there is no man of real scientific eminence in Europe or America who does not now hold to it in the main. . . . This rapid victory of an idea which at its first appearance was condemned by the unanimous voice of traditional opinion is in itself a very remarkable fact, and well deserves attention. What are the reasons of it? Do they lie in the inherent force of the idea itself, or in changed social conditions, or in the converging of many causes? The violent attacks on what is called Darwinism were not unnatural; on the contrary, the wonder is that they were not more prolonged and more determined. The professional theologians may be excused for the animosity which they displayed; for, on the one hand, it has always been their way, when they have fancied that the accepted views of the origin and destiny of man have been in danger, and, on the other hand, as those whose memory goes back to 1859 will recall, they were simultaneously threatened and exasperated by what they fancied to be a treacherous movement from their own camp, the publication of "Essays and Reviews." It is no wonder that they rallied vigorously to the defence of ideas and principles thus imperilled. They said many hard things and many unwise things; but, taken altogether, their utterances were moderate as compared with those of the champions of the same cause a little earlier. Not only did nobody propose the faggot and the stake for Mr. Darwin, but nobody of repute treated him with the brutal violence—no other words describe the fact—with which a few years before the mild and amiable Professor Sedgwick had dealt with the author of the "Vestiges of Creation." Happily, great as were the improvements that had come over the spirit of controversy between the days of Sedgwick and of the opponents of Mr. Darwin, the improvement during the past twenty years has been far greater. It would be too much to suppose that the spirit of theological odium has materially softened; but there is more caution and more decency in controversies, and somewhat more scruple either in imputing motives or in condemning a book unread and unconsidered.

And, as far as concerns the judgment of the world at large, the growth of the scientific temper self has wrought the change and has secured at fair hearing for any new doctrines, however unpalatable at first sight. The world is beginning to decide not by considerations, of what a theory may possibly lead to, not by a calculation of what is to be gained or lost by believing, but by a comparison of the evidence for and against.—Times.

Fortunate in many things, Mr. Darwin was chiefly fortunate in this: that he lived to see his achievements worthily prized and bearing worthy fruit. Not that he much valued fame for its own sake. He had a better reward than praise. He saw his ideas and his method inciting younger generations to eager research and guiding them to victory. He saw new territories subdued, and strongholds that had been deemed impregnable stormed by leaders who had learned in his school. This is a happiness which indeed few men have deserved and fewer attained: to see the labour of one's hands fruitful and blessed abundantly in a kind of present posterity. Mr. Darwin was not only the first of our men of science; he showed us in all his conduct the pattern of what a man of science ought to be. With a powerful and luminous mind he had untiring patience, unperturbed serenity, perfect openness and candour, and perfect freedom from petty and selfish desires. He lived in an unswerving search for truth, and reaped a great and just reward. Our children, unless we greatly err, will be taught to honour Darwin as the greatest Englishman since Newton. . . . It ran through the acute phases of controversy in a wonderfully short time; and a mighty clamour was raised by all sorts of people who were no more qualified to criticise a scientific theory than Mr. Darwin to read cuneiform inscriptions. When the hubbub ceased and the dust cleared away, men perceived that a revolution had been effected in scientific thought. Within ten years from its first publication it was no longer an hypothesis addressed to specialists, but might fairly appeal to the general educated public to estimate it by its results. This must be ascribed not more to the intrinsic value of Mr. Darwin's discovery than to the thorough-going way in which he worked it out. The penetration of his intellect was backed by an irresistible mass of evidence. The conclusion was not only right if you chose to see it; there was no escaping it by fair means. Probably Mr. Darwin himself was surprised by the rapidity of the success. But he was from the first not without a just and settled confidence of the goodness of his cause, and a clear foresight of what more might shortly be won, and what more would remain to do. The bearing of his theory on mental science, of which Mr. Darwin was not strictly bound to take notice at all, was indicated by him in these pregnant words:—"In the future I see open fields for far more important researches. Psychology will be securely based on the foundation already well laid by Mr. Herbert Spencer, that of the necessary acquirement of each mental power and capacity by gradation. Much light will be thrown on the origin of man and his history. It might be supposed that Mr. Darwin would put himself at a disadvantage by entering on the less familiar ground of moral philosophy. And this he so far did that he unavoidably gave to those who in natural history perforce treated him with grudging respect a certain opportunity of criticising him with an air of superior knowledge. But that was all. As a contribution to the study of ethics on the historical and psychological side, the chapters on the moral sentiments in the "Descent of Man" cannot be neglected by any philosophical student. They show in a smaller compass exactly the same qualities of patient mastery of facts, and definiteness without dogmatism, as Mr. Darwin's other work. Nor is good criticism of ethical conceptions wanting; the distinction between the standard and the motive of conduct has been put by no one more clearly or with a juster sense of its importance. The metaphysical part of ethics he wisely left alone.—St. James's Gazette.

Contemporary science in England boasts one indisputably great man, and we have lost him. Mr. Darwin's name may be ranked without fear with the names of the most famous philosophers. His place, it is almost impossible to doubt, must be where Newton and where Kepler are, with Aristotle and Copernicus. Perhaps no student since man first began to speculate on the world which surrounds him ever attained ideas so far in advance of what has been deemed true, and saw these ideas find acceptance with his contemporaries. Mr. Darwin was fortunate in the period of his birth. Had it been possible for a philosopher to arrive by his steps at his conclusions in any period more remote than the last two hundred years, he would have had but two courses before him. He might have held his peace, or he might have accepted the fate of Bruno and Vanini, not to say of Campanella.—Daily News.

For many a year past this truly great man enjoyed the admiration and respect of his countrymen, whose pride in his talents and veneration of his virtues were unbounded. But the Crown—Britain's High Steward, to whom she unreservedly entrusts the distribution of honorific rewards to the more deserving of her sons—left Darwin's surpassing merits utterly unacknowledged and unrecompensed. This inconceivable neglect affords matter for bitter reflection to every patriotic Englishman, and is a shameful reproach to us among nations. The wrong done to England and the illustrious departed alike is unfortunately irremediable. Darwin is dead, untitled and undecorated, save by the hand of a foreign Sovereign, more generous in his recognition of English claims to universal gratitude than the counsellors of Royalty in these islands. Had Darwin been a German, Austrian, or Italian born, titles and distinctions would long since have been showered upon him. As, however, he was only one of the greatest Englishmen that ever lived, whose modest birth and peaceful pursuits excluded him from the category of hereditary or official candidates for Blue or Red Ribands, supreme authority deemed him all unworthy of such inestimable boons as a British titular predicate or badge of Chivalry.—Daily Telegraph.

If death were the most important incident in a great man's life, the news that Mr. Darwin is no more among us would be the most momentous announcement that the civilised world has heard for many a year past. The bustle of daily politics is for the most part but dusty sterility compared with the vast effect of the labours of the thinker who from his tranquil hilltop in his little Kentish village shook the world. When we think of the impulse which Darwin's speculation has given to thought, not only in natural science, but over the whole field of thought, in philosophy, in literature, and even in connection with the activities of politics, we see that, so far as contemporaries can judge, Darwin deserves nothing less than to rank with those lofty names, Newton and Locke. He has given exactly the same stir, the same direction, to all that is most characteristic in the intellectual energy of the nineteenth century, as did Locke and Newton in the eighteenth.—Fall Mall Gazette.

Of the rulers in the empire of thought who have been born into the world during the present century none, perhaps, has done more than he to extend the boundaries of human knowledge.—Daily Chronicle.

In its own way the life of Mr. Darwin was an ideal life. Arrogance, irritability, and envy, the faults that ordinarily beset men of genius, were not so much conquered as non-existent in a singularly simple and generous mind. That the order of the universe is the order of a Supreme Mind working silently and closely through ages, and not spasmodically through centuries, is now as much an accepted idea of civilised man as the theory of gravitation. To the general acceptance of this idea no one contributed so powerfully as Mr. Darwin.—Saturday Review.

By the death of Charles Darwin England has lost the most original, as well as far the most celebrated, of modern men of science—the one man whom European science would, with one voice, probably agree to consider as the most eminent scientific writer and thinker of the present century. No man of our century has changed [so vitally] the scientific beliefs of our day.—Spectator.

The foremost of English men of science, one who has worked a revolution, not in the natural sciences only, but in every branch of human thought.—Athenæum.

Darwin will remain one of the greatest glories of science. No other man has during the second half of this century exercised a more decisive and fruitful influence on the progress of natural science. No one else has so much honoured science by the nobility of his character, by the primitive simplicity of his life, and by his deep and sincere love of truth.—Gaulois.

The entire world stands sorrowing around the great man's grave.—Tageblatt.

The doctrine of Darwin is not only a true one, but contains also a large measure of profound morality. Mankind are beginning to feel that the Darwinism enforced on every individual the duty of co-operating, each according to his capacity, in the steady improvement of himself and his contemporaries.—Neue Freie Presse.

The most implacable adversaries of the doctrine of descent are unanimous in paying homage to his exceptional qualities.—Liberté.

Darwin's work has not been merely the exposition of a system, but, as it were, the production of an epic—the great poem of the genesis of the universe, one of the grandest that ever proceeded from a human brain—an epic magnificent in its proportions, logical in its deductions, and superb in its form. Darwin deserves not only a place by the side of Leibnitz, Bacon, or Descartes, but is worthy to rank with Homer and Virgil.

The glory of Darwin is inseparable from the literary history of the nineteenth century. This great savant has been a great poet.—Télégraphe.

We must apologise for touching on political matters on a day when humanity has suffered so great a loss. It seems to us that the world has become gloomier and grown grayer since this star ceased to shine. Our century is Darwin's century. We can now suffer no greater loss, as we do not possess a second Darwin to lose.—Allgemeine Zeitung.

Darwin's death causes lamentations as far as truth has penetrated, and wherever civilisation has made any impression. Darwin advanced the progress of mankind. Although his peculiar work was determining man's real position in nature, the life of Darwin had far greater importance in point of culture than the life and work of many more exalted personages who were interred with pomp.—Neue Freie Presse.

Darwin's "Origin of Species" caused a revolution second to none since the days of Copernicus—a revolution which soon extended far beyond the sphere of natural history, and is already making itself felt in our whole social system. Without knowing or intending it, we have become Darwinian in our politics, in our economy, and in our history, which have all resolved themselves into a struggle for existence. The Darwinian theory has absorbed all metaphysical and religious speculations.—Presse.

A man of science who made a mark upon his times in a manner unparalleled by any of his contemporaries. He compelled every branch of science to acknowledge his revolutionizing discoveries. The completion of his gigantic system will give abundant occupation to the remotest generations; but the memory of the founder of this prodigious structure will remain imperishable to all time.—Cologne Gazette.

Mr. Darwin was a genius of the first order, who may be safely placed in a line with our great Cuvier, and in our opinion he was even superior by the originality of his conceptions and the grandeur and penetration of his method.—Paris.

Dr. Cyon in the Gaulois, himself a scientific man, says that no naturalist has occupied so vast a place as Mr. Darwin in this century.

THE FUNERAL.

The remains of Mr. Darwin were interred in Westminster Abbey on Wednesday, Canon Protheroe officiating in the unavoidable absence of the Dean. The coffin, which on the previous night had been deposited in St. Faith's Chapel, was in the morning placed in the porch of the Chapter House, which was also appropriated as a place of assembly for the members of scientific and learned bodies and other representative men who had gathered in large numbers to do honour to his memory. The pallbearers were the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Argyll, Mr. Russell Lowell (the American Minister), Professor Huxley, Sir Joseph Hooker, Sir John Lubbock, M.P., Mr. Alfred Russell Wallace, Dr. Spottiswoode (President of the Royal Society), and Canon Farrar; while among the general company present were the French, German, Italian, and Spanish Ambassadors, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Marquis of Salisbury (Chancellor of the University of Oxford), Lord Aberdeen (President of the Geographical Society), Right Hon. H. Childers, M.P., Right Hon. Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. H. Fawcett, M.P. (Postmaster-General), Right Hon. A. J. Mundella (Vice-President of the Council), Right Hon. Sir Charles Dilke, Bart., M.P., Mr. Herbert Spencer, Dr. W. B. Carpenter, Mr. E. H. Halton, Mr. Frederick Harrison, Professor Jowett, the Master of Balliol, Professor Max Müller, Mr. A. B. Tyler, and many other distinguished men.

We understand that Mr. Gladstone offered a baronetcy to Mr. Thomas Ashton, a well-known member of the Liberal party in Lancashire, but that he respectfully declined the honour.

Occasional Notes.

SOME interesting "Recollections" of the late George Dawson have been reprinted, with additions, from the second number of the Manchester Quarterly, issued this month. These recollections are from the pen of Mr. Alexander Ireland, who enjoyed a warm and unbroken friendship with Mr. Dawson for thirty years until his death. Mr. Ireland was asked by Mr. Dawson in 1876 to contribute some recollections of him in his earlier years to a memoir then about to be undertaken by Mr. Timmins. He tells of his hearing Dawson preach in Birmingham at Christmas time in 1845, and of his being introduced to him and spending some hours with him in the house of a common friend. After this Mr. Ireland secured an invitation for him to lecture on "The Genius and Writings of Carlyle" at the Manchester Athenæum. Mr. Ireland furnishes some brief recollections of the plan of these lectures. They were given in the early days of Dawson's work and fame, and will recall for many impressions, which can never vanish, of the earnest and remarkable young man who took all audiences captive by his eloquence.

THE general public scarcely knew anything of the late Rev. Hugh Pearson, Vicar of Sonning and Canon of Windsor, who was buried on Tuesday last in the churchyard of the little Berkshire village where he for more than forty years exercised his ministry. And yet Canon Pearson is described—and, it would seem, not without reason—as "one of the most remarkable clergymen of the present generation." We read, in a tribute paid to his memory by a correspondent of the Times—"He had great influence, which he exercised in a manner peculiar to himself. He could scarcely have been supposed to be orthodox, yet he succeeded in retaining the affection and esteem of his clerical brethren. He was an excellent preacher, but would not allow his sermons to be published; and though he had an extraordinary knowledge of literature, he never for a moment dreamed of becoming an author." For more than forty years he was on the closest terms of intimacy with Dean Stanley; he was greatly beloved and esteemed by the Royal Family; there was scarcely a person of eminence in the country to whom he was not known, "from Lord Sidmouth, an old parishioner, and Bishop Blomfield and Wilberforce, who had been the friends of his boyhood, down to the distinguished men who are still actors upon the scene." He was equally beloved by rich and poor, and charmed every society into which he entered. "He lived for others, without ambition, and without any regard for his own interests." On his death-bed his parishioners were admitted to see him, and as they flocked in he seemed to remember them all, and affectionately took leave of every one. He was devoted to his parish and the people were devoted to him with a reverence and attachment rarely witnessed. "His own life, as well as his death, was the best of proofs, to those who require one, that Christianity may continue to exist without a dogmatic system."

In the appendix to a work recently published, the Rev. Dr. Eliot, of St. Louis, U.S.A., pays the following tribute to Dr. J. Freeman Clarke, the preacher at our forthcoming Whitsuntide meetings:—"Another of my Cambridge fellow-students, but my teacher ever since, is James Freeman Clarke, who has gathered into his published sermons and books a wonderful wealth of learning on the 'Great Religions' of the world. With an impartiality of criticism as rare as it is admirable, he finds in all his researches new reason more highly to prize the divine simplicity and universality of Gospel Truth. As the Magi of old brought gold and frankincense and myrrh, their reverent gifts to the infant Jesus, so does this devout student of all religious developments bring their treasures of wisdom and lay them at the feet of Him who said, 'I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes.'"

On Monday afternoon the Rev. Alex. J. D. D'Orsey, B.D., College Lecturer on Public

Reading, delivered two introductory lectures at King's College on "Preaching" and "Church Reading." In the former he admitted the justice of many of the Rev. J. P. Mahaffy's strictures on the "Decay of the Pulpit," but denied that modern preaching had failed. He granted the essential importance of piety, zeal, and learning, but considered our failures due to want of training in English composition and pulpit delivery. The second lecture pointed out the common faults in Church reading, inaudibility, indistinctness, monotony, mannerism, sing song, mispronunciation, false emphasis, &c., and suggested sound and systematic teaching at Oxford and Cambridge and Theological Colleges as the only remedy.

NOTHING is more remarkable in connection with the death of Darwin than the altered tone of the leading divines of the Orthodox world, as well as of that portion of the Conservative press which once held him in abhorrence. A few years ago the name of Darwin was associated with Materialism, Atheism, and immorality. Now it is spoken of with something like reverence by Church of England divines. On Sunday Dr. Barry, when preaching at Westminster Abbey, said that the principle of selection was in no way alien to the Christian Religion. In the afternoon, in the same Church, Canon Protheroe, in a sermon against bigotry and superstition, eulogised Darwin for his sweetness of temper, and for carrying about with him "the very essence of the true principle of Christ." But it was not merely in Westminster Abbey, around which the tolerant spirit of Dean Stanley is supposed to linger, that Darwin was praised. In St. Paul's Cathedral Canon Liddon recognised him as a worker "in the universal triumph of truth." The Evolution theory is no longer blasphemous, as according to the Canon, "it is seen that, whether the creative action of God is manifested through catastrophes, as the phrase goes, in progressive evolution, it is still His creative activity, and the really great questions beyond remain untouched." It is a pity, as a daily contemporary remarks, that some of these nice things were not said whilst the great thinker was alive.

In the "Journals of Caroline Fox" there is the following reference to Longfellow, which may be of interest at the present time:—"July 30 (1846). Made the acquaintance of two American ladies, and was much pleased with them. Mary Ashburnham, alias Fanny Appleton, was a near neighbour and friend of theirs—a most beautiful girl, whom thirty bold gentlemen sought to win! She came to Europe, and met Longfellow in the Black Forest, and there transacted the scenes described in "Hyperion." She returned to America, and her father on his death bed expressed his wish that of all her suitors she should fix her choice on Longfellow, as the person most worthy of her and most able to sympathise with her feelings. After a little time she married him, settled in the country in poetic simplicity, and speaks of herself as the happiest woman possible. My friends heard him read his prize poem at the College so exquisitely that their orator Everett said he could hardly endure to speak after him."

We are glad to hear, what we hope is more than a mere rumour, that Frederick Douglass, whose autobiography we have reviewed in full this week, intends to pay another visit to this country at no distant date. Many of our readers, in common with ourselves, entertain a vivid recollection of his eloquent orations delivered here nearly forty years ago, and will be delighted to renew their acquaintance with him.

The decision to place the remains of Darwin in Westminster Abbey was approvingly commented on by the French papers. The France is happy to see that England knows how to honour the memory of her great men, irrespective of their religious opinions. It contrasts the liberality of the Protestant Church towards Darwin with the intolerance of the Catholic Church towards Littré. It hopes that the Clericals of France will take pattern from the example set by their neighbours across the Channel in rendering justice to the splendid parts of the great British Naturalist.—We cannot, however, say much for Protestant liberality when we remember the fierce censure against Darwin, led by Bishop Wilberforce in his well-known onslaught on "The Origin of Species." The only difference between Protestant and Catholic intolerance is that in this country the former is almost impotent, and can only indulge in inarticulate shrieks and denunciations, while the latter is at least respectable in its real power and consistency.

It was stated recently that the powers of Whittier, the patriarch of American poets, who is now seventy-five years of age, appeared to be decaying. The March number of the Atlantic Monthly, however, contains the following graceful little poem, which shows that the Quaker minstrel can still sing as sweetly as of yore:—

AT LAST.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And, in the winds from unsummed space blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown,

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love divine, O Helper ever present,
Be Thou my strength and stay.

Be near me when all else is from me drifting—
Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to my own unlifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but Thee, O Father! Let Thy spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm, I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through Thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place.

Some humble door among Thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows for ever through Heaven's green expansions
The river of Thy peace.

There, from the music round about me stealing,
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find, at last, beneath Thy trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

WE desire to call the attention of our readers to the approaching annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society. Collections will be made on its behalf on Sunday, May 14, in various chapels, and the meeting will be held at the Mission House, George's-row, Lever-street, City-road, on Wednesday evening, May 17. Tea will be provided at half-past six, to which the workers and friends of the Mission Stations are invited. The chair will be taken at half-past seven o'clock by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., and the meeting will be addressed by the Rev. Dr. Martineau, David Ainsworth Esq., M.P., Mr. J. Allanson Picton, M.A., and other friends.

THE Rev. W. H. Channing sends us the following advertisement:—

"LOST HEARTS, LOST HEADS, AND LOST HATS."—Amidst the enlivening meetings of the National Conference, last week, many lost their old hearts and heads and received them back renewed. But to the undersigned fell the mischance—and to me alone, let me trust—of losing a new hat, and finding in its place one not so new. Mine was a Christie's "London best ministers' soft hat, lined with light twilled silk," and padded. And as my brother's head (who, amidst the confusion of the break-up of the Conference, interchanged with me) is larger than mine, it will be more befitting for both to re-exchange, if he will kindly give me his address.—W. H. Channing, 3, Campden House-road, Kensington, London, W.

The Christian World has the following "Note" on the recent address to the Queen of the "Body of English Presbyterian Ministers in and near the cities of London and Westminster":—

on her happy escape from the attempt upon her life by the lunatic Maclean. It is startling to observe that Dr. Martineau, whom we all know as a Unitarian of the most undoubted, if not of the highest stamp, appeared at the head of a loyal body, representing "the English Presbyterians in and near the Cities of London and Westminster." However, much some of the Presbyterians may respect Dr. Martineau, it must be gall and wormwood to them to let it go forth that this distinguished minister, and a number of his Unitarian brethren, really represented "the English Presbyterians." The announcement does not mean, however, that either Dr. Martineau, on the one hand, or the Presbyterians on the other, have abandoned their theological differences, which separate them from each other as by "a great gulf." The form employed to designate those whom Dr. Martineau really represented is the survival of an old legal controversy which has practically long since been settled.

The Presbyterians to whom the Christian World refers are Scotch Presbyterians, as the names of their ministers very significantly indicate. We are not in love with the name, but it cannot be reasonably denied that, ecclesiastically, we are the lineal descendants of the English Presbyterians, and in that capacity have inherited their ancient Trusts and endowments.

THE series of St. Giles's lectures at Edinburgh on "The Faiths of the World" was brought to a close on Sunday afternoon with a discourse by Professor Flint on "Christianity in Relation to other Religions." He maintained that Christianity was the absolute religion in the sense of the perfect realisation of the idea which underlay and gave significance to all religions. Religion was the communion between a worshipping subject and a worshipped object—the communion of man with what he believed to be a god, and Christianity alone of all religions gave a clear, self-consistent, adequate view of God. No religions were wholly false or "without some soul of goodness," and in so far as any religion was true or good, it was akin to the religion in which the fulness of truth and goodness implied in the idea of religion had been realised—the absolute religion founded by Him who, in the spirit not of narrow exclusiveness, but of broadest inclusiveness, claimed to be "the way, the truth, and the life."

THE late Sir Henry Cole was so closely connected with the foundation, development, and success of the great Museum and Art-School at South Kensington that the world has almost forgotten that he was once a popular writer; that, when quite a young man, he exerted himself successfully to reform the system of Public Records; and that he had a considerable share in the establishment of the Penny Post. Dying peacefully at the ripe age of eighty-six, he had long outlived a good deal of opposition of the unintelligent sort, and the value of his services had become almost universally recognised.

MR. W. B. RANDS, better known to the public under his pseudonyms of "Matthew Browne" and "Henry Holbeach," died on Sunday, in his fifty-sixth year. Mr. Rands, besides his numerous contributions to the Contemporary Review and other periodical publications, published a number of works in book-form, among them "The Shoemaker's Village" (a novel), "Chaucer's England," "Views and Opinions," "Lilliput Levée," and "Lilliput Lectures." Mr. Rands was a fellow Sunday school teacher with the late George Dawson, and held very similar theological views, of a somewhat more "radical" complexion. He has on more than one occasion officiated in a Unitarian pulpit. The remains were interred this day, the Rev. George Carter, of Peckham, officiating.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—This cooling Medicine has the happiest effect when the blood is overheated and a tendency to inflammatory action is set up in the system; one Pill taken shortly before dinner does away with the indigestion, fulness, and flatulency—indications of a weak stomach, or disordered liver. A few Pills taken at bedtime act as alteratives and aperients; they not only relieve the bowels, but regulate every organ connected with them, overcome all acrid humours, and encourage a free supply of all the secretions essential to our well-being. Holloway's Pills thoroughly cleanse and perfectly regulate the circulation, and beget a feeling of comfort in hot climates and high temperatures, which is most desirable for preservation of health.

Reviews.

Life and Times of Frederick Douglass.
Written by Himself, &c. With Illustrations. Hartford, Conn. (U.S.). Park Publishing Company. 1881. *

We remember no other instance in which a man has three times published chapters of his autobiography, and has been amply justified in doing so. The first narrative of the life of Frederick Douglass was printed in 1845, when he was twenty-eight years old. He had escaped from slavery seven years before, and had become a very effective speaker at Anti-slavery meetings. As many doubted whether he could ever have been a slave, he was induced to write out the leading facts connected with his experience in slavery, giving names of persons and places, and dates. When Mr. Wendell Phillips saw the manuscript, he said that in Douglass's place he would "throw it into the fire," as it would rouse the vengeance of the slaveholders, who would probably recapture him. But he was willing to run the risk. The little book reached several editions, and has been translated into French, German and, we believe, Italian. Fortunately, for himself, and for the cause he had at heart, it was arranged for him that year to visit England. He arrived in 1845, and left in 1847. He was not allowed a ticket as a cabin passenger on the Cambria; but the Hutchinson family—"sweet singers of anti-slavery and the good time coming"—were fellow passengers, and often cheered him with their songs; and he received an invitation to give a lecture on slavery, on board. A few Southerners swore he should not speak, and threatened violence; but when Captain Judkins gave orders to put them in irons, they learnt some decorum; though when they landed they flew to the Press, to justify their conduct, and to denounce Douglass. He could have had no better advertisement, and crowds everywhere flocked to his meetings. He roused remarkable enthusiasm. His very presence was a condemnation of slavery. It is base to oppress the weak; but perhaps the oppression of the strong most stirs the blood. It was an obvious outrage, that one with so fine a presence, so masculine in his eloquence, and of such independent spirit, should bear on his back the marks of the lash. He shrank from speaking much of his personal experiences; but those who read his narrative had little difficulty in realising how, at sixteen, he met force with force, and cowed the brutal negro-breaker, Covey. During his visit he helped Mr. G. Thompson and others in urging the Free Church to "send back the money" received from slaveholders; and though they did not succeed, they wakened Scotland to the iniquity of slavery. In Ireland he was welcomed by "the Liberator" (as he was commonly called), who introduced him to a meeting as the "Black O'Connell of the United States." John Mitchell, as is well known, when he reached America after the expiration of his sentence, wished for a "slave plantation well stocked with slaves;" but "when the friends of repeal in the Southern States sent O'Connell money with which to carry on his work, he, with ineffable scorn, refused the bribe, saying he would 'never purchase the freedom of Ireland with the price of slaves'" (p. 243). Douglass was introduced during his travels to many eminent friends of freedom, and received the blessing of the venerable T. Clarkson, who said, "I have given sixty years of my life to the emancipation of your people, and if I had sixty years more they should all be given to the same cause." Before his return home his British friends felt that he ought no longer to be endangered as a fugitive, and Mrs. Richardson raised a fund for his ransom. His old master, T. Auld, sold him his free papers for £150, dated December, 1846. His friends in this country had also raised £500 to enable him to establish a paper for the special benefit of the coloured people. He made his home in Rochester, N.Y., and there for a long series of years he edited and published weekly the North Star, afterwards known as Frederick Douglass's Paper, to distinguish it from other papers of similar name. Its usual circulation was about 3,000. It promoted the object he had in view, and also greatly developed his mental and moral energies. He gave great offence, however, to Mr. Garrison and other old friends by renouncing their disunion and non-voting policy, and joining what was called the Liberty—afterwards the Free Soil—party. Subsequent events showed the wisdom of his choice. In 1855, at the request of a friend, he wrote "My Bondage and my Freedom." He recomposed the history of his slave life; and, as a literary production, it did ample credit to his self-culture during the ten years which had elapsed from his first narrative. He also added four chapters, in which he related his life as a freeman with modest brevity.

More than a quarter of a century passed. During that period his life was endangered in the panic caused by John Brown's raid at Harper's Ferry. The civil war followed. Slavery was abolished. The freed men received the suffrage, and became American citizens. Douglass removed to Washington, where he edited the National Era. He was appointed by President Grant to accompany the St. Domingo Commission, and to a seat in the Council of the District of Columbia (by which he was entitled to be called "Hon."). President Hayes made him United States Marshall; and President Garfield, on his resigning that post, gave him the office of Recorder of Deeds at Washington. Such changes of fortune rarely occur, even to self-made men; and he was urged to complete the record of his life to the present time. He could not but feel that it would be an encouragement to those in whose welfare he has always shown the deepest interest, to relate what may be done by one who had the courage and ability to live down prejudice, and it is characteristic that it was a motive with him to bear his testimony to many who had been his friends and helpers. As he rewrote his first book when preparing his second, so he has now rewritten "My Bondage and my Freedom." He has not amplified but abridged the narrative of his slave-life, which comprises about two-fifths of the present volume. There are some who will regard it as the most exciting portion, and no doubt it is the furthest removed from the experience of his readers; but those who are already familiar with it will turn with yet deeper interest to the remarkable incidents of his subsequent career. Some of these we shall briefly relate.

In 1855, he declined to relate the mode of his escape from slavery. He thought it very impolitic to let the slaveholders know how freedom was achieved. Those who revealed the way too often closed it for their successors by putting the tyrants on their guard. Now, there is no reason for secrecy; and we learn that he travelled from Baltimore to New York in the garb of a seaman. Having worked in a ship-yard, he could keep up the character; and he had borrowed from a free-coloured sailor his "protection" certificate. At New York he was joined by the free woman of colour to whom he was engaged, and there they were married; they took up their abode at New Bedford, and as the shipwrights there refused to work with him, he gained his living by such rough hard labour as a negro was allowed to undertake. It was three years before he became a public advocate of the cause so deeply embedded in his heart.

Mr. Douglass's second visit to England was in 1859, after the arrest of John Brown. It was known that they had been on confidential terms; but it afterwards proved that, so far from encouraging Brown's attempt, Douglass had warned him from it. Some future biographer of the heroic man whose death had such a wonderful effect in promoting a reaction for freedom may gain many interesting particulars from this narrative. Douglass first saw J. Brown in 1847. He was then carrying on a prosperous business at Springfield, Mass. When he was conducted from his handsome "store" to his residence, he was surprised to find it a small wooden building in a back street, as bare as possible of furniture; and the meal provided was of the plainest description. "Everything implied stern truth, solid purpose and rigid economy;" all that Brown could save was devoted to the great object of his life. His natural strength of will was intensified by deep religious feeling. His plan then was, to have a band of picked men, who should have their hiding places in the mountains that stretched away into the Slave-States; these were to attract the most daring slaves to join them; this would teach the masters the insecurity of their "property"! As to the danger to himself, "he could but be killed, and he had no better use for his life than to lay it down in the cause of the slave." Douglass "afterwards became more and more tinged by the colour of this man's strong impressions," and he believed that slavery could only be destroyed by bloodshed. Brown took a conspicuous part in the Kansas war. About three weeks before the raid on Harper's Ferry, he summoned Douglass to a secluded spot in Pennsylvania, and told him the new scheme, which he opposed with all the arguments in his power; but Brown was not a man to be shaken in his purpose. When the news came of the attempt and its failure, it was no easy matter for Douglass to escape from Philadelphia to Canada and from thence to England, as his intimacy with Brown was notorious; and Governor Wise of Virginia had obtained the help of the President to apprehend him. As the brave old "Captain" expressly said that he, and he alone, was responsible for all that happened, the investigating committee appointed by Congress found that they laboured in vain to implicate any one in the attempt.*

Emerson's prediction—that Brown's gallows would become like the cross—was being fulfilled. . . . All over the North, men were singing the John Brown song. His body was in the dust, but his soul was marching on, and the election of Lincoln to the Presidency was the result of the new life and power given to the principle of justice and liberty. Douglass threw himself into the contest with firmer faith and more ardent hope than ever before. When, however, it became evident that the South was in earnest in its threats of disruption, the North was terrified into base concessions. "Most of the Northern legislatures repealed their personal liberty Bills," and "anti-slavery meetings were ruthlessly assailed and broken up." Happily the South, by commencing the war, turned against itself that love for the Union which the Abolitionists had once deemed so baneful. If the North had met with the military success it expected, the Union would have been restored without detriment to slavery. The Washington Government announced to the world that "however the war for the Union might terminate, no change would be made in the relation of master and slave" (p. 356). There was a great fear of alienating the Border States, which remained in the Union, and soldiers returned slaves to their masters! Douglass from the first reproached the North for only fighting with one hand! The slaves in the South were helping the Confederacy by their toils, while the North discarded the help of the free negroes. At last the Administration consented to enlist coloured soldiers, and Douglass earnestly summoned his people to arms. Two of his sons enlisted, and their regiment made full proof of courage and endurance, but the Confederates treated coloured soldiers as felons, and they were neither paid nor promoted on the same footing as their white comrades. Douglass felt bound to lay the complaints of his people before the President and the Secretary of War, and he gives a very interesting account of his interview. They evidently felt the justice of his claims, but were hampered by the popular prejudices. Mr. Stanton said that he should be made Assistant Adjutant to a recruiting general, but the commission never arrived! They "fought the rebellion, but not its cause."

* The English editor has done well to append a note of two pages (with a view of Harper's Ferry), pp. 266-268, giving an account of J. Brown's trial and execution. It is a useful record for English readers.

* This edition is sold by Trübner and Co., Ludgate-hill, for 10s. 6d.—the original price. A reprint, with the author's consent, edited by Mr. J. Lobb, of The Christian Age, is published for 6s. at the Christian Age office, St. Bride-street. It is more closely printed, containing about 460 pp.; but it is a more attractive looking book, with better paper and a decorated cover; the artist, however, who delineated a village with palm trees, should have been told that they do not grow in Maryland. The American edition (to which the pages in our review refer) contains steel engravings of F. Douglass and President Lincoln, which are much superior to the woodcuts in the reprint; though that of F. Douglass is by no means so satisfactory as photographs which we have seen. There are sixteen woodcuts in the American edition, only eight of which are reproduced; but the English edition has other illustrations—portraits of T. Clarkson, Mrs. Stowe, and Gen. Garfield, and a view of Harper's Ferry. We cannot say much of any of them, in either volume, as works of art.

At length the time came (Jan. 1, 1863) when the step which Mr. Lincoln personally desired seemed to be justified in the interests of the Union. The Government, which could not legally emancipate the slaves of their supporters, proclaimed liberty to those of their enemies. It was thus, no doubt, open to criticism; but, practically, it was accepted as a change of policy of the utmost importance. Up to the last, there was doubt whether the President would carry out his purpose. Douglass gives a graphic account of the great meeting at the Tremont Temple, Boston, which awaited the proclamation. A line of messengers was established between the telegraph office and the platform.

Eight, nine, ten o'clock came and went, and still no word. A visible shadow seemed falling on the expecting throng, which the confident utterances of the speakers sought in vain to dispel. At last, when patience was well nigh exhausted, and suspense was becoming agony, a man (I think it was Judge Russell) with hasty step advanced through the crowd, and with a face fairly illumined with the news he bore, exclaimed in tones that thrilled all hearts, "It is coming!" "It is on the wires!" The effect of this announcement was startling beyond description, and the scene was wild and grand. Joy and gladness exhausted all forms of expression, from shouts of praise, to sobs and tears. My old friend Rue, a colored preacher, a man of wonderful vocal power, expressed the heartfelt emotion of the hour when he led all voices in the anthem,

"Sound the loud timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea, Jehovah hath triumphed, his people are free."
The meeting [adjourned to a church] did not break up till near the dawn of day. It was one of the most affecting and thrilling occasions I ever witnessed.—P. 359.

Mr. Lincoln's hesitation (as well as his decision) was justified by the result. Those who were tired of the war said that they were willing to fight for the Union, but not for the freedom of negroes; and in July, 1863, a draft for enlistment was opposed in New York by a mob, chiefly Irish, which poured forth its fierce wrath on the coloured people.

It spared neither age nor sex; it hanged negroes, simply because they were negroes; it murdered women in their homes, and burnt their homes over their heads; it dashed out the brains of young children against the lampposts, it burned the colored orphan asylum, a noble charity on the corner of Fifth Avenue, and, scarce allowing time for the helpless two hundred children to make good their escape, plundered the building of every valuable piece of furniture; and colored men, women, and children were forced to seek concealment in cellars or garrets, or wherever else it could be found, until this high carnival of crime and reign of terror should pass away.—P. 361.

General Grant secured the confidence of the coloured troops by ordering his other soldiers to treat them with due respect; but the President found that the slaves in the South were less affected by his proclamation than he expected; and he summoned Douglass to an interview to devise means to make them acquainted with it (this, however, was rendered unnecessary by the success of the war). While they were conversing, a loyal Governor was twice announced; and Mr. Lincoln said, "Tell Governor Buckingham to wait, for I want to have a long talk with my friend Frederick Douglass." We have a most interesting account of the inauguration after Lincoln's re-election. "The address sounded more like a sermon than a State paper"; its solemn words well befitted one who was on the eve of martyrdom. In the evening Douglass resolved to attend the President's reception at the White House. He was turned back by the police, who said that they had orders to admit no persons of colour. He refused to believe it, and sent a message to the President. It proved that the police had no such orders. "They were simply complying with an old custom, the outgrowth of slavery, as dogs will sometimes rub their necks, long after their collars are removed, thinking they are still there." He was admitted to the spacious reception room:—

Like a mountain pine, high above all others, Mr. Lincoln stood in his grand simplicity, and home-like beauty. Recognising me even before I reached him, he exclaimed, so that all around could hear him, "Here comes my friend Douglass." Taking me by the hand, he said:—"I am glad to see you. I saw you in the crowd to-day listening to my inaugural address; how did you like it?" I said, "Mr. Lincoln, I must not detain you with my poor opinion, while there are thousands waiting to shake hands with you." "No, no," he said, "you must stop a little, Douglass, there is no man in the country whose opinion I value more than yours. I want to know what you think of it?" I replied, "Mr. Lincoln, that was a sacred effort." "I am glad you liked it," he said, and I passed on.—P. 373.

We read with deep interest what is further said of this great and good man.*

After the war was ended, a great work remained in securing the amendment of the Constitution, and the suffrage for the freedmen. President Johnson could not be trusted, and the National Loyalists summoned a convention at Philadelphia. Douglass was elected as a delegate from Rochester, N.Y.: a remarkable distinction, as it contained 60,000 white citizens, and only about 200 coloured ones. On his journey he met a large body of delegates from the South and West, who were anxious to persuade him that it would ruin the objects of the Convention if a coloured man attended it. Of course he did not consent to contradict the principle and practice of his life. When the procession of delegates was formed at Philadelphia it was expected that no one would walk with him, but Mr. T. Tilton, an eminent editor, cordially joined him. In Philadelphia the "populace had mobbed anti-slavery meetings, burned temperance halls and churches owned by coloured people, and burned down Pennsylvania Hall because it had opened its doors to people of different colours on terms of equality;" but now, instead of being pelted or hissed, along the whole line of march he was cheered repeatedly and enthusiastically. The delegates felt their mistake. "Cordial greeting took the place of cold aversion. The victory was short, signal, and complete" (p. 399). Six years later, 1872, a remarkable testimony was given to the value of the suffrage in raising the estimation of the negroes. Douglass had presided over a National Convention of Coloured Citizens, and when the Republicans of the State of New York were choosing electors for the appointment of the President, they put his name at the head of their ticket. They carried the State by a majority of 50,000, and the Electoral College at Albany "committed to (his) custody the sealed up electoral vote of the great State of New York, and commissioned (him) to bring that vote to the National Capital. Only a few years before, any coloured man was forbidden by law to carry a United States mail-bag from one post-office to another" (p. 425).

There is no part of his history to which Douglass refers with greater pleasure than his altered relations towards his old master and his family. He had written of Captain Auld with great contempt and severity; but when he was lecturing at Philadelphia, he heard that Mrs. Sears, the daughter of Captain Auld's first wife, who had been kind to him as a child, had been one of his hearers. He asked permission to call on her, and though he had not seen her since she was about eight years old, he at once recognised her from among a number of other ladies.

Amanda made haste to tell me that she agreed with me about slavery, and that she had freed all her slaves as they had become of age. She brought her children to me, and I took them in my arms with sensations that I could not describe. One explanation of the feeling of this lady towards me was, that her mother, who died when she was yet a tender child, had been briefly described by me in a little "Narrative of my Life," published many years before our meeting, and when I could have had no motive but the highest for what I said of her. She had read my story, and learned something of the amiable qualities of her beloved mother.—Pp. 402-403.

Three years ago she summoned Douglass to her death bed, to tell her as much as he could about the mother whom she was hoping to meet in the better world. The year before, he had called on Captain Auld, whom he had not seen for forty years, who was then broken by age and palsy, and was near his death. Both were deeply affected, though they soon conversed freely about the past. Auld said that he never liked slavery, and Douglass told him that if he had done him any injustice in what he had written it was involuntary—they were both "victims of a system." We note that he has somewhat softened his description of him in the new Life. While he was U.S. Marshall, he delivered an address at Easton, where he had been put in gaol and offered for sale for planning to escape from slavery; among his friendly hearers was the sheriff who had then locked him up! (p. 450). He also delivered an address on John Brown at Harper's Ferry, and on the platform from which he spoke "sat the Hon. Andrew J. Hunter, the prosecuting attorney for the State of Virginia, who conducted the cause of the State against John Brown that consigned him to the gallows" (p. 458). He was also taken in a Revenue cutter to visit the Lloyd estate, which he had left as a slave-child fifty-six years before, and was received with great courtesy by the great-grandson of the old Governor of Maryland, whose form and features were vividly depicted on his memory. His visit to the family burial-ground, which used to excite his awe, is the subject of one of the engravings. He spent an hour in kindly conversation with Mrs. Buchanan, widow of an admiral, and a daughter of Governor Lloyd.

When I left, a beautiful little grand-daughter of hers, with a pleasant smile on her face, handed me a bouquet of many colored flowers. I never accepted such a gift with a sweeter sentiment of gratitude than from the hand of this lovely child. It told me many things, and among them that a new dispensation of justice, kindness, and human brotherhood was dawning not only in the North but in the South; that the war, and the slavery that caused the war, were things of the past, and that the rising generation are turning their eyes from the sunset of decayed institutions to the grand possibilities of a glorious future.—P. 456.

That generous friend of the coloured race, Hon. Gerrit Smith, once said to Douglass, who was doubting whether to accept an invitation to meet a distinguished company, "Ah! you must go, Douglass, it is your mission to break down the walls of separation between the two races," and, probably no one has been more successful in doing so. The chapter entitled "Incidents and Events" (p. 459) records a number of interesting anecdotes, which not only show the prejudice against colour, but the happy way in which he often surmounted it. We have noticed his appointment, in 1866, as a delegate from Rochester: he resided there for a quarter of a century; but before he had been there many years, lecturing and editing his paper, coloured travellers informed him that they felt the influence of his labours when they came within fifty miles! When he left, his friends procured a marble bust of him, which found a place in a hall of the Rochester University, and the Rochester Democrat testified that he ranked "as among the greatest men, not only of this city but of the nation."

The Right Hon. J. Bright, in a prefatory note to the English edition, says that this book "is one which will stimulate the individual to noble effort and to virtue; while it will act as a lesson and a warning to every nation whose policy is based upon injustice and wrong. I hope it may find its way into many thousands of English homes." In this hope we heartily accord. It is rare for any man to have so truly honourable a record. The eminence he has attained he has chiefly valued as a means of raising his people. It is his mother's despised race, rather than that of his father, to which he has devoted his life. We conclude with a few extracts from the lesson which he draws from his career:—

I have aimed to assure them that knowledge can be obtained under difficulties; . . . that neither slavery, stripes, imprisonment, nor proscription need extinguish self-respect, crush manly ambition, or paralyze effort; that no power outside of himself can prevent a man from sustaining an honourable character, and a useful relation to his day and generation; that neither institutions nor friends can make a race to stand, unless it has strength in its own legs. . . In my communication with the colored people I have endeavoured to deliver them from the power of superstition, bigotry, and priestcraft. . . I have urged upon them self-reliance, self-respect, industry, perseverance, and economy—to make the best of both worlds—but to make the best of this world, first, because it comes first, and that he who does not improve himself by the motives and opportunities afforded by this world gives the best evidence that he would not improve in any other world.—Pp. 487, 488. THE Athenæum states that the article on Westcott and Hort's textual theory in the new number of the Quarterly Review is believed to be written by Dean Burgon, in continuation of his two former articles upon New Testament revision; that on Jonathan Swift in the same periodical is said to be by Mr. Churton Collins; and the review of the third and fourth volumes of Mr. Leck's "History of England in the Eighteenth Century" is rumoured to come from the pen of Mr. Abraham Hayward.

MESSRS. H. SOTHERAN and Co. have in the press an important reprint of one of the classic English authors, of whose productions there has not hitherto been a library edition, viz., the works of Samuel Richardson. It will form twelve thick volumes, demy octavo, and will be ready in the ensuing autumn. It is a pleasure to hear of a new attempt to honour the greatest of English novelists.

PROFESSOR BLACKIE appears to have but a poor opinion of the work done by the latest Revisers of the New Testament. He is reported to have said at the meeting of the Royal Society of Edinburgh that "On the whole, while those who are ignorant of Greek may here and there derive a useful hint from the photographic minuteness with which the authors of the Revised Version have transferred some indifferent details of the original into English, it is in the highest degree undesirable that a version so marked by minute scrupulosity about trifles, servile verbalism, want of taste, and disregard of English idiom should be allowed to take the place which the Authorised Version has so long occupied in the estimation of all educated readers."

Our Contemporaries.

LONGFELLOW.

The Echo, in an article on the Ethical Teaching of Longfellow, writes:—

The poet is not necessarily a moral teacher any more than the artist.

Art's perfect form no moral needs,
And Beauty is its own excuse.

Yet beyond question the poet who elects to become a guide and teacher of men is sure thereby to increase his audience, provided he is qualified for the task which he undertakes. It is the teaching of Longfellow, quite as much as his poetic genius, which has ensured to his writings the wide-spread popularity they enjoy. Longfellow, like most of the American poets, had inherited much that was valuable in the Puritan traditions, and yet was emancipated from the repulsive dogmas of the old Calvinism. Almost all of them—Bryant, Lowell, Whittier, Emerson, as well as Longfellow—have represented the humanitarian Christian school of thought. To many it came with a feeling of surprise that the deceased poet throughout his lifetime was a loyal adherent to that Unitarian community whose glory it is that its successes are found rather in its leavening influence than its propagandist zeal; but the free, yet devout spirit of Channing breathes in almost every page of his writings. His broad catholicity recognised the unity of the religious sentiment in Romanist and Lutheran, Puritan and Quaker, Indian and Jew. Rarely indeed has a writer arrived at such a rare height of tolerance that, while he has left behind him that which will endure his memory to the adherents of almost every creed, he has left no line which would even indicate to posterity the existence of that section of the Christian Church to which he himself belonged.

DARWIN AND HIS OPPONENTS.

The Observer points out that what Newton did for the theory of masses in bulk, and without regard to other physical qualities than their size and density, Dalton did for chemistry when he promulgated the theory of atomic equivalents. With Newton and Dalton the name of Darwin is fully worthy to rank, and we may justly pride ourselves upon the fact that the three greatest generalisations which have yet been given to the world have been due to the genius of Englishmen. Newton and Dalton encountered but little opposition. Chemistry has never incurred the anathema of the Church. Darwin was less fortunate; and had a professorship or some other such substantial distinction been an object to him, human thought would, perhaps, have lost many years of its growth. When the "Origin of Species" first appeared it passed through every stage of opposition. It is an old saying that, when a new and strange truth is promulgated, we are at once told that it is wicked and irreligious. Even politicians had their fling at it, and Lord Beaconsfield, then Mr. Disraeli, went down to Oxford to tell a crowd of country parsons and Conservative squires that he at least, for one, was "on the side of the angels," and declined to believe himself the lineal descendant of a monkey.

FREETHOUGHT AND DEMOCRACY.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—The freethinking born of real speculative thought has no visible democratic bias. The two names which for most educated Europeans of this generation eminently represent the rejection of supernatural authority are those of Strauss and Renan. Now M. Renan's political opinions are so cautious and moderate that many, perhaps most, Frenchmen who are decided Republicans would class him as a Conservative, or even a Reactionist. As for Strauss, his last published work ended with the enunciation of a most distinctly Conservative creed in politics, and, what was more curious, in music. The leaders of freethinking natural science, as we pointed out on Saturday, are not as a rule to be found in the ranks of democrats or advanced Liberals. If we go back upon the past, the story is the same. For a full century Hobbes was in England the special horror of the orthodox. Hobbism and Atheism were all but synonymous. Yet Hobbes was in person a strong royalist, and his theory of politics was thoroughly anti-democratic. Hume as a historian gave to the exposition of English public affairs a Tory bias from which the popular teaching of history has only just recovered; and he so little believed in popular institutions that he predicted an absolute monarchy as the euthanasia of British liberties. Voltaire, again, has for a century been to Continental orthodoxy what Hobbes and Hume have been to that of our own country. Though he was a sincere and even a vehement theist, his attacks on ecclesiastical systems made his name a symbol of infidelity. But Voltaire was no demagogue or democrat. He belonged by taste and intellectual habit to the select society of the ancien régime—a society which prepared the way for the Revolution without knowing it. That society was aristocratic in every sense, and more completely penetrated by disbelief in supernatural religion than any society comparable to it for intellectual power and brilliancy has ever been before or since. If we look to the present House of Commons for fixed relations between speculative opinions and political practice we see that Mr. A. Balfour, who has proclaimed himself in philosophy more sceptical if possible than Hume, is as good a Tory as Hume could have desired, while some of the most violent members of the Irish No Rent party make a parade of Catholic orthodoxy. We fail on the whole to see any historical justification either in the present or in the past for offering aristocracy as the one sure and certain bulwark against Atheism.

DEATH OF R. W. EMERSON.—Just as we are going to press we hear with extreme regret the announcement of the death of Emerson, which occurred at his residence in Concord, on Thursday night. Next week we have reason to expect a tribute to his character, and some estimate of his life-work, from the pen of his old friend, the Rev. W. H. Channing.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.—Sunday was the anniversary of Shakespeare's birth. In the beautiful church where the poet is buried a sermon from the vicar, appropriate to the occasion, was preached on that day. On Monday the usual series of dramatic performances at the Memorial Theatre was commenced. These performances are to continue till the 6th of May, and are under the direction of Mr. Edward Compton.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.—At the ordinary meeting of the Committee of this Society on Monday last, Mr. James Heywood, F.R.S., proposed, and Professor Corfield, M.D., seconded, and it was carried unanimously:—"That this Committee unfeignedly lament the death of Mr. Charles R. Darwin, F.R.S., to whom, as one of its first vice-presidents, the Sunday Society owes a deep debt of gratitude and desire to express their heartfelt sympathy with Mrs. Darwin and the family in the loss they have sustained by the decease of the distinguished naturalist, who while introducing his great discoveries showed so much consideration for the feelings of others and rendered such valuable services to mankind that his name will be pre-eminently identified with the scientific achievements of the nineteenth century."

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday. Mr. H. Gover's amendment to the recommendation of the School Management Committee was withdrawn, and another amendment was proposed by Mr. Ross referring back to the Committee the whole question of higher elementary schools, with an instruction that no report be presented till after the general election of the Board in November next, so that the opinion of the ratepayers might be taken on the subject. The debate was again adjourned. A letter was ordered to be addressed to the Education Department, asking that the representatives at the Board for Lambeth be increased from six to eight, and for Chelsea from four to five.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY will hold its annual meeting at the Metropolitan Tabernacle next Wednesday evening. The list of speakers is an unusually strong and representative one, including some Churchmen.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. COUNCIL MEETING.

The third meeting of the Council for the current session was held at the offices of the Association, in Norfolk-street, on Wednesday afternoon. In the unavoidable absence of the President, Mr. D. Ainsworth, M.P., the chair was taken by Mr. HOGGOOD, and there were also present the Revs. R. Spears, R. Shaen (Royston), T. L. Marshall, T. W. Freckelton, T. Timmins (Portsmouth), W. H. Channing, E. M. Geldart, Miss Anna Swanwick, Dr. W. B. Carpenter, C.B.; Messrs. I. M. Wade, H. Jeffery, H. R. Greg (Styal), M. P. Manfield (Northampton), J. T. Preston, Edwin Ellis (Guildford), F. Nettelford, W. Shaen, T. C. Clarke, D. Martineau, S. S. Tayler (Treasurer), and the Rev. H. Ierson (Secretary).

The SECRETARY read the minutes of the last Council Meeting, and also the report of the Executive Committee, to the Council.

REPORT.

Very shortly after the last meeting of the Council the sad intelligence was received of the decease of Dr. Bellows, an honorary member and correspondent of the Association. The Committee have communicated to Mrs. Bellows and to the American Unitarian Association through their Directors the expression of the deep regret which was universally felt amongst us at the loss of so eminent and able a supporter of Unitarian principles, who was alike beloved and honoured, both in England and America. As the Council will desire to take part in these expressions of condolence, the correspondence is here laid before them. The Committee would also direct the attention of the Council to the recent decease of two eminent American Unitarians, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and the Rev. Orville Dewey, the one a poet whose writings have obtained for him the affectionate reverence of mankind, even beyond the range of English-speaking people, the other a veteran amongst the most highly esteemed of our ministers, whose works have always been welcomed by thoughtful and earnest readers.

By invitation of the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control, some members of the Committee assisted at the Conference recently held at the Westminster Palace Hotel, to consider the question of the Ecclesiastical Endowments of the metropolis, with special reference to two Bills now before Parliament relating to this matter.

The effort has been continued to awaken interest in Unitarian principles at Cambridge. A course of three lectures was delivered last term by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on the subject of Biblical Criticism. Application had been made for the use of the Lecture Hall of the Cambridge Young Men's Christian Association, but it was refused, and the lectures were given in the smaller Guildhall. Although the audiences were not large, the attention shown is reported to have been thoughtful and sympathetic, and so far encouraging. Some earnest discussion took place at the close of two of these lectures.

An endeavour is being made by a few zealous friends to establish Unitarian services at Bournemouth. They are held in one of the rooms connected with the Town Hall. The Committee have thought it right to encourage this effort, which they heartily commend to the attention and support of visitors to this rising watering-place.

At Stamford Unitarian services have been conducted in a private house by lay residents of the town since the beginning of February, and lectures have been given there in a public hall by the Revs. H. Ierson and J. P. Hopps. It is impossible to say at present what may be the issue of this effort, but the report of the last lecture showed that public attention was being not ineffectually drawn to Unitarian principles.

Assistance has been given to the endeavour of the Rev. H. Austin, with encouragement from the Western Union, to re-establish Unitarian Services at Swindon. The resident Unitarians appear to have taken up the work with much heartiness and determination.

Under the auspices of the East Anglian Unitarian Association lectures have been delivered by Rev. T. W. Freckelton in Peterborough, Lynn, Norwich, and Ipswich, and in the last-named town other lectures by the Revs. E. M. Geldart, H. W. Perris, and R. Spears. A grant has been made in aid of these lectures, and further help is sought for continued work of this kind in the Eastern Counties.

The Committee invite special attention to the reduction in the price of the sermons on "Nature and Life" and "The Life that now is," by Robert Collyer, which they have been enabled to effect by taking the remainder stock of this work from the publishers of the reprint. It has been sold for some time at 4s. for the two volumes bound together, already a large reduction from the original price. It is now offered at 2s., with a still further reduction to 1s. 6d. if twelve copies or more are ordered. The work is admirably suited for a gift-book to friends of other denominations who desire to learn what the teaching of Unitarianism is, especially on its practical side.

An edition of the "Unitarian Handbook," by the Rev. R. Spears, having been printed in Welsh, translated by Mr. David Evans, 500 copies were ordered for distribution amongst Orthodox Welsh Ministers. The South Wales Unitarian Society have undertaken to dispose of the work in the manner proposed as effectually and as early as possible.

At the time of the republication of the work by the Rev. J. H. Thom, "Christ the Revealer," as also of Mr. J. Blanco White's "Heresy and Orthodoxy," it was intended that they should hereafter be presented gratis to ministers in the same manner in which the gift of Dr. Channing's Works continues to be made. The Committee being of opinion that the period had come for carrying out this intention, they ordered advertisements accordingly, and between four and five hundred copies of each work have been sent, up to the present time, to ministers and students. Grants have been made as follows since the last meeting: to Longton (a second) grant of £5 towards clearing the debt for chapel repairs, £10 to the East Anglian Association for lectures for services at Dowlais £5, Lympstone £10, Swindon £10, Chelmsford £20, also to Mr. Aaron, of Salem, Southern India, £5, and £30 for the completion of the Parsonage House, Madras.

Grants of books have been made for public and chapel libraries, at Newcastle, Padiham, Poole, and Deptford; for a bazaar at Denton; to several ministers for private study; to twenty inquirers; for presentation at a confirmation service at Park-lane, Wigan; and to the South Wales Society for distribution, as before mentioned, 500 copies of the Unitarian Handbook. The total of books given has been 1,004, besides eighty-one copies of Dr. Channing's Works to ministers and students. The number of tracts granted is 13,881. These have been sent to Bournemouth, Ringwood, Brighton, Chesterfield, Stamford, Wisbeach, Ipswich, Bristol, Swindon, Padiham, Blackhill, Co. Durham, and in London to Little Portland-street, Brixton, Blackfriars, Deptford, Stamford-street, Stepney, and Wandsworth.

The Committee have the pleasure to state that Dr. James Freeman Clarke, who had been appointed with Dr. Edward Everett Hale to represent the American Unitarian Association at our Annual Meeting, has kindly consented to preach the sermon on that occasion, the gentleman who had been appointed to that duty having generously suggested that in honour of so distinguished a guest he should prefer to stand aside for the present year.

The Annual Meeting will be held in Unity Church, Islington, May 31, and the Conference on the following morning in Essex-street Chapel, Strand. Instead of the usual collation, a soiree will be held at six p.m. in the Cannon-street Hotel, tickets price 1s.

The following is the correspondence referred to in the Report. The first letter is addressed to Mrs. Bellows:—

Dear Madam,—I am requested by our Committee to express, on behalf of the Association which they represent, their sincere condolence with yourself and your family in the loss of a beloved husband and father, one naturally the more endeared to you for the high esteem in which he was so widely and so deservedly held. I cannot tell you how strong is the regret which we all feel, so great was the respect entertained for Dr. Bellows by those who knew him through occasional hearing, or from his writings, and so cordially attached to him were those amongst us who enjoyed the privilege of his more intimate acquaintance. He was so generous and sympathising, that it was impossible to know him without loving him, and it would be hard to say whether our admiration of his remarkable gifts was the greater, or our love for his affectionate nature. When we saw the telegram on the last of January in our leading papers we could hardly realise our great loss—the sad news came so unexpectedly, and Dr. Bellows's quite recent energetic public services had seemed to give, on the other hand, every promise of coming years of usefulness. He will be greatly missed for a long time, and on many occasions, so naturally was he counted upon to take the lead in every good work, while his wonderful energy and his courageous hopefulness inspired his co-workers with the assurance of success in whatever he undertook. But God apportions his servants' work, and when they are called away, they cannot go without leaving behind them the great hope strengthened, the irresistible conviction that the work so dear to them is not abandoned, but that they have been summoned to higher service; because it is impossible to believe that such great powers can have become useless, or that their own maturing in knowledge, and in elevation and sweetness of character, could have no result beyond what the eye can see. In some way, we know not how—there is one who knows—the day of reunion shall come with our loved and honoured friends, the grand Christian aspiration shall be fulfilled which sanctifies the relations of every family on earth. We know, indeed, that the alleviation of your great sorrow cannot come but through the ministration of the good Providence that guides all our ways; nevertheless, what the heart speaks the heart can hear and feel, and we can at least offer, as we do in all sincerity, this word of kindly regard and sympathy.—I am, dear Madam, very truly yours,

HENRY IERSON, Secretary.

Signed on behalf of the Committee.

Mrs. H. W. Bellows has received the letter from the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, through Rev. Henry Ierson, and desires to return her heartfelt thanks for the kind interest expressed in her great bereavement, and for the great and true appreciation of her husband's life and character.

It is a great consolation to all the family to know of such sympathy.

The letter is carefully preserved, that the younger children, now not old enough to understand, may some day realise how their father was honoured abroad as well as at home.

To Rev. HENRY IERSON.

Mr. Ierson's letter to the Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, of which the following is a reply, was published in the Inquirer of April 15:—

My dear Mr. Ierson,—Nothing could be more gratifying to us than a letter like that which I have just received from you, testifying as it does how many ties are binding more closely together our British and American Unitarian people, until our very sorrows are mutual.

I do not wonder that your people mourn Dr. Bellows's death as though he were one of your own neighbours; the quality of his nature was largeness; he had that breadth of thought and sympathy which made him of necessity inclusive of all interest and all good works. Intensely American he was, yet in a wonderful degree a genuine citizen of the world. Ardently devoted to our form of Christian faith, he was hospitable to all good words and thoughts, old or new. Now that he is gone, and we have time to consider, it is wonderful to note on how many platforms he spoke, and in how many noble undertakings he bore his full part; how wide, in short, his sympathies, not confined by limits of sect, or hemmed in by ocean.

We have lost a great leader. He had such personal attractiveness, he was so hospitable to the truth, came from whence it might; he was always so interested in the young and hopeful that he was always an influence whose potency you could not measure. I think that when he rose to his feet, stirred to speak by the words and the events of the hour, he was the most eloquent of the sons of men, and eloquent not in the sense of exciting mere admiration, but in sweeping other men the way his convictions pointed. On any field of discussion you never knew which side had the strongest battalions until Dr. Bellows had his word. We shall miss his moral and spiritual creativeness this side of the water. I can but think that you will miss them your side. To me it is a striking thing, that just as the news of his death came to you, you were calling into existence the British National Conference, counterpart of that American Conference which [his fervent mind] brought into being.

In behalf of our directors, yes, in behalf of our whole Unitarian body in America, let me say how grateful is the word of remembrance and sympathy from our English friends and co-labourers.—Very truly,

GRINDALL REYNOLDS, Secretary
of the A.U.A.

The report was adopted, on the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Rev. T. TIMMINS.

Mr. CHANNING expressed his profound gratitude at the terms of the correspondence respecting the death of Dr. Bellows.

Mr. TIMMINS, as a personal friend and guest of Dr. Bellows during his nine years' residence in America, moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Dr. CARPENTER, who said he saw a great deal of Dr. Bellows during his visit to this country, and heard from his own lips an account of the Sanitary Commission during the war, which he carried out with such wonderful energy and success. It was one of the most remarkable and valuable works of the kind ever carried out. It showed what a Unitarian minister could be and do.

"That this meeting deeply sympathizes with the expressions of regret which have been communicated by the Executive Committee to Mrs. Bellows, and to the Directors of the American Unitarian Association on the decease of Dr. Bellows, and heartily concurs in the general testimony which has been given to his surpassing abilities, to the geniality and earnestness of his character and public services, and to the great value of the work which, both as a citizen and a Christian minister, he was enabled to accomplish, leaving behind him a great example and a beneficent influence that will long consecrate the memory of his worthy name."

The Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON moved, and Miss

ANNA SWANWICK seconded, the following resolution, both speakers paying a graceful tribute to the memory of Longfellow and Dewey:—

"That the Council desires to record its profound respect for the memory of the two honoured members of the Unitarian body who within a short period of each other have recently departed from the scene of their long and valued services, the one, HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW, as an author and poet of world-wide fame and influence, the other, ORVILLE DEWEY, as a minister of religion, the friend and co-worker with Channing in his earlier, and of Bellows in his later, life, whose published works have awakened the thoughtful interest of readers of various countries and denominations. Though the Council feels that no words of eulogy can add to the glory of these great and worthy names, it cannot but express the deepest regret at the loss to the world of men so distinguished in character and genius, whose faithful profession and noble Christian lives so greatly enhanced the value of the high-toned teaching of their works."

Mr. MARSHALL suggested that it would be extremely appropriate to commemorate Dr. Dewey by having a cheap reprint of his works, like those of Channing, in conjunction with the American Unitarian Association, and, on the suggestion of the Chairman, undertook to bring the matter before the Executive Committee.

Dr. W. B. CARPENTER moved the following resolution:—

"That this Council, meeting on the day of the funeral of the illustrious Darwin, desire to record their profound regret at the loss of that eminent naturalist, whose unsurpassed ability, whose single-minded devotion to truth, and whose patient and unwearied investigations in various departments of science, mark a new epoch in its history, and throw fresh light on the immutable laws of the Divine Government and the progress of humanity."

Coming fresh from Darwin's funeral that morning in Westminster Abbey he thought it appropriate for this body to pass such a resolution. He referred to Darwin's perfect love of truth as his chief characteristic, and reminded the meeting that "The Origin of Species" was only the climax to a long series of works taking up different branches of science, and doing work which the best authorities in each department considered the highest of its kind. Dr. Carpenter referred also to the strenuous opposition made to Darwin's works at the time of their appearance, and alluded to a review of his own long ago in the National as taking a very different tone. Not one of the younger naturalists in this country and in Germany is not a strong Evolutionist; while in France, which for a long time would not recognise Darwin in the Academy, he himself was elected a member of the Academy at the time when Darwin certainly ought to have been elected. Darwin, however, had subsequently been elected a member of the Academy; and most French naturalists, as well as those of America and Canada, were moving in the same direction. He would not enter into the theological aspects of the question. In Germany and in this country some theories had been advanced in connection with the theory of evolution which were anti-Theistic; but that he regarded as a reaction from the older views, not as the natural result of Darwin's principles. He had on all occasions vindicated the Darwinian hypothesis as leading to a higher conception of the Divine Being, that thesis he had been invited to maintain before the clergy of Sion College, at their meeting on May 26. He believed that in the future of theology Evolution would have a most important part to play, and no ideas introduced in science would have a more beneficial influence on theology, by superseding the old Orthodox dogmatism. He thought it most appropriate for this Council to put on record its appreciation of Darwin's life and single-minded devotion to truth.

Mr. CHANNING, as a theologian, said that so far from tending to Atheism or Pantheism Darwin's views tended more and more to bring men to Christ and Christianity. He esteemed it a great honour to second a resolution of this kind, proposed by one of the leading physiologists of the age.

Mr. FRECKELTON added a few words of concurrence, and the resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER moved, and Mr. HENRY JEFFREY seconded,

"That the Council heartily acknowledges the admirable services of the gentlemen who were requested at the meeting of June 24, 1881, to form a committee to organise a gathering of ministers and laymen for religious fellowship and conference, and sincerely congratulate them and the Unitarians of England generally on the great success of the recent meetings in Liverpool, not only in regard to the numbers present from all parts of the kingdom, but also and especially for the excellent spirit of unanimity and earnestness which was manifest throughout the whole proceedings.

"That the Council is gratified to learn that the important resolution respecting a new Sustentation Fund in aid of the support of the Ministry has been referred to the Conference Committee, and trusts that they will be liberally assisted in their endeavour to bring the resolution to an effectual issue."

Both mover and seconder paid a high tribute to the committee originally appointed by this Council, to whom the success of the National Conference is greatly due.

Mr. GELDART, Mr. FRECKELTON, Mr. WADE, and Mr. W. SHAEN took part in a conversation arising out of the last clause of the motion, which was ultimately passed unanimously.

Mr. SPEARS moved a resolution, "That it be an instruction to the Executive Committee to consider the expediency of ascertaining the numerical, institutional, and financial statistics of our churches, including trusts, with any other such matters of information as might be of service to the Association."

Mr. SPEARS referred to the statistics collected fifty years ago by Mr. W. J. Fox. He thought it would be well to have the information of the same kind as that collected by Mr. Fox. He wished to have on record the vital statistics of our body. It is very lamentable that we are from time to time closing our churches, some even during the last four or five years. He pointed out that these statistics would be for the private use of the Executive Committee and the Council, and would be of great value to them in their work of aiding struggling churches.

Mr. MARSHALL, in seconding the resolution, pointed out that in its present form it committed the Council to nothing, but left it to the Executive Committee to consider whether it was desirable to continue this inquiry on the lines of the Bicentenary Committee of twenty years ago, and of Mr. H. Rawson in his recent statistical investigations. At the same time he confessed that it would be better that the matter should be taken up by a neutral body like the Conference Committee. As to a religious numerical census, he thought it would be desirable to face the fact of our declining condition in the East and South of England, but instead of taking a census of attendance on one particular Sunday, he would either ask for a return of regular members, or the average attendance during a certain fixed period. He thought it most important that some central body should endeavour to prevent the lapse or perversion of some of our smaller trusts which had been going on for years past in some parts of the country. These were Trusts for public purposes, and as any private person might invoke the interposition of the Charity Commissioners, so might a public body like this Council, which more than any other represented the whole denomination. There was no assumption of authority in such an inquiry. It was proposed simply to ask for information from those who were disposed to give it.

Mr. T. C. CLARKE disagreed with the inquiry, because it would interfere with the free spirit of our Churches. He thought that a religious census taken on any one day would be misleading and fallacious, and altogether foreign to the free spirit of our Churches as non-subscribing communities. On the question of Trusts he thought the information could be obtained in other ways than by direct official inquiry.

Mr. JEFFREY expressed his intention of voting for the resolution. He thought the Executive Committee could gather by degrees the information required respecting our Trusts and Churches, which would be exceedingly valuable, and might be used with advantage in the case of our decaying Churches.

Mr. GELDART thought it not wise to relegate to the Committee the question of the expediency of obtaining this information.

Mr. D. MARTINEAU thought the motion undesirable, and would vote against it.

Mr. WADE suggested that the question should be brought up at the annual meeting. It was really lamentable that so many of our Churches were being closed for want of some one to take up the matter. He reminded the Council that most of our congregations print their reports containing information of the kind now desired.

Mr. EDWIN ELLIS hoped the resolution would not be carried, as it was very undesirable in the present temper of many of our congregations. The very congregations from which returns were most wanting would be the first to refuse them. He thought it objectionable that this Council should be a committee of inquiry into such matters.

Mr. TIMMINS confessed that he was undecided how to vote, but he saw no reason why all these matters referred to in the resolution should not be brought to this Association. The Churches were public institutions existing for public purposes. The Association should be in a position to know the condition of our Churches, in order to help them in the best way.

Mr. SPEARS, in reply, thought that the kind of knowledge he aimed to procure would be exceedingly valuable. The information desired would not be fallacious, as it was proposed not to ask for the attendance on any particular Sunday, but the average attendance. He thought that this proposed inquiry did not militate against the free tendency of our Churches any more than the inquiries made by Mr. H. Rawson, and others before him. The information desired was for the use of the Committee and Council only, and his only wish was to strengthen the Churches.

The motion was lost by six to eight, several members having been obliged to leave at an earlier part of the proceedings.

The lists of the Vice-Presidents and Home Correspondents to be nominated for election at the annual meeting were then revised, as well as the list to be nominated for the Executive Committee.

Mr. EDWIN ELLIS moved:—

"That it be an instruction to the Executive Committee to consider and report on the practicability of an organised effort for giving services in some of the centres of trade, especially in London, and as to the desirability of raising a special fund for the support of such effort."

He thought the time was ripe in our large centres for advancing our views with every prospect of success. He would refer to a practical working committee the various appeals which from time to time came before us.

Mr. FRECKELTON seconded the resolution. He thought the existing missions and missionaries could not undertake the work proposed by Mr. Ellis. The kind of work could only be done by the best men in our body, the men best educated, and of longest experience.

Some conversation ensued on the subject; and the motion was ultimately carried unanimously.

The proceedings were brought to a close after a sitting of three hours and a-half.

SOCIAL MORALITY AND LEGISLATION.

MEETING OF MINISTERS AND OTHERS IN LIVERPOOL.

On Thursday, the 20th inst., about a hundred ministers and laymen connected with our churches met in Liverpool, at the Compton Hotel, after the Conference was concluded, to consider the question of the Contagious Diseases Acts. The meeting had been convened by circular and advertisement, signed by thirty ministers and others, who considered that when so many of our friends would be brought together for the Liverpool Conference the opportunity ought not to be lost of discussing the Acts, and, if the meeting should so decide, of petitioning for their repeal.

Mr. WILLIAM SHAEN (who presided over the meeting) expressed his deep sense of responsibility in stating the case of the Acts which they were met to consider. He did not understand how it was possible that anyone who believed in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of the human race could act against them when their true character was known. They were based on an immoral theory of life, assuming the necessity of the continuance of vice, and attempting to provide that its indulgence should be attended with as little danger as possible, while they did nothing to check or discountenance it. What was morally wrong could not be hygienically right. It had been conclusively proved by the experience of the fifteen years during which the Acts had been in operation that, even from a purely sanitary point of view, they had been a complete failure. Dr. Nevins, who was present, and who had studied the official statistics and reports of the medical results more thoroughly than any other man in the Kingdom, would deal with that branch of the subject. He (the chairman) held that the fundamental objections to the Acts would be as strong even if the hygienic gain were undeniable, or if they were carried out by officials who were perfect administrators and incapable of error. He insisted on the gross breach of constitutional principles involved in these measures. All the safeguards of personal liberty were wanting in them. The special police who were their agents were entrusted with an arbitrary discretion which was unprecedented in English law and was abhorrent to the very idea of law. The complete success of the Acts would be nothing short of a national calamity. It would place vice under the aegis of the law as a safe and respectable thing, lowering still further the standard of social morality. It was impossible that the law should remain as it is. Its advocates were only consistent in demanding its extension to the civil population everywhere. It must either be extended over the whole country or must be utterly abolished.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL then moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting of ministers and laymen of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches in all parts of the United Kingdom condemns the position assumed by the State in attempting to regulate the practice of vice, protests against the Contagious Diseases Acts as contrary to the principles of pure morality and of sound legislation, and adopt the following petition to Parliament, which it requests the chairman to sign on behalf of the meeting. The humble petition of ministers, &c. (as above), sheweth that your petitioners regard the continued operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866-9, as increasingly injurious to the religion and morality of the community. That your petitioners also consider these enactments to be tyrannical, unjust and unconstitutional, and that the power conceded by them to a special police is contrary to the free spirit of English law and institutions. Your petitioners believe that no alleged physical benefit can justify the maintenance of laws which stimulate and provide facilities for the practice of vice. Your petitioners therefore pray that these Acts may be immediately and entirely repealed." Mr. Steintahl said that he should not enlarge upon the constitutional points of the petition, which had been sufficiently explained by Mr. Shaen. He took his stand upon the simple ground that the aim and purpose of the Acts in question were immoral; and if the medical evidence had been different from what it was his opposition would not be diminished. He wished to defend himself and those who worked in this cause from the charge that they were opposed to the Acts because they were intended to cure a disease which was the consequence of vice. This accusation was altogether unjust. The opponents of the Acts were in favour of curing disease, however caused, as rapidly and thoroughly as possible. But they did object to arrangements for the medical treatment of women, which were made not for the purpose of healing them, but for enabling them to minister, without danger, to the vices of dissolute men. This alone was the purpose of the Acts, and for this they were to be regarded as immoral, and it was demanded that the Statute book should be cleansed from them at once and for ever. Let us retrace our steps and insist upon the repeal of these immoral and degrading laws.

The Rev. W. H. CHANNING in seconding the resolution said that he did so as being a citizen of a country which was not disgraced by this wicked legislation, and he prayed that it never might be. It was an awfully unjust and cowardly use of the power which men held in their hands. He had helped in the work of reformation and had seen the uttermost horrors of women's degradation. Where, at the Judgment, would those men be who trampled them into the mire? He spoke of the true Christ-like treatment of fallen women, and contrasted it with the purpose and working of these Acts; and he called on his brethren to join in doing away with the iniquity.

The CHAIRMAN then called upon Dr. Nevins to give some information as to the sanitary results of the Acts, after which the free expression of opinion would be invited, especially from those who did not agree with the resolution.

Dr. NEVINS said that he had shared originally in the impression common amongst the medical profession that the acts were likely to be beneficial to the health of the army and navy. But the evidence before the Royal Commission in 1870, and the reports published by the Government year by year, had shown the contrary; and the result was entirely confirmed by the facts brought out after another ten years' experience by the Select Committee which was now sitting. Dr. Nevins entered into medical details and statistics, from which he deduced the general result that the constitutional and hereditary form of disease, which had been diminishing for some years before 1866, when the first Acts were passed, and had been reduced at that date by nearly a third of its amount, had since then increased instead of diminishing. In Hong Kong, where a regular system of licensed houses and medical inspection was in operation, this worst form was more rife than in any other naval station in the world. Less dangerous forms of disease had improved less rapidly since 1866 than before. The facts which he adduced were derived exclusively from the Government tables of statistics of the health of the army and navy, and the published parliamentary evidence. Dr. Nevins spoke further of the shameful immorality of the system of Government licensing at Hong Kong, and the almost incredible iniquities practised by English Government officials in its administration. They had been exposed by a Commission of Inquiry appointed by the Governor of Hong Kong, Sir J. Pope Hennessy, in consequence of the death of two women who fell from a house in endeavouring to escape from the police. In India provision was officially made for the vicious indulgence of the men whenever a regiment arrived at a fresh station, and the regulations were in force with no diminution of the physical evils which they were intended to cure. At home special pains had been taken to ensure favourable results at the "protected" stations by enforcing precautions with respect to the men which were not taken in the "unprotected" districts. Notwithstanding this unfair dealing, the "great experiment," as it had been called, had proved an entire failure.

The challenge to justify the Acts was taken up by Mr. A. S. HARRIS, of Plymouth, who defended them, on the ground of the great improvements which had taken place in the state of that town, improvements which he attributed to the operation of the Acts. Juvenile prostitution no longer existed, so far as he was aware, and there was order and decency in the streets. He quoted the opinion of medical men that the cases of disease were not so malignant as they used to be. He maintained that it was the intention of the Acts to reclaim by means of moral as well as physical treatment.—Mr. BRIDGER spoke to the same effect as regarded Southampton. He believed that the Acts had been of great service.

The Rev. R. R. SUFFIELD acknowledged the fact of the improved state of things which had been described, but he observed the same things exactly at Reading, which was not in a subjected district. There was a decrease there of social immorality, and of disorderly conduct, though the population had largely increased. He attributed the amelioration there and elsewhere partly to the temperance movement, and other important movements of social reform, but more particularly to the action of the police under the clauses for the regulation of public-houses, and under local bye-laws. Not one public house was now a disorderly house.

Mr. NEELE made exactly the same remarks on the effect of improved police regulations at Belfast, and the better social tone that existed there.

The CHAIRMAN said that the heads of the police at Plymouth, Devonport and Stonehouse were agreed in their evidence lately given before the Parliamentary Committee that all the good effects claimed for the Acts were entirely independent of them, and were outside their operations and beyond their legal scope. The same reforms could be carried out more efficiently in non-subjected districts.

In reply to a question whether the medical profession generally were not in favour of the Acts, Dr. NEVINS expressed his belief that their confidence in them had been to a large extent shaken; and he referred his questioner to the report of an important discussion on the subject at the Medical Congress held in London last year.

The resolution was then put to the meeting, and was carried, one hand only being held up against it.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, in proposing a vote of thanks to Dr. Nevins for his address, took the opportunity of publicly declaring his adhesion to the movement for repeal, and expressed his regret at the causes which had prevented him from joining in it before.

The meeting was concluded with an acknowledgment of the services of Mr. C. J. Herford, who had done the chief work of convening and arranging for it.

ISLAM.

On Friday afternoon, [April 21, Dr. Abraham Kuenen, Professor of Theology at Leyden, delivered at Oxford, in the theatre of the University Museum, the first of this year's course of five Hibbert lectures. He began by referring to the international character of these prelections as one of their most striking features. To this he owed the honour of addressing his present audience, an honour which he felt none the less, though it necessitated his having to grapple with the mysteries of English pronunciation. But if there were no universal tongue there were certainly universal religions, on which, as compared with national religions, and on the light shed thus on the origin of religion in general, he would have to speak in that and the following lectures. Which were the Universal Religions? Some would admit Buddhism and Christianity only to the title, while others added Islam as a third. It could hardly be a mere question of millions, although Islam had but 175,000,000 adherents, against Christendom's 400,000,000 and Buddhism's 450,000,000. The ground of the difference of opinion lay deeper—namely, in the double sense of the term universal religion, to signify either a fact or a quality. In the sense of spreading over many and diverse nations and races—Semites, Aryans, Tartars, Malays, Negroes—with its grip on two continents and a foothold in the third, Islam was indisputably a universal, or, at least, an international religion. But it was no less undeniable that the character of a religion could not be determined by its outward successes alone, and the causes of Islam's conquests unquestionably demanded investigation, since it by no means followed that they lay in its universalistic nature. The problem before them was to estimate cautiously, but also with freedom, in the light of history, the connexion between the universal and the national religions as furnishing the explanation and the measure of their universalism. The lecturer further explained that his own standpoint as a student of the history of religion led him to make the connexion between Christianity and Israelitism his main subject, while Buddhism and Islam would be more shortly spoken of, and chiefly with a view to those points from which, by resemblance or contrast, they might hope for some illustration of the origin of Christianity. The order he should follow was that of reversed chronology, beginning with Islam, concerning whose origin they were best informed. As contrasted with the cloud overshadowing the rise of Buddhism and Christianity, Renan's reference to "that strange spectacle of a religion coming into being in the clear light of day," was in every mouth. The authenticity of the Koran, with a few trifling exceptions, was above suspicion. And by the side of Mahomed's preaching therein preserved we had the traditions about his person authenticated by testimony going back to his own immediate surroundings. The biography of the prophet was later, but still was relatively ancient, resting upon materials yet older than itself, and, above all, it could be tested by the authentic documents. Knowing much, however, the thirst for certainly made them long to know more. And the fact was that their information was most defective just at the very points where it would be most valuable. The tradition was coloured throughout by the dogmatic convictions of the first believers, and was often open to the gravest suspicion. And the Koran? Sprenger had called it "a book with seven seals." As showing what Islam is, it might leave nothing to be desired in point of clearness, and might even suffer from overfulness; but so soon as they tried to follow the Prophet in his development, the confused mass of revelation was ever failing us. This or that saying would give us the light we wanted, but we did not know where to place it. Behind this or that passage an important fact obviously lurked, but who should unveil it for us? Their present task was to define the relation of Mahomed's preaching to the earlier religion of the Arabs. Could the problem be solved with fair certainty? Mahomed preached the one Allah, and in so doing combated the polytheism of the great majority of his people. So far, of course, all was clear. But no sooner did they pass beyond this generality than they were assailed by doubt, and found a wide diversity of opinion even among the historians of Mahomed. The remainder of the lecture was devoted to a critical investigation of the Prophet's own religious development, as well as of the profound modifications undergone by Islam in various ages and climes, down to its thoroughly honest reformation on its native Arabian soil in the momentous Wahhabite movement dating from the middle of the last century. The lecture was delivered in London, at St. George's-hall, Langham-place, at 11 A.M., last Tuesday.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL.

On Saturday afternoon last Professor Kuenen, of Leyden, delivered in the theatre of the University Museum, Oxford, the second of his five Hibbert lectures. Its topic was "The Popular Religion of Israel. Priests and Prophets of Yahweh." Christianity, he reminded his audience, was the second of the universal religions which they were to examine in connection with the national religions from which they have sprung. They might naturally look for his transporting them to Palestine at about the beginning of our era. But before doing so he must ask them to make a long détour with him. What Judaism was at the time of Jesus could be understood only by studying it in its true light as the lawful heir of its own past. Hence they must begin with a retrospect, and the spectacle would be found of an interest to enchain the attention, while—and that was his present point—in Israel's past would be seen the prophecy of the wonderful development of eighteen centuries ago. In a sense, Christians had always held so. The Church dated her origins from the Creation itself, and regarded the fates of Israel as an express portion of her own history. Though not for a moment meaning to uphold this idea in its primary sense—for his point of view was not that of the Church—yet, in recognising the close connection between the Judaism out of which Christianity sprang and the whole of the preceding spiritual conflict in Israel, he was in hearty agreement with the Christendom of all ages. They had, therefore, no choice but to study the character and motives of this conflict. The antithesis of "national" and "universal" would serve best as their clue, while investing facts familiar to all with the charm of novelty. When speaking of Judaism's antecedents he could only mean the recognition and worship of that Divinity whose proper name our translations rendered The Lord—a name which they had good grounds for pronouncing "Yahweh." He would be understood if he began by propounding the question, Was the worship of Yahweh among the pre-exilian Israelites national? And, if so, in what sense? According to the traditional view, which they would soon find to be rooted in the Old Testament itself, the answer would seem to be ready enough, but very perplexing. Before the Babylonian captivity, Yahwism was the religion of a minority, and the worship of other gods had a better claim to be called national, since it was undeniable that the prophets of Yahweh opposed themselves to the masses. Yet, seemingly natural as it was, this answer did not satisfy us, since in other instances also a genuinely national instinct was confined to a few chosen spirits. And apart from this, we must ask whether the mass of people was really hostile to Yahwism. It was certain they would not have owned it. Many really belonging to this majority were devoted with all their hearts to Yahweh. Was there, then, more than one Yahwism? They were evidently in face of a singularly complex phenomenon, in the study of which the lecturer offered his guidance. Every simplification of such a question must be welcome, and he therefore began by reminding his audience that the hypothesis of the introduction of Yahwism from without must be for ever given up at the present stage of scholarship. The possibility of foreign influence on the development of Israel's religion was undeniable. Even in the ages of which he was now speaking Canaan, so far from being a secluded country, was the battle-ground of the Asiatic peoples. So far was Israel from standing outside the turmoil of conflicting nations that the idea had been started of assigning it that central place on the stage of the earliest history which was taken in after ages first by Greeks and then by the Romans; and this not only in virtue of Israel's claim to the post of honour, but yet more because all the civilised nations of Asia came successively into contact with it, thus taking their places each in its turn, on the field of history—first the Egyptians, then the Assyrians, then the Babylonians, and lastly the Medo-Persians. Accordingly, traces of foreign influence on the Hebrew national development were easily discernible. But the derivation, with Comte in 1841, of the Jewish theocracy from the Egyptian, and perhaps also the Chaldean, was now an antiquated theory. The lecturer said that among students of Israelite religion he did not know of a single one who derived Yahwism from Egypt. Instead of dilating further on the subject, he preferred appealing to one of his predecessors as a Hibbert lecturer, who was himself an Egyptologist. In his course on "The Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religion of Ancient Egypt," M. Renouf said,—"I have looked through a number of works professing to discover Egyptian influences on Hebrew institutions, but I have not even found anything worth controverting." Dismissing, therefore, the hypothesis of a borrowed worship, Israel had, from the earliest period down to the Babylonian captivity, its own natural religion, which we could only call Yahwism. Regal temples were consecrated to Yahweh, not only at Jerusalem, but at Dan and Bethel also, and the same could be said of the sanctuary at Shiloh during the period of the Judges. The bamoth ("high places"), too, though Ezekiel was very likely correct in supposing them to be of Canaanitish origin, were used in Yahweh's worship by the cities where they stood. Even at Jerusalem, though the temple stood there, they were not wanting. Mostly very simple mounds, natural or artificial, each had its altar, with a chapel, sometimes, or even a temple. Besides lesser local sanctuaries, there were also greater bamoth, sacred for their antiquity or some other special reason, and to these pilgrims flocked from afar. Corresponding to Yahweh's many sanctuaries were the numerous offerings made to him at his feasts. Even those prophets who in other respects found most to object to in the popular worship did not deny its being meant as a tribute of reverence to Yahweh. Amos, for instance, is not speaking of the worship of other gods when he makes Yahweh declare "I hate, I despise your feasts, and cannot endure your assemblies." In Yahweh's honour were the oxen slain and the hymns sung which he would not regard. The evidence of Hosea and Isaiah on this point agreed with the witness of Amos. The same testimony taught us how Yahweh's worship penetrated and hallowed the personal, the domestic, and the family life of ancient Israel. Copious details were given. "Is not Yahweh in our midst; no harm will befall us"—so spoke Micah's contemporaries. Amos referred to countrymen of his who longed for "the day of Yahweh"—i.e., of his vengeance. Prophetic texts were abundantly cited to show that in the pre-exilian times nothing of any importance was undertaken in Israel without the leaders of the people consulting Yahweh's oracle about it, of which a particular account was given. As one trait in this rapid sketch it was mentioned that Yahweh's mark was stamped on many of the Israelites in the very names they bore, nearly 200 of which compounded with Yahweh were found in the Old Testament, from which source all the illustrative facts to the same effect had been taken. But how was it, the lecturer asked, that the picture of ancient Israel thus recovered was so unlike the current conception of its religious condition? The reason was not far to seek. That current conception had not been derived from the special traits of which he had reminded his audience, but from the general reviews of the popular religion laid before us by the Israelitish historians themselves—such as the introduction to the Book of Judges and the retrospect in the Books of Kings of the fates of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Their contents were briefly summarised. The dark picture painted by the historians, who, whereas the prophets declared that the people served Yahweh in its own wrong way, gave us the impression that Israel, either now and then or always, deserted and forsook him altogether, was thus explained. The Mosaic law was the standard of the historians—the book of Deuteronomy for the author of Judges and Kings (one person in all likelihood), and the whole Pentateuch for the Chronicler. Tried by these comparatively recent codes, the popular religion was far indeed from deserving the name of Yahwism. To see this we had only to bear in mind that Deuteronomy confined Yahweh's feasts and offerings to the one temple at Jerusalem, and that the priestly law made access to him dependent upon a host of conditions, not one of which had been observed by even the most zealous servants. What the people, therefore, had done in all sincerity to the glory of Yahweh, the later historians could only brand as contempt for his commandments. In their eyes it was as abominable as idolatry itself—nay, even more so, inasmuch as it falsely declared itself to be the worship of Yahweh. No wonder they included everything—the building of bamoth, the sacrificing "on every high hill and under every green tree," the images of Yahweh and the service of other gods

—under one sweeping condemnation as apostasy from Yahweh. We must not, therefore, allow the Israelitish historians to shake our conclusion. So far as their judgment rested on fact it claimed our respect; but that did not necessitate our concurrence in their condemnation of the popular religion before the Exile. Of course, the question was not whether the usages of the popular Yahwism secured our sympathy. Presumably we should not find them attractive. The images of Yahweh, which adorned most of the bamoth, as well as the temples at Dan and Beth-el, implied that the ideas men had of him were cruel and material in the extreme. Of these religious solemnities we knew little, but enough to assert with confidence that they embodied anything but spiritual conceptions. Wanton license on the one hand, and the terror-stricken attempt to propitiate the Deity with human sacrifices on the other, were the two extremes into which the worshippers of Yahweh seemed by no means exceptionally to have fallen. No one would undertake to defend all this, especially as at that very time there was already another, and a higher standard in ancient Israel opposed to and judging the lower. But yet we were not justified in denying all worth to the popular religion in Israel, and reckoning the participation in it as a grievous sin on the part of the masses. For the just appreciation of the popular religion of Israel, something more than a casual study of the activity of the priesthood was absolutely essential, as well as of the prophetic order. As to the limitation of the sacerdotal office to the descendants of Aaron, it was remarked that it was declared by some to have been post-exilian, the objectors maintaining that before the Babylonian captivity all the Levites were capable of priestly functions. Yet others limited even this restriction to the very latest period of the kingdom of Judah, asserting that in earlier times the Levites shared their priestly employments with men of other tribes. Lastly, others held that "Levite or non-Levite" could have no meaning in this connection, since the very name at first meant neither more nor less than the servants of Yahweh's sanctuaries, whoever they might be. The idea of a specifically Egyptian origin for the tribe of Levi was decidedly rejected, but if historical criticism had proved anything, it had proved that the whole Israelite people of the regal period had sprung out of the fusion of very heterogeneous elements. Hence, said Dr. Kuenen, nothing hindered him from proceeding to show the priests of Yahweh at work, as teachers, soothsayers, and judges, as well as in other priestly functions. How far short they fell of their ideal was clear from the denunciations of the prophets, who represented the ethical character of Yahweh, the one trait of the national religion which belonged to the future, and was destined to develop into a faith and worship for the world.

This lecture was re delivered at St. George's Hall on Thursday morning.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The following letters were laid before the Conference on the opening of the proceedings:—

Rooms of the American Unitarian Association, 7, Tremont-place, Boston, Mass., March 28, 1882.

To the National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian, and other Non-Subscribing Churches, greeting.

I am instructed to say that in acceptance of your kind invitation the Rev. Pitt Dillingham and the Rev. Hobart Clark have been appointed to represent us at your meeting April 18, 19, and 20, to speak in our behalf, to express our interest in your continued Christian prosperity, and to convey our lively sympathy in your new Christian enterprise. Our deep desire is that this gathering may greatly increase your faith and courage, bind you in a closer fellowship, and increase and enrich your fields of usefulness.

In bonds of Christian love and life, I am very truly,
of the A.U.A.

Leiden, March 28, 1882.

My dear Sir,—I have been so busy of late with my preparation for the Hibbert Lectures that I had not yet found leisure to answer your printed letter when I received your kind invitation of the 18th inst. It would indeed be a great privilege for me to be present at your Conference, to see old friends and to make new acquaintances. But it cannot be. I intend to leave Holland on the 18th April, the first day on which I am at liberty to go, and could not reach Liverpool in time, even if it were not too much fatigue to undertake that journey, when so many lectures—five in London and five at Oxford—are for me in store. I am really sorry that I cannot arrange matters otherwise; being so near, I should very much like to see you all, and to hear the discussions on the interesting questions proposed by the Committee. But it will not be possible.

When you find an opportunity of doing so, please give to the Conference the assurance of my deep and heartfelt sympathy with its aims, and my best wishes for the success of the great work which is to be carried out by your churches. The day will come, though we may not live to see it, that the cause in which you are engaged will be acknowledged to be what the name of the Conference prophetically indicates, a truly national interest.—I remain, my dear Sir, yours faithfully and cordially,

A. KUENEN.

Paris, 74, Rue de Rennes, Feb. 28, 1862.

Dear Sir,—On my return from a tour in Alsace I found your kind letter awaiting me, in which you invite me to be present at your National Conference, to be held in Liverpool on the 18th, 19th, and 20th April.

I am highly gratified at this token that English Unitarianism holds me in kindly remembrance. It may certainly count upon my sympathy and, as far as in me lies, upon my co-operation. By my ancestry, and by my own predilections, I am attached to the Liberal Protestantism of France; and what are Liberal Protestants on the Continent but Unitarians, who have emancipated themselves, through the study of the Bible and ecclesiastical history, from those very doctrines—doctrines irrational, inhuman, foreign at once to the spirit and to the word of Jesus—whose yoke it is the honour of English Unitarianism to have repudiated long ago?

The part assigned by Providence to Unitarianism is one of growing importance. Both on the Continent and in England we see a constant recoil from traditional dogmas, at which I should feel nothing but satisfaction were it not that (in accordance with that law of action and reaction whose operation seems most strongly marked in the case of orthodoxes of every shade) this rupture with the old faiths is driving a vast number of minds not merely into opposition to Christianity, but even to the negation of all religious principle.

Here we have an extreme, destined to endanger the closing years of the nineteenth century, just as its earlier years were marked by a blind spasmodic recurrence to bygone doctrines. We are entering upon a period of systematised irreligion; we must keep our eyes open to the fact, we must submit to it as to the inevitable, but at the same time we must labour to ensure a better future to our posterity.

The irreligion which dries and cramps the soul is no more wholesome, no more in harmony with truly human life than the hyper-religion which intoxicates and stupefies it. In the former case, death is the result of inanition, in the latter, of indigestion; and there is nothing to choose between the two.

The mission of English Unitarianism—a mission which it has received in common with parallel movements on the Continent—is to prepare the religion of the twentieth century—a religion of social progress, of the love of God, and of human brotherhood, which will satisfy our most imperative demands in the present life, and at the same time will reopen to our souls, ever thirsting for the infinite, the sublime and inspiring prospect of life eternal in the bosom of the Universal Spirit. This is the prophetic message which I believe myself authorised to deliver in the name of religious history, as a consequence of all we know and all we see.

I should have been most happy to have an opportunity of exchanging ideas with my brethren in England on such matters as these; but unfortunately the exigencies of my position, and many engagements already formed, forbid me to entertain the thought of leaving home at the date you mention. Be good enough to communicate my excuses and regrets to your friends; and accept for yourself, dear Sir, the assurance of my sincere regard and sympathy.

A. REVILLE, Professor of the History of Religions in the College of France.

OUR CANAL POPULATION.—It has been decided that the Bill promoted by Mr. George Coalville, for the amiliration and education of children living in canal boats, shall be reintroduced this Session, with certain amendments, and that the Marquis of Tweeddale shall take charge of it in the Lords, Mr. Burt, later on, piloting it through the House of Commons.

The Liberal Pulpit.

THE REV. W. BINNS ON LONGFELLOW.

In the course of a recent sermon at the Unitarian Church, Birkenhead, on the poet Longfellow, the Rev. W. Binns said:—

For sixty years the English-speaking peoples have known and loved Longfellow, and his fame was constantly spreading, and affection for him was deepening. The news of his death created even a world-wide sorrow, for his best works had been translated into all European tongues. In him a star disappeared from the common sky, and a strain of sweet music pleasant to the universal ear died away into silence. The star might not be the brightest, but it shone with a tender light all its own, and will be more missed than many others of greater brilliance would be. The music might not remind us of Handel's choruses or Wagner's wild, weird, and mystical tempests of melody and discord. Rather it was like an old English ballad, such as Shakespeare loved, or "Home, Sweet Home," or "Auld Lang Syne," or some of those tunes the critics do not care for, but that the popular ear listens to with delight, and asks for again and again. It is fitting that we should pronounce a grateful epitaph, and hang up his portrait in our picture gallery of illustrious worthies. One of his ancestors was the first man who landed from the Mayflower on the shore at Plymouth, in New England—a Puritan of Puritans—and the soul of his ancestors lived on in the poet with the old integrity and intensity, and with a more genial faith than that of grim John Calvin. He was intended to pursue the profession of the law, but he hankered after poetry, and law and poetry do not go well together. Law is dry and matter-of-fact, and with it the custom of a thing is its sanctity. It is a system of highways and byways, with milestones and guide posts, where we must trudge along on foot, but dare not enter the open country. Poetry, on the other hand, is fresh with the morning dew; it is haunted by ideal visions of a good time coming, and it defies custom when custom falls below conscience. Above all, poetry loves the moorland and the mountain, with no walls save the horizon, and no roof save the sky. It was well, therefore, that Longfellow abandoned the law. If he had stuck to it, we should have lost a good poet and perhaps gained only a mediocre lawyer—a mediocre lawyer because the vocation was not liked by him; and lost the poet, because poetry needs a spiritual sustenance which law does not command nor give. Bacon is almost the only eminent lawyer distinguished by a large endowment of poetic imagination. I have no desire to discredit law. It is the safeguard of society, and its interpreters are, or should be, the lay priests of order and civilisation. At the same time, it is clear to me that Longfellow rendered more service to the world by choosing poetry for his sphere of labour than he would have rendered if he had become a lawyer equal to his great countrymen Mr. Justice Story.

After this final choice of a profession the outward record of his life is a story of literary activity, study, and travel. He resided forty years at Craigie House, near Cambridge, Massachusetts, a house which was the headquarters of Washington after the battle of Bunker's Hill. Thence he sent forth, in rapid succession, a rich series of poems, stories, and translations. Of the stories, "Hyperion" and "Kavanagh" are prose in form and poetic in thought. Of the translations, that of Dante is the most readable we have, if not the finest, and through its wealth of notes it gives us the best idea of the great Florentine. Apart from all other considerations, he was a man of splendid industry. Labour is worship, and better rub than rust, were his mottoes. He had no idle days or frivolous pleasures. Therefore he lived so long—from 1807 to 1862—and built himself a lasting monument. Revolutions in Europe and America swept by him. The world grew, and he grew with it, and the world wept when he, the world-child, died into immortality. American society is composite architecture built up out of European ideas and peoples. The sole originality possible to it is to put old truths in new forms, old pictures in new frames, and old characteristics in new variations. Indeed, this is the sole originality possible now to any society. No American poets, however, except Walt Whitman, have made startling departures from the forms, frames, and varieties we are familiar with, and his departure is so very startling that I devoutly trust he will have no imitators. Longfellow's poetry is that of a milder-mannered Milton; he has all Milton's lofty purity of tone, with far less than Milton's grandeur and genius. He is pre-eminently the poet of the affections and moral aspirations. He tries to tell us nothing new. The ancient verities of the heart are enough for him, and on them he rings endless changes in melodious numbers. He reads ourselves out to us. So his best verses sound like the voices of old friends. That is his triumph. We may say we knew all that before, and it is only homespun probably; but we had forgotten it, and he recalls it to our remembrance in a song that we can forget it no more, and the homespun sits on us more gracefully than silk or satin, and does both for Sunday and weekday wear. We have known all there is in the Psalm of Life from the days of our childhood. It is a versified echo of Carlyle's "Be in earnest;" that is an echo of Solomon, and Solomon is an echo of every-day morality as old as humanity. The charm is in the expression. These copy-book precepts are treasured in our memory, and become living energies, and reveal the poet fulfilling his vocation as a quickening preacher of righteousness. I might quote similar sentiments from Browning, but the language would be crabbed; or from Matthew Arnold, but they would have less of the ring of reality, though the mere words might be more exquisitely selected. Longfellow sings them in a Wordsworthian, Tennysonian, or Schillerian vein. Some poems are like the Andes. In climbing them you roam through all zones and see all forms of vegetation; they cleave the clouds; flowers nestle in valleys afar on high, and rivulets babble at their feet. They are the world in miniature. Such is Shakespeare. And some poets are like pleasant meadow lands, with cattle grazing, streams lazily meandering, fresh spring breezes playing over them, breathing cheerfulness and making old folk feel young again. Such is Longfellow. Tennyson prays for sweeter manners and purer laws, and Longfellow is a friendly household guide to the sweeter manners and purer laws for which Tennyson prays.

I hardly like to fix his rank as a poet. And why need I try? Here is an oak, there an ash, there a beech, which is the best? None and all. They are all good in their places, and the best for their special purposes. This I know, that when I read "Evangeline" I am in love with its pious simplicity; when I read "Hiawatha" I am enraptured with its pictures of primitive Indian life; when I read "Miles Standish" I am at home with the Puritans; when I read "The Golden Legend" I revel in Middle Age traditions; when I read the smaller poems I am moved to tenderness, sympathy, reverence, love, and aspiration; and running through all my emotions, I am moved to unconquerable trust in man and God. When a poet renders me this service I thank God for him. Longfellow renders it to me, and I thank God for Longfellow. His personal activity is best shown in its moral bearings by his attitude towards slavery. Twenty years ago a man's attitude in this respect stamped him a backward or a forward looking man in the United States. From the beginning Longfellow belonged to the anti-slavery party. In days when Southerners tarred and feathered the abolitionists, he boldly expressed his generous sympathies. Before Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" awoke the sluggish conscience of the Union, he portrayed the horrors of the institution which the respectable North winked at. When politicians were false, when preachers were unchristian, when literary men were silent, and when scientific men consecrated science to the service of a lie, he, the sturdy son of New England, the descendant of the Mayflower pilgrims, remained steadily faithful to truth, liberty, and justice, and at over sixty years old he witnessed the victory of the good cause in which he always believed and for which he always toiled, when the sacrifice of Abraham Lincoln purchased the destruction of the slavery which Daniel Webster had sacrificed himself in vain to save. All that is an old story now. America has wiped the stain from her flag. Still she keeps there the stars and stripes, but no longer has she stripes for her coloured citizens. Longfellow's early dreams, once reckoned Utopian, are sober facts, and their right to rule will be disputed never more. With Longfellow, politics, morality, and life are baptised, and not merely sprinkled in the waters of religion. Like most of the best known American literary men—like Bryant, Wendell, Holmes, Emerson, and Lowell (the present American Ambassador in England)—he was a Unitarian. Still he did not run a muck against the Trinity, the devil, and kindred dogmas. He presented a theory of religious faith which left them out in the cold. To a thorough believer in God the darkness of hell fades away in the sunshine of divine love, and the mythological Satan himself is finally gathered unto him out of whom, through whom, and to whom are all things. Note the suggestive conclusion of the "Golden Legend" and the "Theologian's Fall in the Wayside Inn. They sum up Longfellow's religious teachings—a steadfast worker, a helpful thinker, a sweet singer, a catholic religionist, a practical Christian. Such was the old man eloquent. America is justly proud of her son, England of the Puritan exiles who bred him, and humanity of this specimen of a man. Being dead he yet speaketh, and is dead to live again for ever.

THE REV. JOHN H. THOM ON "MINISTERS STIPENDS AND AUGMENTATION FUNDS."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—On the morning of the last day of the Conference at Liverpool I had the pleasure to receive a note from the Rev. John H. Thom, expressing his sympathy with the purport of my paper, and enclosing a letter from Mr. William Rathbone, M.P., written from St. Jean de Luz, under the apprehension that he might not reach England in time to attend the Conference. To the great satisfaction of the large assembly, however, Mr. Rathbone presented himself, and expressed his willingness to speak on the subject. I was thus relieved of the duty of reading his letter, the substance of which he gave us in his earnest and excellent speech; but I lost the opportunity of reading Mr. Thom's note, and of adding the weight of his great authority to our proceedings. Subsequently, I asked his permission to make use of it through the Press, and was much gratified to receive his kind consent.—I am, your truly,
HARRY RAWSON.
Eccles, April 24.

The Rothay Hotel, Grasmere, April 19.

My dear Sir,—I have received here this morning the enclosed, in a more general letter from Mr. Rathbone, dated the 16th inst., St. Jean de Luz. I regret that it did not reach me sooner, and I hasten to place it at your disposal for such use as you may wish to make of it, if Mr. Rathbone himself should not be present with you to-morrow morning. I could wish that the Conference had given its whole time to the subject of your paper, with the view of working it out to a practical result. When Mr. Rawdon and others founded "The Stipend Augmentation Fund," on the committee of management of which you now are, it was in the full expectation that a similar fund would be established in London or elsewhere for the South of England. What we want, however, is a General Sustentation Fund, to enable every congregation recognised as belonging to the body of the Free Christian Churches, with a qualified Minister, to give a minimum salary. Mr. Rathbone takes that minimum at £150, which I certainly think is not too high.—I am, my dear Sir, very truly yours,
Harry Rawson, Esq. JOHN H. THOM.

P.S.—If such a General Sustentation Fund for all congregations recognised as belonging to our body was formed, "The Stipend Augmentation Fund" might merge in or co-operate with it, as part provision for the North of England, but in this I, of course, only make a suggestion as to possible ways and means.

The Rothay Hotel, Grasmere, April 21.

My dear Mr. Rawson,—I shall be happy to be of use in any way, in the direction in which you have been moving. If I had contemplated any further object for my note than the means of placing Mr. Rathbone's letter in your hands I should have written more fully and more strongly. I am very glad that he was able to be with you and give an impulse to your project. In his letter he charges every rich man in our body with £100 a year for the Sustentation of our Ministry. I am very far from being a rich man, and as far from desiring to be one; but I feel the strongest possible obligation upon me to make every exertion, and even sacrifice, to raise the condition of my less favourably placed brethren, and for the dignity, the worthiness, real and ostensible, of our Free Churches, in their material and spiritual maintenance. I shall heartily rejoice if the Conference shall eventually justify itself by having set on foot a much-needed movement, and borne practical fruit at least in one direction. If we had a wisely constituted Sustentation Fund for every recognised congregation needing such support, then we might be released from that miserable system of small doles which serves but to keep alive an existence of doubtful value, and where the pitiful dole is often given rather for the sake of what is due to the unhappy minister than from any hope of its having a productive efficacy.—I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly, JOHN H. THOM.

UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, and other NON-SUBSCRIBING or kindred CONGREGATIONS, held at LIVERPOOL, 18th-20th April, 1882.

At a meeting of the Conference on Wednesday, 19th April, JAMES HEYWOOD, Esq., F.R.S., in the Chair, it was moved by the Rev. J. WRIGHT, B.A., seconded by DAVID MARTINEAU, Esq., and carried:—

"That the gentlemen whose names are appended to the circular convening this Conference do constitute the Committee of the Conference;" and "That the gentlemen who have acted as Secretaries of the Committee convening the Conference be the Secretaries of the Conference."

At the meeting of the Conference on Thursday, 20th April, C. H. JAMES Esq., M.P., in the Chair, it was proposed by the CHAIRMAN, seconded by WM. RATHBONE, Esq., M.P., and carried unanimously:—

"That, in the opinion of this Conference, it is desirable that a SUSTENTATION FUND be established, in addition to the funds that now exist for the Augmentation of the Stipends of Ministers;" and "That this resolution be referred to the Conference Committee."

Moved by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, seconded by the Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN, and adopted in reverent silence:—

"That this Conference deeply sympathises with its brethren of the Liberal faith in the United States in the losses they have recently sustained by the death of H. W. LONGFELLOW, the Poet of Humanity; of D. ORVILLE DEWEY, the powerful interpreter of the spiritual significance of human life; and of Dr. H. W. BELLOWS, whose Catholic spirit and organising genius have left such large results in the political and religious history of the nation."

Moved by S. S. TAYLER, Esq., seconded by the Rev. H. IERSON, M.A., and carried:—

"That the Committee and Secretaries of the present Conference, with power to add to their number, be appointed a Standing Committee, with instructions to call a similar Conference at such period as it may deem advisable."

Moved by the CHAIRMAN, seconded by HERBERT NEW, Esq., and carried:—

"That the proceedings of the Conference be edited and printed by the Secretaries."

Moved by JOSEPH LUPTON, Esq., seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, and carried:—

"That this Conference gratefully acknowledges the generous hospitality with which they have been received by their friends in Liverpool, and the careful consideration which has been shown in the preparation for the varied meetings and social gatherings. That this Conference cordially presents its warmest thanks to the Reception Committee, and its indefatigable Secretary, Mr. Parry, to Mr. Boulton and the friends, who aided in the musical arrangements, and to all the ladies and gentlemen who have so characteristically upheld the long-established reputation of Liverpool, and feel that the kindness so widely shown has been one of the most efficient means of securing that success which has attended the meetings of this Conference."

A full Report of the Proceedings at the Conference will shortly be issued.

THE FUNCTION OF UNITARIANS.

THE Liverpool gatherings by their magnitude and heartiness wake up a great many people to some conception of the power of Unitarianism, for whether that name is made prominent or suppressed, it is a fact that Unitarian thinking is replacing the old dogmatic attempts to systematise theology. The decline of dogma is universal amongst the educated classes; and it is very striking in thousands who are nominal members of the Church of England, and who wish to see that institution modified, to be in harmony with the discoveries of the age. As the old doctrine of original sin, through the fall of ADAM, and the scheme of rehabilitating humanity through the sacrifice of CHRIST fade away as dissolving views of a dying mythology, the theory of the Trinity loses its importance, and many who still imagine it represents some truth do not attempt to explain it, and mentally correct the Prayer Book phraseology to make it signify GOD in CHRIST, and not GOD as CHRIST. Going to church or chapel as part of a process for obtaining a miraculous remission of sins no longer commends itself to those who have outgrown the mythological theory of salvation. Those who still cling to that notion, and merely want it presented in a milder form, can find in Broad Church, and in the ministrations of the more advanced of the Orthodox Nonconformists, what they require. They are unconsciously influenced by Unitarianism, but would not join a Unitarian congregation. Besides keeping its own children—now so often lost—Unitarianism should aim at attracting the numerous and increasing class who cannot rest in the compromises of Broad Church, and abstain from attending any religious service, not from defect of religious feeling, but because they find nothing that conforms to their opinions and gratifies their tastes. A large proportion of the scientific, literary, and artistic classes, and of those they influence, are seldom seen in church or chapel, and in many cases their children grow up without any instruction in religious matters. The least repulsive services to many of them are found in the High Church, where the architecture, the singing, and the decorations do something for the gratification of æsthetic feeling, and leave the doctrines in a shady mist. If a Unitarian minister is a good speaker, fairly wide in his selection of topics and treating them so as to minister to intellectual culture, he often attracts some of these outsiders, and might attract a good many more if the services were more artistic, and more flexible. In chapels that avoid the weariness of these plans there is enough success to stimulate further trials, and in the training of young ministers it is most important that they should be taught speaking without their book, as a fine art. This has been neglected in Unitarian colleges from the old days of York down to the present time in Gordon-square. The phrase extempore applied to speaking by no means conveys what is wanted. The sermon or lecture should be carefully and elaborately prepared in a style adapted to speaking. A ready flow of words is useful, or mischievous, according to whether or not it is under the control of accurate study and cultivated taste, but it is impossible for any one to make reading a discourse with constant attention to the MS. as interesting to the congregation as speaking may be with constant attention to those who have to listen.

It must not be forgotten that although this is an age of great printing and reading of periodicals and novels, it is by no means common to find amongst the middle or working classes, whose main attention is given to their business, any scholar-like facility in dealing with books. Vast numbers must either get their literary culture through the pulpit, or not get it at all. Under the old orthodox system religion had little connection with culture, and many of us may remember hearing preachers affirm that the most ignorant old woman who had heard the Gospel preached was far wiser than PLATO or SOCRATES—nothing more was required than to "believe the Bible true." The present time demands a more cultivated ministry to act upon its educated classes, though very ignorant ranting still pleases the many. How far a minister can keep up with the thought and discovery of the time without money to buy books, or enjoy the advantages of society, the richer members of our congregations would do well to consider. MR. RAWSON'S facts are most eloquent upon this topic. Long suffering under a cooling stipend deadens the intellect and freezes zeal.

DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY.

VI. HEAVEN AND HELL.

THE last of the series of discourses, by the Rev. JOHN HUNTER, of York, discussed the subject of Heaven and Hell. There were two other sermons, on Justification by Faith, and Conversion and Regeneration, but of these we have not seen any published reports. We pass on therefore to the concluding discourse. It is quite in keeping with those which have gone before, and forms a suitable termination to the whole series. What has hitherto been the popular conception of Heaven and Hell—that the one is a place of glory and the other a place of torment—is completely cast aside by MR. HUNTER; and a spiritual interpretation of the subject is given which all Unitarians would accept. It is remarkable, too, that in speaking of Hell there is no reference by the preacher, except by quotation of a line from MILTON, to that dread personage whom Orthodoxy has always associated with Hell and its torment. In the report before us there is no attempt to prove the existence of Satan or even to connect him in any way with the kind of hell in which MR. HUNTER believes. The Devil is dismissed with the briefest poetical allusion, leaving the impression on the mind that it is uncertain whether the preacher believes in him or not. The prominence of Satan in the old Orthodoxy, and the little that is said about him in the new is another indication that the title we have given to these criticisms is by no means an unwarranted assumption.

After remarking how limited and uncertain is our knowledge of the future world, and how vain and futile have been all the efforts of men to overcome the limitations of their lot, MR. HUNTER continued:—"The gross material representations of heaven and hell which had so long prevailed in the world were fast becoming as incredible and impossible to enlightened Christian faith as the Olympian court of Jupiter and the Hades of the Greeks." Can any concession be more frank? The vast majority of Orthodox believers, both Catholics and Protestants, have no other idea of heaven, except as a realm of bliss, pictured to us in the book of Revelation, or of hell but as a realm of woe, a lake of fire over which the Devil rules in undisputed sovereignty. It is a great advance from this to MR. HUNTER'S philosophy, which he states in the following sentences:—

When we got behind the imagery of the New Testament to its principles we found that heaven and hell were essentially moral states, the outgrowth and result of character. Retribution, which was a solemn reality in the present, was continued and completed in the future. The Divine government was not external and arbitrary in its methods; it was administered in character itself, in the kingdom within us through the intrinsic order and laws of things. By the character we are fashioning we are creating our own condition; all goodness was so much of heaven, and all badness so much of hell. The tendency of both good and evil was to permanence in character. Actions frequently repeated formed habit, and habit persisted in created character, and it was through character, through laws inherent in human nature and conduct, we reached the great opposite conditions—heaven or hell. Heaven and hell differed in kind and degree according to individual character; the only hell which men had to fear was one of their own creating, and it was just that hell in which men could not help believing. The real danger was in ourselves, and for the soul to lose its love and vision of good, to fall under the dominion of lower loves, and to have formed and strengthened antipathies to the Divine Spirit was to be in a condition which would make a hell out of the purest and best surroundings. In ordinary phraseology we spoke of our existence as if death created a chasm in it, but temporal and eternal were but human distinctions, and the gulf which the gospel revealed was not between time and eternity, but between righteousness and sin. It was not death that kept God from saving any soul but sin—sin becoming so predominant and permanent in the soul as to make salvation impossible without violating the law under which God created man, and which makes man a free and independent being, and not a machine—a creator and not a creature of destiny.

With this philosophical teaching on the subject of retribution and human destiny we profess ourselves completely in accord. All the objectionable features of the popular Orthodoxy are left out, and instead of them a view is presented in essential harmony with spiritual Unitarianism. Concerning the future of the wicked Mr. HUNTER has no theory to offer, but he has a significant sentence which may be taken to present his belief on the subject: "If we have truly entered into the spirit of the Christian revelation we cannot believe in the exhaustion of the Infinite mercy, or hesitate to trust, and not faintly either, that God will do his uttermost and best with every creature of his making." So much on the side of hope; then on the other side he adds: "But we put too narrow a limit on the power of human will and habit, and took too little account of the tendencies to permanence in human character, and of the dark facts of human experience, if we could not think of a hell to which we may doom ourselves, from which the Almighty and the All-merciful has no resource to deliver us, consistent with his righteousness and our freedom." This is the nearest approach which Mr. HUNTER makes to the doctrine of Eternal Punishment. He conceives it possible for human sinfulness to be such as to offer no prospect of deliverance consistent with God's righteousness and man's freedom. It appears to be put forth by him as an extreme case, not as the ordinary lot of those who die impenitent.

Before bringing these criticisms to a close we have a few words to say in reply to Mr. HUNTER's letter which appeared in these columns a few weeks since. And first as to the tone of his letter; we think it unworthy of him; it is querulous and complaining, as if our criticism were uncalled for and unfair. What could he expect but criticism when he sent full reports of his sermons to the Christian World, or at least allowed them to be sent, and in those sermons criticised the Unitarian theology, pointing out what he conceived to be its mistakes, defects and shortcomings? The challenge came from him, not from us, and in taking it up we have endeavoured to write in a spirit of fairness. Whether we have succeeded we must leave to the judgment of those who have read these criticisms.

Our articles assume, Mr. HUNTER says, "as Unitarians generally are often inclined to do, that the rational theology, the religion of the future, the only possible conciliation between religious faith and the knowledge of to-day are to be found in Unitarianism." We maintain, and challenge contradiction, that the direction in which liberal Orthodoxy has advanced in recent years is distinctly towards the position of spiritual Unitarianism. Will Mr. HUNTER name a single point of liberal Orthodoxy such as his which has not been anticipated by Unitarianism? His own discourses are saturated with Unitarian ideas and sentiments. Parallel passages to those in his sermons might be extracted freely from the writings of CHANNING, J. J. TAYLER, THOM, MARTINEAU, and others. Will Mr. HUNTER state any "conciliation between religious faith and the knowledge of to-day" other than that which Unitarians have advanced? Is he prepared to deny that the points which modern Orthodoxy has surrendered, the "gross, material conceptions" which he himself denounces are precisely those which Unitarians assailed in days gone by, when they were universally believed by the Orthodox? And can this altered attitude be described better than as the Orthodox change of front? We are glad to find Mr. HUNTER admitting the indebtedness of liberal Orthodoxy to Unitarianism. "I gratefully recognise," he "says, the good work that Unitarianism has done in calling the attention of Christendom to neglected and forgotten truths or aspects of truth." Mr. HUNTER asks—"Why may we not discard the old statements of Evangelical doctrine, and yet be Evangelical in essentials?" Because the old statements embraced the substance of the Evangelical doctrine. They put exactly into fitting words the essential ideas of the popular theology, so that if you surrender the statements you practically surrender the theology. The modified diluted Orthodoxy which remains is little else than Unitarianism under another name. Our whole argument throughout these criticisms establishes this; it establishes nothing. We contend that the old forms of theology fitted it exactly. The old theologians were too careful in drawing up their statements to put them loosely. They knew what they were about, and would not allow their standards of doctrine to be tampered with. Under the spiritualising, rationalising process of Mr. HUNTER's exposition the old Orthodoxy evaporates, its objectionable features vanish, and what is left differs so little from ordinary Unitarian thought that he and the Unitarian minister might almost exchange pulpits. Of course we know there are some Unitarians of the extreme rationalistic school whose views are far removed from those of Mr. HUNTER, but these men do not represent the prevailing thought of the Unitarian denomination.

Towards the close of his letter Mr. HUNTER enumerates the unassailable doctrines that remain when all the untenable positions have been given up. We ask special attention to this enumeration:—

1. The consciousness of sin.
2. The Bible as a record of human experiences, inexplicable save from the point of view of the belief in Divine revelation to human souls.
3. JESUS CHRIST as an historical personage, and as a real and living presence known by a communion the most immediate and sacred.
4. Personal spiritual experience.

Such is the foundation which Mr. HUNTER has reached, "on which," he says, "I do and must stand, and standing on which I feel secure."

Now this, we think, is sufficient to justify all that we have said. Every point distinctive of Orthodoxy is surrendered, or so toned down that only the faintest lines remain. His foundation and ours are so nearly the same that the points of difference between us are scarcely worth disputing. They are more in the form of expression than in the thought itself. We write this in no boastful spirit. We rejoice that the liberal school of Orthodoxy has put aside so much of the wretched superstitions, the absurd extravagances, the horrible doctrines of the old Evangelical theology. We are glad that these are dying out; and we welcome every advance towards a rational theology from whatever quarter it may come. And here we bring to a close this series of articles reviewing Mr. HUNTER's lectures, thankful for the opportunity he has afforded us of discussing with him certain great leading doctrines, and of estimating his position as a prominent teacher of so-called liberal Orthodoxy.

C. F. B.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

Thanks for the symmetric life, now beautifully rounded, of this true Son of Man, who has taught his fellows, as few have done before, how through the illusive panorama of manifold existence we may pass, as Immortals, into the constant Presence of the One All-Holy and Wise, All-Beneficent and Blessed, and commune with Him in Harmony, as His dear children.

It would be disloyal to reverent gratitude for the writer of this brief memento to assume a tone of impartial criticism towards one who was to him one of his richest spiritual benefactors, for nearly forty years. And privileged as he has been with frequent dwelling as a guest in Emerson's hospitable home—with prolonged talks in his library among his pictures and his books,—and walks beside him, through the pine-woods around Walden lake, and on the beech-crowned hills, which overlook the valley of Concord and its winding stream,—the best tribute of honour in his power to render is to pass in review a few photographs of this "Prophet of the Soul," as they are ranged according to the order of time, in his memory.

I. The Three Brothers.—A beautiful picture of college-days is of Waldo, Edward and Charles Emerson, "walking westward" one evening, across Cambridge Common, with the splendour of the sunset on their uplifted faces. They were absorbed in earnest talk; what was their theme? Finer types of ideal young men,—for all three were under twenty-five,—it would have been hard to find. It had never then been my happy fortune to hear Waldo speak; but the orations of Edward and Charles were well remembered for their classical elegance and grace at the graduation of their respective classes from Harvard University. Their mutual devotedness and reverence for one another's genius and character also were often spoken of admiringly amid our college mates. And we knew that distinguished judges, lawyers, and statesmen predicted a brilliant career for Edward and Charles at the Bar and in legislative halls—while among the young ministers of the time no one was more eagerly waited for by expectant congregations than Waldo. Sons of a widowed mother; inheritors of a scholarly father's refined talent and culture, reared in a guarded home, and now entering manhood with the garlands of early success entwining their brows—how bright with promise looked the destiny of these three brothers. But a few years sped by, while each seemed "growing in favour with God and Man," when suddenly struck down by brain fever from the effects of intense study and overwork, Edward was forced to quit his profession and to seek health—an unwilling exile—in change of scene and work. Waldo's sympathy with his beloved Edward's disappointment was a severe blow. But a more terrible shock was soon to fall. For the delicate constitution of Charles, smitten by the frosty seasons of New England, yielded to the subtle inroads of consumption; and, on the eve of his marriage with the great-souled daughter of Judge Hoar, he vanished from sight, like an angel. None who would rightly appreciate the quality of Emerson's steadfast self-reliance should fail to remember these irreparable bereavements. And how life-long was their influence may be learned from his two most touching elegiac poems, the first of which, called "In Memoriam to E.B.E.," begins with the thrilling lines:—

"Oh! Brother of the brief but blazing star!
Thou born for noblest life,
For action's field, for victor's car,
Thou living champion of the right."

The second is the "Dirge," unsurpassed in English literature for its solemn sweetness:—

"But they are gone—the holy ones,
Who trod with me this lovely vale!
The strong, star-bright companions
Are silent, low, and pale. . . .
You cannot unlock your heart,
The key is gone with them;
The silent organ loudest chants
The Master's requiem."

II. The Young Preacher.—At the time when these sorrows darkened his firmament, Waldo Emerson had become the successor of the sainted Henry Ware in the North Church of Boston. And, drawn by the magnetic charm of his preaching, a large company of young people of various Liberal congregations in the city had gathered about him. Earnest and eloquent as were several of the elder ministers, there was a unique quality in this fervent apostle that was irresistibly attractive. Calm in manner, clear in statement, terse in style, unsensational and plain as were his appeals, sternly sincere as were his exhortations, and mystically lofty as were his aspirations, yet Emerson's discourses at once inspired and commanded his auditors. He seemed to bring a message direct from the All True. Out of his own life he reflected the glory of the All Good. The horizon looked more wide, the heavens more high, and the air was purer, as they left the altar where he ministered before the All Beautiful. But why enlarge on the impression produced upon his young disciples, when we have his portrait, unconsciously painted by his own hand, some years later, in his "Address to the Senior Class of the Cambridge Divinity School?" He was that very "new-born Bard of the Holy Ghost" there imaged, "who shall behold with his own eyes that Supreme Beauty, which ravished the souls of the Eastern men, and chiefly of the Hebrews, and through their lips spoke oracles to all time, and shall speak also in the West." But presently, while hope was thus kindling like the dawn of a new day, a whisper spread that Emerson was a "Transcendental Pantheist" of the Kant and Fichte type, and distrusted the prevalent methods of symbolising our relations to the "Ineffable" under Personal forms. These ominous rumours were followed by the announcement that, like the Friends, the young minister of the North Church found himself unable, in simple sincerity, to administer the Sacraments, and that he was about to resign his pastorate. And, scrupulously conscientious, he did soon withdraw from the growing congregation who so prized his services, and from the ministry; though for a continuous period longer he preached to the plain farmers of Lexington, who thought no one's talks from the pulpit so sensible and practical as his. Thus he became:—

III. The Orator, Lecturer, and Scholar.—Little did Emerson probably foresee that in quitting, from a high sense of honour, the pulpit, he was as a lecturer from the platform to address a far wider public than he could have reached within Church walls, and exert an ever-widening influence not upon his countrymen only, but on all communities who speak the English tongue. He simply took in good faith a step forward in the path unexpectedly opened, and "did with might the work his hand found to do." And this was to preach the glad tidings, that man is at home in the beautiful Universe, with all whose living laws his constitution is congenial. Modest, reverent, adoring as he was, yet he must have been conscious that he was himself the "New Teacher" he aspired after, "who shall follow so far those shining laws as to see them come full circle; shall see their rounded, complete grace; shall see the world to be a mirror of the soul; shall see the identity of the law of gravitation with purity of heart, and that the Ought, that Duty is one with Science, with Beauty, and with Joy." For this is the keynote and theme of the majestic symphony that developed its rich harmonies through a half century and more of earnest toil. Then swiftly followed his "Nature," his Orations on the "American Scholar," "Literary Ethics," "The Method of Nature," "Man the Reformer," &c.; his Lectures on "The Times," "The Transcendentalist," "The Nominalist and Realist," "The Young American," and various courses on "Representative Men," "The Conduct of Life," &c., annually delivered in leading cities of the Atlantic seaboard, and far away westward to the Mississippi valley. What a new world of glad expectancy these stirring appeals disclosed can scarcely be now conceived, so much has their light illumined our atmosphere of thought and speech ever since. The "ancient and honourable," sober bankers and merchants, wise judges, prudent statesmen, literary critics, cynical sceptics, though they thronged his lecture halls, led by their bright-haired boys and blooming daughters, at first shook their heads in doubt of Emerson's "transcendental trash." But then they began to hearken, lured by the music of his pure Saxon dialect. And soon they became zealous converts, when they found how he revealed their hidden secrets, betrayed their bosom sins, laid bare their pitfalls of temptation, brought to judgment their mean maxims and cowardly conventions, and, above all, roused them to nobler aims by his cheerful optimism and vigorous manliness. To those of a later generation, whose associations are with an aged man, with bowed form, thin silvery hair, subdued gentleness of tone, and hesitating manner, it is quite impossible to convey an adequate impression of Emerson in his prime—when erect, elate, radiant as an Apollo, the flush of health tinging his bronzed cheeks, the blue eyes ablaze with inner light, a benign smile, shrewd and sweet with finest humour, gladdening his countenance, with mien, half dignified, half diffident, and gracious gesture, he poured forth his tides of melodious speech to responsive assemblies. Nature had endowed him with a voice of richest quality and varied compass, now resonant as a bugle, now vibrating as a reed-stop; and without rhetorical training, instinctive emotion and intense conviction had taught him a skill in emphasis and intonation, with a peculiarly tender lingering on certain key-words, and a swift launching forth of apt phrases in a jet, with an effectiveness such as mere art could never reach. So by unanimous consent it was recognised throughout the Northern and Western Free States, that as orator and lecturer, in his own sphere, Emerson was without a peer.

These lectures were the stem and boughs, whence bloomed and ripened into mellow fruit the famous "Essays," &c., which would lead us naturally into the secluded sanctum of the Scholar. And a delightful privilege it would be to mention his favourite authors, to describe his methods of study, journalising, correspondence, and preparing lectures or manuscript for the press, and to report his readings aloud of choice passages, keen criticism, witty sallies, or high-toned monologues. But neither time nor space permit, as other pictures must be presented, however briefly. Let us pass, then, at once to the image of Emerson as

IV. The Reformer, Citizen, and Patriot.—If one who had never heard of the "Seer of Concord" should be asked to form an estimate of the character, aims, and tastes of the authors of the essays on the "Over-soul," "Spiritual Laws," "Compensation," "Circles," &c., &c., would he not mentally construct the form of some New England "Montaigne," withdrawn in fastidious refinement from the hubbub of a hurrying world, and hiving life's honey after pleasant flights of thought. But then let him turn the pages to the essay on "Heroism," and read what is written of "its Doctor and Historian Plutarch, to whom we owe the Brasidas, the Dion, the Epaminondas, the Scipio of old, and to whom we are more deeply indebted than to all the ancient writers, each of whose 'Lives' is a refutation to the despondency and cowardice of our religious and political theories." Or let him read the heart-stirring essay on "Fate" and "Power," in the "Conduct of Life," and he will behold a buoyant, cheery, indomitable "hero in the fight," whom no dangerous odds could daunt. Which, then, is the true Emerson—the meditative recluse, wrapt in studious contemplation of the Bhagavad Gita, Plotinus, Eckhart,—or the "Concord Minute Man," with one hand on the plough in the half-turned furrow, while with the other he grasps the ready rifle and strides sternly on to the inevitable conflict? Each is the Real Man,—one as true to God's Ideal of him as the other! And, as one of his confidential compeers in the tough old times of "Anti-Slavery," and of the "War for Freedom and Union," it gladdens my heart to testify, that in the most trying days, which the "Republic of the West" was called to pass through, Emerson never for a moment faltered. Scores of stories might be told to illustrate his heroic traits. But room can be found for only a very simple one,—out of my own experience. On the day when the disastrous tidings of "Bull-Run" reached Boston, it chanced that we were both engaged to dine at a friend's house, on Milton-Hill. During the forenoon, in successive interviews and in the crowded streets, tear-stained, pallid and angry faces, with blood-shot eyes, fiery glances and stern tones had been passing and resounding round me. But when, in the afternoon, Emerson sat beside us on the piazza, surveying the lovely landscape of wooded slopes, verdant low-lands, and the broad blue bay, flecked with white sails, his brow was as calm, his smile as bright as was his wont, while he quietly said—"We needed this stern lesson to remind us how we have sinned against our brethren, and of the rightful sacrifices which the Just Over-ruler asks of our People. The struggle may be long and hard; but the Right will surely win." This slight incident was typical of his whole career. Though in his inmost soul he longed for the Peace of the Eternal, yet he was ever prompt to obey the roll-call, when Divine Providence signified its supreme will for the hour. He but drew his own likeness, as beheld by his familiars, in the words: "No man has the right reception of any Truth, who has not been reacted on by it, so as to be ready to be its martyr. The one formidable thing in Nature is a Will. Society is servile from want of Will, and therefore the world wants Saviours. One way is right to go; the Hero sees it and moves on that aim. . . . To others he is as the world. His approbation is honour; his dissent infamy. The glance of his eye has the force of sunbeams."

But it was not in great crises only that Emerson proved his fervent patriotism. From early manhood to his closing days he was the model of an upright, faithful, magnanimous citizen. All reforms in schools, charities, hygiene, aesthetic enjoyments, &c., had his hearty encouragement and persistent help. And from his quiet home circle went forth agencies that strengthened the cause of order, temperance, purity, peace, throughout his well-loved township, and cheered the lot or comforted the griefs of his humblest neighbours. Without cavilling at other forms of political organisation in foreign lands, for himself in New England he was, to the very core, a Republican. Never for an instant did he feel distrust as to his nation's destiny. His grief and doubt were only for its sons and daughters, not worthy of their priceless heritage and unequalled opportunities. In a Pindaric ode, he strikes an iron cord, and sings:—

"The God who made New Hampshire
Taunted the lofty land
With little men; . . .
Virtue palters; Right is hence;
Freedom praised, but hid;
Funeral eloquence
Rattles the coffin-lid."

But never will he despair. So with a clarion tone he chants forth his famous "Concord Ode":—

"The men are ripe of Saxon kind
To build an equal State;
To take the Statute from the Mind,
And make of Duty Fate."

But again our limits bid us to hasten on and next sketch Emerson as:—

V. The Friend.—for none could appreciate fairly the intrinsic virtue of this genuinely good man, till they had been inmates of his home, and members for a time of his family. But, here the topic is so ample, and yet withal so delicate to treat, that one scarcely knows where to begin or when to end. Shall we speak, then, first, advancing from the outward, of his courtesy, so simple and frank, yet princely in dignity and graciousness to all visitants—to distinguished travellers from abroad, scholars, scientists, artists, statesmen, or to plain, rough farmers from neighbouring townships—to high-bred ladies from the cities, or young girls from the village streets—to fanatical reformers, proposing the last Utopian scheme in the newest Eldorado or some diffident seeker for the hidden pearl of wisdom, and asking from the sage a solution of life's problems? Fastidious, and sensitive, quick in intuitive thought-reading and delicate in taste, detesting shams and exigent in his ideal expectations, Emerson was incredibly tolerant. If truth and duty commanded, indeed, he could indignantly repel violations of equity or honour. But his patience was wonderful to witness even with the "bores," whom he so keenly rebukes in one of his lines as "Devastators of his day." So sacredly precious with him was time, that it seemed a shameful sin to waste one golden moment. And yet how bitter were his frequent sacrifices, out of kindly complaisance, may be learned from the suggestive Sonnet called "Days," which begins:

"Damsels of Time the hypocritic Days," and closes

..... "and the Day
Turned and departed silent, I, too late
Under her solemn fillet saw the scorn."

Pleasant would it be next to describe some "Symposium" of the "Like-minded," when Henry Hedge, W. H. Furness, Convers Francis, Geo. Ripley, Margaret Fuller, Theodore Parker, John S. Dwight, Hawthorne, &c., &c., gathered under his roof for a talk on the "Times," or some meeting of the famous "Boston Club" at "Parker's," with Agassiz and Pierce, Longfellow and Holmes, Lowell and Sumner, &c., which he so genially enjoyed to the very close. But no room remains for even the briefest sketch. Rather let us touch for an instant on his more interior relations with his few confidential intimates—such as Bronson Alcott, Harry Thoreau, George Bradford, Mrs. Ripley, the learned and accomplished Greek scholar, and his brother Charles' equally accomplished "betroted," Elizabeth Hoar. And here once more, our memories recur to that pathetic line, "You cannot unlock your heart," as explanation of the unlifted veil of reserve that shrouded his inner shrine from the access of even his best loved friends. "The golden key was gone," and the hidden sanctuary was never again opened upon earth. Yet there was no haughty exclusiveness, still less cold indifference in this guarded attitude. On the contrary, his generous essay on "Friendship" reads like an illuminated missal, so bordered, tinted and gilded is it with grateful tenderness. "I awoke this morning," he writes, "with devout thanksgiving for my friends, the old and new. Shall I not call God the Beautiful, who daily showeth Himself to me in His gifts? My friends have come to me unsought. The Great God gave them. . . . A new Person is to me a great event, and hinders me from sleep." And who can ever forget those touchingly tender words of this dignified and stately man:—

"Me, too, thy nobleness has taught
To master my despair;
The fountains of my hidden life
Are through thy friendship fair."

And within all these circles of friendship lay the inmost Eden of his love, as Son, Husband, Father, Grandsire, who daily, nightly fed with spicewood the sacred fire on the altar of The Home. Let all be assured that the Concord, seer and scholar, patriot and reformer, friend and brother, wrote in heart's blood the words on "Domestic Life": "Will not man one day open his eyes and see how dear he is to the Soul of Nature, how near it is to him; . . . that his private being is a part of it, that its home is in his own unsounded heart; that his economy, his labour, his good and bad fortune are all an exact demonstration, in miniature, of the Genius of the Eternal Providence? . . . Let religion cease to be occasional, and let the pulses of thought that go to the borders of the Universe proceed from the bosom of the Household." Emerson's daily home-life was an incessant psalm of grateful praise, an incarnate poem.

And this would have brought us next to picture:—

VI. The Poet; and VII. The Mystic Saint.—

But these themes, too vast and rich for meagre treatment, must be deferred to a later time and another place. So let us here bid farewell to our new-born, glorified brother, with these two sayings of majestic import and infinite good cheer: "(1) Of Immortality, the Soul when well employed is incurious. It is so well, that it is sure it will be well. It asks no questions of the Supreme Power. . . . Higher than the question of our duration is the question of our deservings. Immortality will come to such as are fit for it; and he who would be a great soul in future must be a great soul now. And (2) 'The moment we indulge our Affections, the earth is metamorphosed. There is no winter, and no night. All tragedies, all enemies vanish; all duties even; and nothing fills the proceeding Eternity, but the forms all radiant of Beloved Persons. Let the Soul be assured that somewhere in the Universe it shall rejoin its Friend, and it would be content and cheerful alone for a thousand years.'

So, Blessed Friend, farewell to meet again! Shall we not repeat thy own inspiring promise:—

The verdict, which accumulates
From lengthening scroll of human fates,
Voice of earth to earth returned,
Prayers of saints that only burned,
Saying, "What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain;
Hearts' love will meet thee again."

THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—The annual meeting of Convocation is summoned for Tuesday next. In addition to the usual election of officers, the paper contains notices of important business. The question of an increased representation of Convocation on the Senate, which has been already repeatedly discussed, is to be again brought forward by Dr. Pye-Smith and Mr. Hennell, B.A. In favour of such increased representation, and of the consequent diminution in the number of the Crown nominees, it has been urged that the present charge on the public purse of about £5,000 a-year is likely to be much reduced by new arrangements with regard to fees which will come fully into operation in 1883. Next follows a resolution (Mr. Nesbitt, M.A., and Dr. Curnow) relating to the question whether in future the tenure of office by senators shall be as now, for life, or for a term of years. The decision in regard to this question may possibly be affected by the fact that on the Senate of the Royal Irish University the representative members are to be elected for a limited term. A motion by Mr. McDowall, B.A., and Dr. Buchanan Baxter relates to the expediency of bringing before the City Companies' Commission the claims of the University to the funds of the Gresham Trust, which, it is alleged, might be turned to a good account by the London University, and made to subserve purposes more in accordance with the wishes and aim of Sir Thomas Gresham. Then there is to be the debate, adjourned from the January meeting, on the institution of fellowships to be conferred on eminently distinguished graduates. The proposed fellowships are, however, to be purely honorary, and not with a stipend of £400 a-year to each fellow, as in the Royal University of Ireland, which University, however, was alleged to be formed after the London model. The last motion is to be by Mr. Hennell, B.A., who seeks to obtain formal ratification of the alleged understanding by which representative members of the Senate have been chosen alternately from the faculties of art and laws and of medicine and science. This subject, it will be recollected, gave rise to a vigorous discussion last January, on the occasion of the candidature of Dr. S. Newth, Principal of New College, St. John's-wood. The appointment is also announced of Mr. F. V. Dickens, M.B., B.Sc., as assistant registrar, in place of Mr. H. N. Mosely, who was lately elected to the Linacre Professorship of Physiology at Oxford. For the assistant registrarship there were, it is understood, between thirty and forty candidates.

PARISIAN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—The first meeting of the Protestant Sunday Schools in Paris was held last week at the Cirque d'Hiver. About fifteen hundred children, besides thirty pastors, were present.

MR. H. PRICE COLLIER, of the last class from the Cambridge Divinity School, son of R. Laird Collier, of Birmingham, has been called to the pastorate of the first parish of Hingham, Massachusetts. Mr. Collier was born in Chicago, we believe, and spent his earlier years in that city.

Occasional Notes.

THE burial of Mr. Darwin in Westminster Abbey has not unnaturally led French journalists to draw comparisons very much in favour of England between the attitude of the Church in relation to science in this country and across the Channel. La France recalls the fact that Monsignor Dupanloup refused to sit in the Academy by the side of M. Littré, and wonders what the wits of the sacristy who have cracked so many jokes about Darwin and apes will think of the honour paid to the great naturalist in the Abbey Church of Westminster. It sorrowfully admits that the case of Mr. Bradlaugh proves that the House of Commons exacts a legal hypocrisy, but it sees in the honour paid to Mr. Darwin an event of good augury, justifying a hope that, in spite of official pietism, the liberty of the human conscience may ere long be recognised in London. It may be remarked that in Paris the strife between science and the Church is so bitter that not only would no French bishop have officiated at the burial of a man of science like Mr. Darwin, but if, by a miracle, such a prelate were to be found, his presence at the grave would be sufficient to ensure the absence of all scientific men from the ceremony.

WE announce with much pleasure that the University of Glasgow last week conferred the degree of LL.D. upon our valued friend the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, F.G.S., of Birmingham. This distinction is, no doubt, principally due to Mr. Crosskey's eminence as a student of geological science, and is no less deserved by him for his labours in the cause of education, especially during the last few years as Chairman of the School Management Committee of the Birmingham School Board.

A CAREFUL historical review in the Nonconformist and Independent leads to a conclusion which is calculated to excite surprise, though it seems well-founded. It is made abundantly clear that "Separatists," to which a more limited meaning has latterly been attached, was a generic term applicable to all persons who separated from the Church as by law established; and it appears to be no less plain that all such persons, in case of any conscientious scruples as to oaths, were permitted by the Toleration Act to express allegiance to the Crown by way of affirmation. Unless, then, the course of subsequent legislation, while professedly in the direction of liberty, has been practically of a disabling and retrogressive character, it would follow that Nonconformists of all designations "who scruple the taking of any oath," are within the category of the Act 21 and 22 Victoria, "every other person now by law permitted to make his solemn affirmation or declaration instead of taking an oath," and have, therefore, the right to avail themselves of the provisions of that Act.

WE are glad to notice that the fine portrait of Thackeray by Mr. Lawrence, which has been painted for the Reform Club, is now placed alongside of that of Lord Macaulay, who was also one of the early members of the Club. The likeness is considered admirable.

THE University of London have determined to prosecute with energy before the City of London Livery Companies' Commission their claim to administer the funds of Gresham College. For reasons, which are stated it is alleged that the founder, Sir Thomas Gresham, intended to found a University for London without limitation to the City proper; and it is urged that his bequest, as at present administered, does not subserve that purpose, being merely devoted to occasional lectures.

A WRITER in the Quarterly Review on the "Journals of Caroline Fox," gives expression, in a passing note, to a feeling which will be shared by a very large number of the public, when he utters a strong word as to the long delay in the issue of a biography of the late Rev. F. D. Maurice. The reviewer observes:—"We cannot refrain from taking this opportunity to express an indignant remonstrance against the neglect or mismanagement which has for ten years withheld a life of Mr. Maurice from the public. He was among the most eminent names in the theological and social life of a generation which is now rapidly passing away; but it would seem as if his friends had no care to publish a record of him while his memory and his influence are still fresh among us. We do not know what is the ostensible cause of such a delay, and we do not care. It is inexcusable under any circumstances."

THE following admirable précis of Darwinism, from the pen of Professor Fiske, of Harvard University, may be of interest, while the name of Charles Darwin is upon every lip. Professor Fiske says:—

That the Darwinian theory, when analysed, resolves itself into eleven propositions, nine of which are demonstrated truths; the tenth a corollary to the nine predecessors; the eleventh a perfectly legitimate postulate.

1. More organisms perish than survive.
2. No two individuals are exactly alike.
3. Individual peculiarities are transmissible.
4. Those individuals whose peculiarities bring them into close adaptation to the environment, survive and transmit their offspring.
5. The survival of the fittest thus tends to maintain an equilibrium between organisms and their environment.
6. The environment of every group of organisms is steadily, though slowly, changing.
7. Every group of organisms must, therefore, change in average character, under penalty of extinction.
8. Changes due to individual variation are complicated by the law that changes set up in one part initiate changes in another.
9. These are further complicated by the law that structures are nourished in proportion to their use.
10. The corollary follows:—That the changes thus set up and complicated must alter the specific character of any group of organisms.
11. [The only postulate] Let it be granted that, since the first appearance of life, time enough has elapsed to produce all the variation of species now seen.

THE stained glass window which has been erected in St. Margaret's, Westminster, as a memorial of William Caxton, the first English printer, was unveiled on Sunday. The central division of the window represents Caxton standing in front of his wooden press, and holding a printed book in his hand. In the centre of the tracery are the Arms of Kent, where Caxton was born, and in the panel at the base of the window are the arms of London, where he made his position in life, of Bruges, where he learnt the art of printing, and of Westminster, where he practised it in England. Canon Farrar preached on the occasion of the unveiling from the words, "Let there be light," and spoke of the advantages bestowed by the Press upon individuals and nations.

THE correspondence between Mr. Henry P. Cobb and Sir John Lubbock respecting the latter's opposition to the Government propositions on the "Closure," is published in full in the Spectator. We entirely concur with Mr. Cobb's criticisms of Sir John Lubbock's political action. We entirely disagree with him when he rather needlessly says that he would have preferred the Master of the Rolls to the present representative of London University, on the ground that "looking to the origin and traditions of the University, it would be more appropriate that we should have a representative who is not a member of the Church of England." Surely it is quite contrary to all sound principle to introduce the religious question into any purely political or academical elections. Now that the parliamentary disabilities of the Jews have long ceased to exist, there is no particular reason why a Jew should be preferred to a Christian as a representative of the University of London; and now that Nonconformists are admitted to the older Universities, there is no particular reason why a Nonconformist should be preferred to a Churchman. For our own part, if we inclined to give the preference to the Master of the Rolls, it would be simply on the ground of his being an eminent lawyer and a distinguished graduate of the University, while Sir John Lubbock is neither the one nor the other, and although a very accomplished man, can scarcely be regarded as a statesman. As a matter of fact, Sir John is a very broad Churchman indeed, and the interests of religious liberty are quite as safe in his hands as in those of the most enlightened Jew or Nonconformist. And we confess to some surprise that one who belongs to an old Unitarian family should ever have raised the question of theological opinion or ecclesiastical relations in connection with the representation of London University.

ON Wednesday Lord Shaftesbury presided over the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, at Exeter Hall. The report stated that, notwithstanding the eagerness with which the revised New Testament is welcomed, the home issues of the Scriptures have been 9,200, and the foreign issues have been 83,000 more than last year. The society had not yet decided as to the issue of the Revised Version, in view of the divided opinion with which it had been received.

ON Thursday evening, in the House of Lords, on the motion of the Earl of Dalhousie, a Bill to alter and amend the law relating to marriage with a deceased wife's sister was read a first time. The Canadian Parliament have just passed a similar Bill through all its stages by very large majorities, and it now only awaits the Royal Assent, which is not likely to be withheld.

WE are glad to hear that the Rev. Brooke Herford, of Chicago, has accepted an invitation from the congregation of Arlington-street Church, Boston, of which Dr. Channing and Dr. Gannett were for many years joint ministers, and afterwards the late Rev. J. W. Ware, son of the revered Henry Ware, D.D.

CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY.—This society, by invitation of the Lord Mayor, held its thirteenth annual meeting at the Mansion House on Tuesday afternoon, under the presidency (in the absence of the Lord Mayor) of the Marquis of Lansdowne, who in a short address remarked that wisely-directed charity consisted in supplying relief in cases where the load had become intolerable. To be effective, charity must be discriminating. Their object was not to supersede local effort, but rather to supervise and help it. From the report presented it appeared that there had been assisted by grants, loans, employment, and by letters for hospitals, 9,381. The number of persons assisted on recommendation to guardians, to institutions, or to private persons was 5,496. There had been dismissed as not requiring relief, cases for the poor law, or otherwise ineligible, 11,175. The Maylebone Committee had dealt with a total of over 14,000. Of the fund of £1,000 a-year placed at the disposal of the society by Mr. Fras. Peek for the relief of cases of distress brought to light by the visitors of the London School Board, only £557 was received and used in the past year. The number of cases sent by the School Board to district committees was 120. The Convalescent Committee gave frequent assistance in regard to vacancies at convalescent homes; 273 cases have been sent to homes. Inquiries had been made and reports issued in 1,779 cases. The Bishop of Bedford and Mr. E. N. Buxton advocated the claims of the enterprise.

ALTRINCHAM.—The Rev. James Edwin Odgers, M.A., now minister of the Toxteth Park Chapel, Liverpool, has accepted a cordial invitation to become the minister at Altrincham. The Rev. E. S. Howse, B.A., continues to occupy the pulpit at Altrincham until the end of June.

THE May number of the Bibliographer contains an article on Foreign Protestant Liturgies, in which "The White Bride Book," a Swedish service book given by the peasant to his betrothed, is described.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d. labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Reviews.

The Holiest Manhood and its Lessons for Busy Lives. Sermons preached in Barnes Church, by John Ellerton, M.A., Rector of Barnes. London, Macmillan. 1882.

Mild Orthodoxy describes in two words this volume of sermons. Jesus Christ is the prominent subject throughout. Certain aspects of his life and ministry are dwelt upon in succession from the visit of the magi to the infant Jesus, and his own visit to the temple when twelve years of age to his ascension into heaven. The character revealed in these various incidents and aspects gives the title to the volume—"The Holiest Manhood." Reference is frequently made to the Church lessons and formularies, and they are commended in a manner to show their suitableness and suggestiveness. Accordingly the sermons are an illustration of the Prayer Book as well as an exposition of the New Testament. Thus the very first sermon begins—"We are keeping to-day the oldest of Christian festivals—the manifestation or Epiphany of Christ to mankind; the shining forth of the Light of the world, by his infancy, in his childhood, at his baptism, by his miracles; for all these come before us in the course of the services of this day, and are dwelt upon more fully in those of the Sundays which take their name from this." And in the sermon on the baptism we read: "Our baptismal office speaks of God having by his Son's baptism sanctified the element of water to the mystical washing away of sin." These allusions are quite natural in sermons from a Churchman to his own congregation; but they lessen the interest which the book might otherwise have to a wider class. There is nothing special in these discourses. They are not above the average in any way. There is nothing striking in the thought or style; nothing, we should suppose, to distinguish them from those of the clergy generally who do not belong to any extreme party in the Church. Indeed, we cannot see any sufficient reason for their publication. It is not said that they are published by request, and not a single line of preface is given to throw any light upon the matter. There are eighteen discourses, and most of them are commendably short. The author's object seems to be to bring home to his hearers the Prayer Book lessons for the day in what he conceives to be their true religious teaching and significance.

As illustrations of the author's style and thought we quote one or two passages. The subject of the second sermon is Jesus in the temple, conversing with the doctors of the law.

We see in the figure of our Lord among the Doctors a type of that which he himself declared to be the highest wisdom, the blending of the old with the new. The law of gradual progression is stamped upon all that God does and says, in nature, in revelation, in the world without, the heart within. Creation, as Newton said long ago, does not go on by fits and starts; and the new creation of God in the soul is not, as foolish people fancy, a leap into perfection, but a growth in grace. It is not otherwise with God's revelation of himself to man. Christian faith was never meant to be a mere Protestantism—a mere revolt against the last religion that had gone before it. The Jewish Church was its nursing mother. The history of its growth is the history of Christ hearing and questioning the old sitters in Moses's seat who were passing away. And so we may say even of false religions. They have not been wholly false. Each has had something about which the Gospel might inquire, some one point of contact with the one true faith. Much more is this true of the divisions of Christianity itself—much more, because everywhere the Spirit of Christ goes on teaching his disciples. Every church, every sect is worth questioning, worth hearing. It exists upon the strength of some grain of truth, perhaps buried beneath a load of error. The true disciple learns to listen and to inquire.

In the discourse on the Baptism of Jesus we have the following:—

The two great truths which in his own baptism became the strength of Christ's earthly life are the two that we need to be the strength of ours. That we have a Father who loves us; that we have a Divine Spirit who is with us in the wilderness and in the city, in the lonely struggle with temptation, and in the open confession of truth and conflict with falsehood—it is faith in this which is spiritual life and strength; it is the loss of faith in this which means spiritual death. But let us remember that Christ won this faith by dedication of himself to his Father, and kept it by continual obedience to his Father. I do not here enter into the mystery of that divine nature which was the foundation and ground of his absolute sinlessness. I speak of him as a man among men, manifest in the flesh. And that manifestation was the manifestation of the day of his baptism. It was the Epiphany of perfect sympathy with his brethren, of deep hungering for righteousness, of filial faith in the living Father, of continued fellowship with the spirit who descended upon him.

In the discourse on the forty days in the wilderness we have this passage:—

It is in the spirit, and not the letter, that Christ's manhood is our pattern. If, then, his Galilean life speaks to us of loving service, and his life in Jerusalem of patient endurance under misrepresentation and wrong, and his ministry in Samaria of large-hearted charity; if even Gethsemane has its lesson for us of filial submission, and Calvary itself of victory in death, these forty days, too, have their message to our consciences. They may tell us of preparation to do life's work, and fight life's battle; of a strength drawn only and directly from communion with God, of a discipline through which even Christ, "though he were a Son," must learn obedience. And this message from the wilderness is all the more forcible, because it was the prelude to a life spent among men and for men, to days in which "there were many coming and going," and there was "no leisure so much as to eat." He who fasted in the wilderness was he who was to come eating and drinking, now at the village feast, now at the publican's supper, now at the Pharisee's Sabbath day banquet, now in the happy circle of loving friends and disciples at Bethany. He was to spend his time in the midst at once of eager followers and of unfriendly critics. His life was to be one which, in its intensity of work and of sympathy, tried to the uttermost every faculty and every nerve; and yet as we see it reflected in the Gospels it is ever calm, self-restrained, unspotted, the perfect image of God among men. Remembering all this, can we say that Christ in the wilderness sheds no light upon our lives? That there is nothing here from which it is possible for us in the present day to take example?

These extracts will sufficiently indicate the tone and spirit of these sermons. There is not much in them that a Unitarian who accepts the supernatural portions of the Gospel narrative need object to. It is true they contain frequent allusions to the divinity of Christ, and Jesus is frequently spoken of in terms which imply his divinity; but this is not the prominent topic. On the contrary, it is the humanity of Christ on which the author dwells, and hence the title he has given to the volume, "The Holiest Manhood." One of the ablest sermons in the book is that entitled "The Three Answers," that is, the three replies of Jesus to the Tempter—Man shall not live by bread alone. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve. Commenting on the last saying, towards the close of his discourse the preacher says:—

As distinct from worship our Master's saying bids us serve God, and Him only. "Divine service" has become to us in these days a technical name for the public worship of the congregation. But is not this a strange narrowing of those wide and mighty words? Is not your life, a layman's life, just as much "Divine service" as your prayers, if you will only make it so? Those whom we call "saints" in every age, in every walk of life, have been simply the men and women who have found the secret of making their lives a Divine service. Kings, students, warriors, merchants, working men, and their wives, people who stood alone, and people who had the help and love of others, these have learned that they could serve God and serve him only, even in a world in which good seemed ever entangled with evil, and evil seemed the ready, the sure, the safe way. But such Divine service must be exclusive service. Him only shalt thou serve, not Mammon; and so, too, not opinion, not conventional morals and customary practices; none of them must have the power over us; none of them must be allowed to plead against conscience. God must be all, or he is nothing to us. Him only shalt thou serve. C. F. B.

The Natural Truths of Christianity. Alex. Gardner. 1882.

Such a title as this at once takes us back to the days of the older Latitudinarians, whose services to the cause of spiritual religion we are at last beginning to appreciate. In this neat little volume we have a number of judicious selections from the "Select Discourses" of John Smith, M.A., of Cambridge, with an introduction by Matthew Arnold, edited by W. M. Metcalfe, who has given an interesting memoir. John Smith, some of our readers may need to be reminded, was one of the band of Cambridge Platonists, or latitude men, as in their own day they were called, whom Burnet well described as those "who at Cambridge studied to propagate better thoughts, to take men off from being in parties, or from narrow notions, from superstitious conceits, and fierceness about opinions." Placed between the sacerdotal religion of the Laudian clergy on the one side, as Mr. Matthew Arnold adds, and the notional religion of the Puritans on the other, "they saw the sterility, the certain doom of both—saw that stand permanently such developments of religion could not, inasmuch as Christianity was not what either of them supposed, but was a temper, a behaviour. Their immediate recompense was a religious isolation of two centuries." The Select Discourses of John Smith, collected and published after his death, are much the most considerable work left to us by this Cambridge school. His spiritual brother, "the ever memorable Mr. John Hales, of Eton," must certainly be classed with the Latitudinarians, although he was at Oxford, not Cambridge. The grand merit of the "Select Discourses" is that they insist on the profound natural truth of Christianity, and thus base it on the ground which will not crumble under our feet. Mr. Matthew Arnold characteristically adds:—"I have often thought that if candidates for orders were simply, in preparing for their examination, to read and digest Smith's great discourse 'On the Excellency and Nobleness of True Religion,' together with M. Reuss's 'History of Christian Theology at the Time of the Apostles,' and nothing further except the Bible itself, we might have, perhaps, a hope of at last getting as our national guides in religion a clergy which could tell its bearings and steer its way, instead of being, as we now see it, too often conspicuously at a loss to do either." The great discourse above mentioned is given in full in this volume, together with copious selections classified under the heading "The True Way of Attaining Divine Knowledge," "Superstition," "Atheism," "The Immortality of the Soul," "Prophecy," "Legal and Evangelical Righteousness," &c. It is astonishing how simple is the style, considering the stilted phraseology current in that age, and how entirely the whole spirit of these discourses accords with the genius of Liberal Christianity. There is a delightful mixture of Christian philosophy and poetry in John Smith's writings, and it is a significant indication of the power of Protestant dogmatism in this country, that his influence, so great in his own age, is only now beginning to be renewed. Mr. Metcalfe has performed his part with considerable judgment, and has prefixed an interesting memoir. We trust with him that this little volume will revive a knowledge of the school of writers to which John Smith belonged, and that the demand for it will be sufficient to induce the editor to prepare a companion to it from the writings of Whichcote, Henry More, Cudworth, Hales, Culverwel, &c.

The Westminster Review. Trübner and Co.

The first place in the current number is given to an article on "Epicurus and Lucretius," a continuation of the series of scholarly studies which have appeared during the last year or two in this Review. The Reviewer sketches the personal history of Epicurus in order to illustrate the manner in which his system seems to have been gradually built up. After comparing the systems of Epicurus and Lucretius and the characteristic excellences and defects of their philosophy the writer remarks:—

The distinctive features of Epicureanism have, in truth, never been copied, nor are they ever likely to be copied, by any modern system. It arose, as we have seen, from a combination of circumstances, which will hardly be repeated in the future history of thought. Just as sandstone is turned into slate by the heat and pressure of molten granite, so also the mighty systems of Plato and Aristotle, coming into contact with the irreligious, sensual, empirical, and sceptical side of Attic thought, forced it to assume that sort of laminated texture which characterises the theoretical philosophy of Epicurus. And, at the very same moment, the disappearance of all patriotism and public spirit from Athenian life allowed the older elements of Athenian character, its amiable egoism, its love of frugal gratifications, its aversion from purely speculative interests, to create a new and looser bond of social union among those who were indifferent to the vulgar objects of ambition, but whom the austere doctrines of Stoicism had failed to attract."

This is the only article of the number devoted to a subject of a purely literary and philosophical character.

The next paper, on "Ants," points out that modern research in this very curious and interesting department of natural history has vindicated the once discredited claims of Solomon as an accurate and careful observer of the insect whose industry and providence he commended so highly as an example to the sluggard. A mass of information is given, embodying the observations of Sir John Lubbock and other observers; and we are reminded that Darwin was an acute observer of the habits of ants, as he was of earthworms.

In the next article we have a discussion of the well-worn "Fair Trade Movement." The writer considers it "matter rather for rejoicing than for regret that the National Fair Trade League has brought to a focus all the discontent with our commercial policy which had previously vented itself in the advocacy of reciprocity or the denunciation of isolated Free Trade." The conclusion arrived at is, that, on the whole, "an examination of the proposals and arguments of the Fair Trade League does not furnish any sufficient reasons for departing from the free trade policy which has been adopted in the country in obedience to the dictates of science, and endorsed by the results of experience."

The article on "Fires in Theatres" is, of course, suggested by the terrible catastrophe at Vienna, and after giving an historical account of the destruction of various metropolitan theatres in the course of this century, the writer makes various suggestions respecting the construction and situation of these public buildings.

Under the heading "The Napoleonidæ" we have in an interesting and concise form an account of the genealogy of the extraordinary Bonaparte family. The writer seems to think that the present representative of the family, Prince Napoleon, "will yet play the rôle of a democratic Cæsar," and remarks that in that case "he will probably stamp his coins with 'Napoléon Empereur' on the one side, and 'République Française' on the other, as the great Emperor did at the beginning of his reign."

The closing article of the number is on "The Ordnance Survey," which is both readable and instructive. The writer points out that the uncompleted undertaking has already cost the nation £4,984,000, and that the expenditure under this head shows a tendency to increase in a way which demands inquiry.

We have reserved to the last our notice of what is to us the most interesting and important article in the number, that entitled "Ecclesiastical Migrations." It deals with such remarkable instances of migration from one Church to another, as Cardinal Newman, Mr. Suffield, and Count Campello; and also the case of Bishop Thirlwall, who forsook the Bar for the pulpit, and his early latitudinarianism for a scholarly Orthodoxy. The article tempts to voluminous quotation, and it confirms the opinion we have always entertained and often expressed respecting Newman's "deep-seated scepticism, which was one cause alike of his uncertain utterances and of his joining the Church of Rome," as Thirlwall and Archbishop Trench so clearly saw. It has been well said by the late J. B. Mozley that in his "Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine" he asserts the ultra-liberal theory of Christianity, and arriving at last at the era of revelation, he has to face the awkward result of his own argument that the fundamental doctrines of Christianity were not in existence then, and a whole Socinian view of early Christian theology meets him. Count Campello's career has been lately reviewed in our own columns, and we can only afford space for a few passages relating to our friend Mr. Suffield. Taking as the text of his remarks Mr. Suffield's various discourses and pamphlets, the reviewer remarks that though Count Campello has made great sacrifices for conscience sake, Mr. Suffield has made by far the greater. Count Campello has joined one of the largest and most influential, Mr. Suffield the most advanced section of one of the smallest and the most unpopular of Protestant Churches [the Unitarian], though it is the one whose principles seem without adequate recognition to be more and more leaving all the others; and he has found, we fear, little sympathy or fellowship from the ministers and members of Orthodox Protestant Churches, even though they be Nonconformists." Reviewing his career as traced by himself in his own publications, the writer adds:—"Mr. Suffield, more logical than his brother seceder (Count Campello), from the first refused to 'prop up eternal matter with false and entangled machinery,' and at once embraced the creed of Christianity as it came from its Founder." The article concludes with a pleasing sketch of the career of the eminently "learned and judicious" Bishop Thirlwall.

A number of more than usual interest and variety is brought to a close with a comprehensive review of the literature of the quarter, and a kind of Open Council paper on "India and our Colonial Empire."

The Magazines.

Fraser's Magazine continues the serial story "The Lady Maud," which is written with no ordinary power; and the other pleasant story of German life, "Exchange No Robbery," by Miss Betham-Edwards, is brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Professor S. R. Gardiner, reviewing that highly-popular novel "John Inglesant," easily shows with his wealth of historical knowledge that the author has but a superficial acquaintance with the time of Charles I., and that his characters could not have developed themselves in the England of that age. "John Inglesant" himself, he maintains, could not have existed even in Utopia. John Dennis gives a pleasant sketch of "Charles Lamb and his Friends" from a very different point of view from Carlyle's acrid criticism. Mr. J. Ashcroft Noble gives a really charming account of "A Pre-Raphaelite Magazine"—to wit, the Germ, the forgotten organ of Hunt, Millais, the Rossettis, Woolners, and others of the P. R. B.—magical letters which are not to be taken for Prize-ring Brotherhood. In an article on "The Public Worship Regulation Act" the Rev. Sir G. V. Cox, looking upon the whole question from the extreme Liberal point of view, shows conclusively that it would be better if this Act, by which the Bishops sought in vain to put down Ritualism, had never been thought of. The remaining articles are "Irregular Warfare," by Alfred Aylward, referring especially to the recent campaigns in South Africa; "A Visit to the Queen of Burmah," an amusing diary, by Mrs. Rowett; "Life in Old Florence," a pleasant antiquarian sketch, by J. Theodore Bent; and "The New Departure in Ireland," written in the interests of moderate Liberalism. The number is one of more than usual interest.

Good Woods open with a new and promising story of domestic life, by Anthony Trollope, the scene of which is laid in our dear old city of Exeter, in or near which the novelist spent his earliest years. Mrs. Oliphant continues her story entitled "Lady Jane" with increasing interest; and there is also the continuation of Mr. C. Gibbon's tale "The Golden Shaft." Mr. R. W. Dale has an effective sermon-essay on "Christian Worldliness," and our old friend "A. K. H. B." discourses in his pleasant rambling style "Concerning Storms," referring to storms in the spiritual rather than in the physical universe. By the way, what right has "A. K. H. B." to crib from "Friends in Council" the name of one of the interlocutors, "Milverton"? Among the other papers, which call for no special notice, are "Plants without Earth," by R. Heath, giving an account of the gardening labours of M. Dumesnil, of Rouen; "Some Notes of Ancient Egypt," by the Rev. Harry Jones; "Sicilian Days," concluding Mr. A. J. C. Hare's charmingly written and charmingly illustrated sketch of travel in the far South; and "Watching the Weather on Mount Nevis," an illustrated account of meteorological observation in the far North, by Clement L. Wragge.

The Day of Rest, always attractive in its handsome cover and rather too gaudy coloured engravings, continues Hesba Stretton's attractive tale, "The Lord's Pursebearer," and among other well-written papers are "The Tenderness of the Bible," a brief homily by Dr. Eustace Conder; "To the North Cape and Back," an illustrated story of travel, by the Rev. J. F. Buckler; "Sundays in Brittany," by C. Rupell; "A Minor Prelude," a well-told religious tale, and the always attractive "Children's Pages."

The Journal of the National Indian Association contains a valuable article on "Education in Bombay," by R. M. Macdonald. The curious tale entitled, "The Second Daughter-in-law," translated from a native writer, illustrating Indian customs and prejudices, is brought to a conclusion, and by way of indirect practical commentary upon it, the writer, M. S. Knight, of Calcutta, subjoins an original and very interesting article on "The Changes in Indian Social Life," showing the effects upon Hindu society of the introduction of Western ideas and Western institutions. There is a review of Sir William Temple's "Men and Events in my Time in India," and various articles of Indian and personal intelligence.

The Magazine of Art has for its frontispiece a fine engraving of Josef Israel's pathetic picture "Alone," a peasant widower, sitting in an attitude of profound grief before the corpse of his aged wife. Under the heading, "A Painter of the Streets," is a portrait of J. G. Brown, and engravings of two of his principal works. Among the other papers are "A Man of Culture" (Cinque Cento), by the Rev. M. Creighton; "Queen Anne Plate," by William Cripps; "The Great Classical Fallacy," by Grant Allen, with engravings of some of the chief specimens of that hideous eighteenth century school of art; "Glass Painting in the Fourteenth Century," by Lewis F. Day; "A Rose-water Raphael" (Francois Bouchet), by A. Egmont Hake; and "The Art of Savages," by Andrew Lang; all with abundant illustrations of the best quality.

Cassell's Family Magazine continues the two serial stories, "No Proof" and "Ralph Raeburn's Trusteeship." There is a pleasant descriptive paper "On the Shropshire Meres," with illustrations, by G. Christopher Davies. Among other attractive articles are "Our Astronomical Society," a complete story, by John Gray; "The Art of Water-Colour Landscape Painting;" "The Life of the Non-Commissioned Officer," by one who has served in the ranks; "A Newspaper Sub-Editor's Office and Work;" "Business Girls in America;" "How Shall I Invest my Savings;" and "On Sleep and Nervous Unrest," by a Family Doctor.

We have also received:—

Cassell's Illustrated Bible, Part I. of a re-issue of this popular work, with its original very attractive coloured illustrations; we cannot say much for the wood-engravings.

The Illustrated Book of Canaries, Part I., also a re-issue of a popular and brilliantly illustrated work.

Cassell's Illustrated Universal History, Part VIII.

The Family Physician, Part XXVIII.

The New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXVI.

The Bible Educator, edited by Dean Plumptre, Part II.

An American publisher has brought out an edition of Mr. Ruskin's "Modern Painters," in five volumes, at one dollar a volume. It is stated that they contain all the woodcuts, but none of the plates of the original edition.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Go where you may, in every country and in all climes, persons will be found who have a ready word of praise for this Ointment. For chaps, chafes, scalds, bruises, and sprains, it is an invaluable remedy; for bad legs caused by accident or cold it may be confidently relied upon for effecting a sound and permanent cure. In cases of puffed ankles, erysipelas, and rheumatism, Holloway's Ointment gives the greatest comfort by reducing the inflammation, cooling the blood, soothing the nerves, adjusting the circulation, and expelling the impurities. This Ointment should have a place in every nursery. It will cure all those manifold skin affections which, originating in childhood, gain strength with the child's growth.

ORVILLE DEWEY.

Harper's Weekly contains this tribute to Dr. Dewey:—

Dr. Dewey was the friend of Channing, and preached in his pulpit in Boston during the two years of Channing's absence in Europe. But the genius of the two men as preachers was widely different. Calm and intellectual, like colourless light, the limpid and restrained flow of Channing's discourse made a new channel for the religious life and thought of his time; while, palpitating with emotion, Dewey, with fervid and tender appeal, demonstrated the power and the consolation as well as the reasonableness of religion. Such preaching had never been heard in New York. Jonathan Edwards, and Whitefield, and Summerfield, and more recently John Mason, had been the great pulpit orators. Dewey blended something of them all. The force of Edwards, the fire of Whitefield, the sweet tenderness of Summerfield, the conviction of Mason, might all be traced in his discourse. Judges and merchants, men and women of all pursuits, went to church with new ardour, and learned that in the Church Universal there are many mansions. Dr. Dewey was the intimate friend of Bryant and of Miss Sedgwick, with whose names his own will be always associated with the beautiful Berkshire hills. He was born among them in Sheffield, the town next to Great Barrington, where Bryant lived for many years, and where he was married. To those hills Dr. Dewey returned when his work was done; and there, slowly declining, but still with singular mental vigour, his peaceful life wore away. Dr. Osgood succeeded him in the Church of the Messiah. Then the old building was transformed into a theatre; and the society built the fine church on Park Avenue and Thirty-fourth-street, where Robert Collyer now preaches. But, amid all the changes of the society, one thing did not change, and that was love and respect for the old pastor and famous preacher. His memory and his fame are the cherished traditions of his church and his denomination, and there are those still in the full activity of life to whom the death of the patriarch is the loss of a beloved personal friend.

R. W. EMERSON.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—Certainly Walt Whitman is a poor substitute for Longfellow, and as for Emerson, who is there of living Americans that can aspire to be considered his successor? "The gaunt, long-limbed man with the thin features and the hatchet nose," as he was described by one of his admirers, was a product of New England which so far seems to be almost unique. His style, sometimes obscure, and yet apparently so simple, with its sentences which, as a listener once said, "seemed to be written on separate scraps of paper which were put into a bag and then read out at random as they came to hand," was nevertheless peculiarly fitted to embody the subtle and profound teachings of one of the most original minds of our age. In his death American literature has sustained the greatest blow it has yet had to experience, and the sense of loss will be felt almost as keenly in this country as in New England, which rightly glories in his fame.

The Times writes:—With his death a great break has occurred. To those who knew him it will be as if a landmark hitherto visible in all their journeys had gone down behind the horizon. The present generation has lost the strongest—nay, almost the sole—tie which binds it to the Boston or Concord of Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, Alcott, Channing, and Theodore Parker. His friend Longfellow gained the public ear in a way which Mr. Emerson did not, and his death was the object of regret by many who knew little of the latter. But we do not know that the silence of the refined muse of the former will be deplored more than the disappearance of this "American Plato," as some of his disciples, with curious infelicity, described Mr. Emerson. If a philosopher at all, he was such only in the large sense in which his favourite Montaigne was one. Some of his best essays are a jumble of pretty things—so many of the choicest pearls which have never been strung. It is only by a mental illusion on the part of his admirers, similar to that which enables one to discern an articulate voice in the sighing of the wind, that one can find in his glittering and discursive epigrams a connected series of thoughts. But, dismissing a view of his genius which is put forward only by ill-advised friends, we find in him an essayist of the highest order—an essayist as brilliant as Hazlitt, with powers of drawing by a word subtle moral distinctions which La Bruyère could not surpass, and with unflinching affinities to all that is best in nature. He has very varied charms, and plenty of surprises are in store for his readers. It is not given to all students of literature to admire Mr. Emerson's frosty poetry, or to discern the difference between its wingless motion and obscure and awkward prose. But no one can help admiring the acuteness and brilliancy of his "English Traits" or the subtle sympathy of his essay on Montaigne. The world will not be agreed as to the exact nature of the literary merits of Mr. Emerson. But on all hands it will be admitted that his country has lost a man of genius of whom it might well be proud, and his generation a teacher whom it cannot replace.

JOHN NELSON DARBY.

The Liverpool Mercury writes:—Mr. John Nelson Darby died on Saturday. To the bulk of the population Mr. John Nelson Darby was unknown. To a section of religionists, however, he was almost a god. He was one of the founders of the greatest lights of the Plymouth Brethren, and led as many of the body as would follow him into what the ecclesiastical authorities call deadly heresy. The first idea of the Plymouth Brethren was comprehension. There were to be no more sects, no more confusions of many doctrines, but all were to be united in the worship of one name, and by personal sacrifice were to show their loyalty to one king. The movement had a wonderful effect, and it did produce a sacrificing spirit which no one could but admire. But when a brand-new sect had been started to unite all the others, a controversy arose about the nature of the divine humanity, and Mr. John Darby took the lead on one side, Mr. John Newton being on the other. Not possessing the ecclesiastical mind, I am unable to state very clearly what was the exact issue. One side, however, said that the Founder of the Faith was peccable but sinless, the other that he was impeccable as well as sinless. Mr. Darby took the side of impeccability, and charged his opponents with teaching the heresy for which Irving was turned out of the Church of Scotland. He, on his side, was charged with denying the humanity of the Supreme Man. The result upon the comprehension theory was disastrous. Still professing their belief in the unity of the Church, the Derbyites excommunicated right and left. They got a prophetic system of their own, and spent their time in trying to make the Scriptures a fortune-telling book. The Newtonites did the same. More quarrels arose. The very people who had made unity their watchword took to turning one another out, until every three persons formed a separate Church. Mr. John Newton came to London and founded a Church here, which has since been dispersed. Mr. John Darby has had followers in nearly every town in England and Ireland. His death removes a sincere man of generous sympathies but intensely narrow mind from the religious world. His old opponent, Mr. John Newton, it may be added, no less sincere, more learned and no less generous, and hardly less narrow of intellect, is now rarely able to preach. They taught a new doctrine, which, had they been mutually tolerant, would have left its mark on the life of the country; but by their quarrels, and the quarrels which grew out of their quarrels, they made their cause ridiculous, and they provoked a spirit which makes the name of a "Plymouth Brother" stand for utter narrowness.

DARWINISM.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—It sprang up like Jonah's gourd, till its branches overshadowed almost every region of scientific and philosophic thought. In the sciences which deal with human life, especially, it introduced a totally new set of conceptions. Our ideas of ethics, of politics, of history, of sociology were all largely modified by it, often even revolutionised. Man was no longer an archangel ruined, as Pascal called him, but a descendant of savages and of still lower ancestors, struggling slowly upward by his own unaided effort to such heights of knowledge and of disinterested work for right's sake as Charles Darwin himself so nobly exemplified for us. To this new conception all our social and historical thinking had to be adapted. A new teacher had taught us how to know ourselves. His work inaugurated a fresh outburst of thinking and speculating on all such subjects. Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Tylor applied his doctrine to the early stages of man's history. Writers like Mr. Bagehot and Mr. Leslie Stephen employed it to elucidate politics and ethics. Professor Bain remodelled all his psychology to suit the new ideas. Mr. Herbert Spencer interwove the survival of the fittest into the vast and all-embracing fabric of his system of Synthetic Philosophy. There was no science which was not tinctured in greater or less degree by the Darwinian spirit. Geologists and paleontologists applied it to the past history of the earth; ethnologists to the races of men; archaeologists to the interpretation of the oldest human relics; philologists to the development of language; historians to the recorded events of European and Asiatic annals. Even in astronomy, it suggested new conceptions as to the life and duration of planets; in chemistry it led to fresh notions about the nature of organic compounds. Where it did not act directly it acted indirectly. Trickling and filtering down to the masses, it permeated even the daily press, the current political and social ideas, the beliefs and aspirations of the sects and the Churches. Those who themselves explicitly reject the Darwinian creed yet cannot possibly escape from many of its implications. It runs through almost all the best thought of our time; it tinges our unformed public notions; it reappears under a hundred disguises in works on law and history, in political speeches and religious discourses, in artistic theories and vague social speculations. Our very novels and poems are full of latent Darwinian germs. If we try to think ourselves away from it we must think ourselves away entirely from our own age—away alike from Tennyson and George Eliot, from Tyndall and Huxley, from Maine and Galton, nay, even from Freeman, from Thomson, from Balfour Stewart, from Helmholtz—perhaps even in no very far-fetched sense from Bismarck, from Gladstone. Whoever builds at all must build largely from materials supplied by Darwin or by Darwinians. Whoever deals with social forces must deal with forces greatly moulded and remodelled by Darwinian ideas. The physician who wholly neglected Darwinian results would fall behind in the race, would, in fact, be naturally selected for quiet extinction; the statesman who wholly overlooked the political and ethical implications of the Darwinian beliefs, the strength of the new intellectual factors introduced by Darwinism, would be incapable of really guiding the political thought of to-day. Whoever does not definitely and consciously acknowledge the magnitude of the change, at least implicitly and unconsciously acknowledges it. And this change is more due to Mr. Darwin than to any other single person. No great revolution was ever wholly, or even largely, wrought by one man; it implies the co-operation of thousands who are ready and fit to work beside their leader for the accomplishment of a common design; but it is seldom indeed that so great a revolution has been so largely guided and directed by a solitary thinker as this one has been guided and directed by Charles Darwin. His life-work gave the final impetus which set all this mass of thought and action seething and fermenting in every direction. It was fitting that the remains of so great a man should find their last resting-place in Westminster Abbey; and Englishmen may reflect with pride that they lie there at last beside the dust of the only other philosopher in the past whose revolutionary effect on thought can at all be compared with his own. No other country in the world can point to two such names at once as Darwin and Newton.

The Guardian, after speaking of Darwin as one of the few great thinkers of mankind, writes:—

That such speculations should create, when they were first broached, a widespread panic among religious minds, was nothing more than natural. They were certainly new, and they seemed to be in direct conflict with old and cherished beliefs. We did not share the panic, and endeavoured at the time to suggest reflections which might remove or appease it; and the result has proved that our judgment was not incorrect. The new truths of biology have been gradually assimilated by religion and found harmless, as the new truths of geology were assimilated a generation ago, and the new truths of astronomy in a more distant past. But it would be as vain as it is unnecessary to deny that our theology also has been influenced by the new truths thus brought to bear upon it. They have in all these cases compelled us to discriminate more sharply between the divine revelation and its human interpretation; and they have in all of them driven us back more effectually from the letter to the spirit, from the outer husk to the inner kernel, from the shape and fashion of the clothing to the solid substance which it encloses. We have learnt from them to feel more and more that, while it is all-important to believe in a Creator and Ruler, it is of less moment to ascertain the precise methods by which His act of creation was accomplished, or by which His providence is now working; and that so long as we are convinced that "it is He Who hath made us and not we ourselves," and that He hath given to all his creatures "a law which shall not be broken," we may pursue without anxiety the speculations offered by science as to the manner in which we were made, or the laws by which the present aspect of the universe has been evolved. We need not qualify our admiration for the high intellectual qualities of the great thinker who has just passed away, by any anxiety about the legitimate result of his speculations, or by any misgivings lest the sacred pavement of the Abbey should cover a secret enemy of the Faith. Let us rather see in the funeral honours paid within those holy precincts to our greatest naturalist, a happy trophy of the reconciliation between Faith and Science.

CHARLES DARWIN.

The Jewish Chronicle writes:—The death of Charles Darwin removes from the world one of the greatest minds it has ever possessed. Amid the first flush of novelty the views associated with his name were regarded as adverse to all revealed religion, and the injudicious conduct of some of his followers tended to confirm the impression. But calmer reflection has shown the unfounded character of this prejudice, and by his burial in Westminster Abbey the Church of England has shown, with a wise toleration, that it no longer shares in the fears so widely expressed on the publication of the "Origin of Species." With regard to the attitude of Judaism towards the new truths brought to light by Mr. Darwin, our religion has nothing to fear on being confronted with truths, provided only that it be clearly ascertained that they are truths. No one was more conscious than Mr. Darwin that his views were unable to penetrate the mystery of mysteries, the origin of life and mind. Assuming them, the Darwinian theory could explain their development, but their origin could at best only be removed further back in the scale of creation. Thus the Jews of the world can pay their sincere tribute to the great thinker who has just passed away in the rare happiness of seeing his thought ruling the speculation of mankind. Mr. Darwin had only to treat of Jews in their scientific aspects in his works, and we thus find in the "Descent of Man" the uniformity of Jewish biotatic phenomena quoted as an illustration of heredity. In the same work he likewise notices the remarkable inequality of male and female births among the Jews. Tattooing among the Jews, and their early use of flint tools, were also noticed by the indefatigable observer. Whatever be the ultimate fate of his speculation, his unwearied industry in the search for truth, his modesty and simplicity, his domestic virtues and unselfish devotion to science will always shine as a bright example in the Temple of Truth, at whose shrine men of all creeds should worship.

THE HIBBERT TRUST.

The Times of last Thursday week, in an article on the Hibbert Lectures, writes:—

The Hibbert Trust is a fund of which a certain portion is annually devoted to the maintenance of a course of lectures on some subject connected with the historical study of religion. The field of study is a wide one, and its cultivation in the present day is marked by special characteristics. Only lately has it been customary, or even possible, to talk of the "science" of religion; and even if the thing itself has existed in any real sense, it has been chiefly in the form of the old theological dualism, which discerns two antagonistic principles of good and evil in the universe, and confidently assigns all religions but one to the influence of the latter. But in these days, when science extends its domains in all directions, it is impossible that the religious phenomena of mankind should escape its cognizance. Religious beliefs are facts of human nature which can be studied in their origins and relations. Hence arises the conception of a science of religion, of a method of investigation which studies the historical evolution of religious phenomena, which traces the growth and meaning of ceremonies and beliefs, which does, in fact, for religion what comparative anatomy and paleontology do for animal structure, and geology does for the study of the earth's surface. It is the study of religion pursued in this sense which the Hibbert Lectures are designed to promote.

Professor Kuenen's lectures are a striking example of the modern scientific method of proceeding. The ancient records of Israel are investigated in the light of a searching internal criticism as well as of a minute study of those collateral sources of information which modern Oriental research has brought to light. It is only by free inquiry and criticism of this kind that science can hope to advance; each successive student adds something to its data and corrects a few of the errors of his predecessors. There is nothing infallible in the results obtained, and in such an inquiry as that one which Professor Kuenen is engaged they must often appear to be meagre, hypothetical, and unsatisfying; but the method is nevertheless identical in spirit with that whereby science has achieved its noblest results in other and less difficult fields of inquiry.

To those who have been accustomed to regard the ancient records of Israel in the light of the traditional exegesis the very conception of the modern method of criticism must be at once startling in its aims and disappointing in its results. The "Yahweh," whose gradual evolution in the religious consciousness of Israel is traced by Professor Kuenen, presents certainly a very different conception from that which is so familiar to the uninstructed reader of the English Bible. But startling as the contrast may be, the only question which a wise man will ask himself is, which conception is truer in fact and better sustained by such evidence as can be adduced? It is the merit of the Hibbert Lectures that they force such questions as this on the attention of thinking men who are too busy or too little inclined to watch the course of modern theological inquiry. For whether we are aware of it or not, or whether we like it or not, the fact is indisputable, that the whole spirit of theological criticism is undergoing a profound transformation. Whatever of novelty there may be in the conclusions arrived at by Professor Kuenen, his method is only that which has already produced abundant results in the hands of continental critics, and has by no means been neglected by the more scientific theologians in this country. The science of religion is, however, still an unfamiliar term in this country, except among professed students, and it would probably still be regarded by many as a mischievous and misleading expression. But the science exists, nevertheless, its students are ardent and devoted, and its method is unassailable. To ignore its existence and to deride its results is easy, but cannot in the long run be prudent; nor can England afford to hold aloof from ideas which have already taken firm hold of the cultivated intelligence of Europe.

ENGLISH THEISM.

The Calcutta Liberal (organ of the Brahmo Somaj) writes:—

Mr. Tyssen published in the Theistic Review what he called the "Thirty-nine Articles of English Theism." These are about to be reprinted in England. Before giving them to the public he has thought it desirable to collect the opinions of well-known theistic preachers and writers. Mr. Voysey approves of his articles, but he does not agree with those that relate to Jesus Christ. He thinks he goes too far in his recognition of Jesus. Mr. Sufield approves also, but "believing the law of cosmic providential development, he should erase the words in Art. I., wherein the eternity of matter is denied." On the suggestion of a Theist having his children baptised by the service of the Established Church, Mr. Dean, minister of the Unitarian church at Walsall, writes:—"This revolts my moral sense. A Theist ought never to tamper with his conscience, even for the worldly advantage of his children." Mr. Charles Hargrove, Unitarian minister at Leeds, says:—"I do not believe the Universe to be the work of God, nor even, admitting this, do I find in it proof of an Almighty, all-wise, and all-good worker. Indeed, of the goodness of God I find little or no evidence save in the hearts of his Christs." Mr. Francis W. Newman writes:—

"I deprecate your articles.

"1. Because they are immensely too diffuse and too complex. The Moslem creed has a great advantage in being extremely short.

"2. Because they are thirty-nine. This, instead of an advantage, is to me an objection. The Rev. Sydney Smith called the Anglican articles "Forty stripes save one." Why should we expose ourselves to this taunt?

"3. Because they are argumentative. Argument is out of place and even mischievous. Some may (as in fact I do) strongly and totally reject argument, without positively rejecting the conclusion.

"4. Because they imply that Isaiah, Hezekiah, Jeremiah, and all the Hebrews under the monarchy do not deserve the name 'Theists'; for you make a belief in a future life cardinal to Theism, while the Hebrew prophets and kings of that age disbelieved it.

"5. Because they contain assertions concerning the historical Jesus which are and will be open to erroneous diversity of opinion among Theists. In short, no assertion whatever concerning any individual man has any rightful place at all in a creed.

"For all these reasons I regard your thirty-nine articles as bad in idea and plan as well as bad in detail. They are an ingenious trap to involve Theists in endless, hopeless, and pernicious divisions."

THE RATIONALISTS AND EVANGELICALS OF PARIS.

The Nonconformist and Independent of April 19th contains an interesting letter from Dr. Pressensé, the Liberal Evangelical minister and Deputy, which gives so clear an account, from an impartial spectator, of the present condition of parties in the Reformed Church of Paris that we transfer the greater part of it to our columns:—

The question of the reorganisation of the Reformed Church of Paris, which has been so long pending, has just received its solution from the Government. As this solution has produced great excitement in the evangelical party, it is important that all should understand its real scope, the more that it marks a fresh era in the history of that Church, and constrains even those hitherto most opposed to disestablishment to desire it as a boon.

Up to the present, the Reformed Church of Paris has formed only one ecclesiastical district, having one Council or Presbytery appointed by general election without any division into sections; and although the district contained in fact five parishes, none of these parishes possessed any autonomy whatever. The Council or Presbytery thus selected constituted, with the Church of Versailles, and three other churches of lesser importance, the Consistory of the district. As a matter of course, a Presbytery so weighty as this was entirely master of the situation. Its majority was overwhelming. This state of things raised no serious difficulty so long as the two religious parties—the evangelical and the latitudinarian—were nearly balanced. But the case was changed when the evangelical party gained a decided predominance, especially after it had obtained from a Conservative Ministry legal sanction to the electoral conditions voted in the Synod of 1872, which practically excluded almost all of the opposite school.

From 1873 to the present time the Presbytery and the Consistory in which the evangelical section was dominant have refused to give any satisfaction at all to their opponents. When the latitudinarians lost the last pastors who represented their views, these were replaced by ministers of the strictly orthodox school, so that the congregations were compelled to open chapels, supported by private subscription, that they might not be altogether deprived of a ministry with which they were in sympathy. Obviously the cord was being drawn too tight, and must break in the end.

As soon as the Government passed from the Conservatives to the decided Republicans, it was easy to foresee that the position of the Reformed Church of Paris would soon be materially changed. The first charge that took place (and, in our view, the most important), was the abolition of the religious conditions imposed upon the electors by the vote of the Synod of 1872. After this alteration the whole of the rationalist party in the Church was free to take part in the elections. But this did not satisfy it. The concentration of the whole power in the hands of one Presbytery gave too much influence to the leaders of the evangelical party who were in the majority. The rationalist party has, therefore, long been demanding a division of this great Church into several Presbyteries. It argued, rightly enough, that in the present organisations of the Church of Paris the law which fixes the number of laymen who should have seats in the Presbytery was not observed, for that number was exceeded. The evangelicals, on the other hand, opposed this demand of the rationalists, by bringing forward an article of the Constitution of the Reformed Church which provides that only one such Church can exist in a town. The Government has just solved the question by a decision of the Council of State, which is purely a deliberative body. By a decree of March 27 last, the Reformed Church is divided into eight parishes, each parish to have its own Presbytery, with one central parish, the Oratoire du Louvre; and all these together are to form the Consistory of the Department of the Seine while a second Consistory is formed at Versailles, with the neighbouring churches.

The rationalists are jubilant, anticipating an easier triumph over the divided forces of their adversaries; or, at least, hoping to carry the day for the first time in one or two parishes. The evangelical party, on the other hand, is highly indignant at a decision which they have tried so much to avert.

It seems to me impossible, however, to ignore the mistakes of the evangelical party in the Consistory of Paris. It has abused its power by refusing to make any concessions to the opposite party in the Church, and to allow it either pastors or places of worship. It is idle to appeal in defence of such conduct to the great principles of Christian fidelity, which cannot tolerate any compact with error. Those who desire to carry out these principles to the full must join a Church of professing Christians who relinquish alike State patronage and control. But so long as they remain in the Established Church, they can claim no authority over their brethren of other shades of opinion, who have an equal right to share in the budget. It would have been easy for the Consistory of Paris to have given to the broad party a pastor of moderate opinions, and to have admitted into its body some of their most illustrious representatives. In this way the crisis might have been averted. We candidly admit that we cannot share the indignation of the evangelicals against their opponents because they have appealed to the civil power; for they have been doing this for years, and what other appeal is open to a Church united to the State?

Every day is showing the evangelicals how dearly they have to pay for State patronage and support. The Synod of 1872 is no longer anything but a memory. The last fragments of its resolutions have been drifted away. The Reformed Church knows now that it can only regain its rights by becoming free indeed. For this consummation it has been preparing itself by the unofficial synods, which are a primary application of the voluntary principle.

The fresh elections will take place next month. It is easy to see how important are the issues at stake.

E. DE PRESSENSÉ.

THE PROPHETS.

Dr. Kuenen's third Hibbert Lecture, treating of the Universalism of the Prophets and the Establishment of Judaism as a State religion, was delivered on Monday week in the theatre of the University Museum at Oxford, and on Monday last at St. George's Hall, London. If the canonical prophets, he began by asking, who succeeded those who left no writings behind them, stood on the ground of Israelitism and shared with it their fundamental idea, whence the divergence, sometimes amounting even to hostility, and stirring up deadly strife, between them and their people? The prophets themselves must answer, nor would they refuse. Not everywhere—e.g., not (for reasons given) in the instances of Nahum, Obadiah, and the Second Isaiah did this antagonism force itself into the foreground. But these were exceptions to the rule, which Jeremiah thus formulated—"The prophets who have been before me, from the first, have prophesied against many lands and great kingdoms, of war, and disaster, and pestilence. As for the prophet who preaches peace—when his saying comes to pass then (but not till then) shall it be seen that Yahweh has sent him." Jeremiah, then, found the characteristic of Yahweh's emissary in his being a prophet of evil. And why? Because he was the preacher of repentance, urging Yahweh's moral demands upon an unwilling people. He in whose name the true prophet spoke was the Holy One. Only by going through the prophetic literature itself was it possible to realise how completely the moral law, inviolable and inflexible, dominated these men. Strikingly illustrative passages were cited from Amos, Micah, and Isaiah. This profoundly ethical conception of Yahweh's very being could not fail to bring the prophets into collision with the religious convictions of their people. In the popular consciousness Yahweh and Israel were inseparably bound together. True, the relations between them were not incapable of being disturbed. Yahweh could never cease to be their god—i.e., their natural helper, defender and deliverer, but it did not follow that he never hid his face, as their national troubles proved. Still, the bond between them was never supposed to be broken, any more than that between a husband and wife who had no idea of divorce. Sooner or later the quarrel would be made up. But all this changed as soon as Yahweh acquired, as he had in the minds of the canonical prophets, an ethical character, as distinct from moral attributes, which latter the people also ascribed to him. The priestly thorah, or teaching of the law, made it clear that the popular belief invested Yahweh with moral qualities, although, to their thinking, these were some only among many, and by no means dominated all else. For if not altogether subordinate to Yahweh's connection with Israel, they might at least yield a point in its favour. Old Testament texts were cited, especially from the historical books, in which the idea came into the foreground, that Yahweh had his own honour to uphold, and therefore could not but bless his people. But to the prophets such an idea had become impossible. As soon as an ethical character was ascribed to Yahweh, he must act in accordance with it. The Holy, the Righteous One, might renounce His people, but He could not renounce Himself. Hence the schism between the prophets, with their often unpatriotic belief in the Holy One, and the great majority of their countrymen. The national leaders reckoned with certainty upon the help of their God, asking, "is not Yahweh in our midst? No harm shall overtake us." (Mic. iii. 11.) Such confidence could only be rebuked, they fancied, by men who questioned Yahweh's power or esteemed more highly that of the enemy's gods. But now they saw opposed to them in Amos and his successors men who, far from doubting Yahweh's might, assigned to him greater power and a wider dominion than they themselves had ever done, but who, nevertheless, denounced their reliance upon his support as vain and sinful. These men saw no absurdity in thinking that Yahweh might take the part of Israel's foes against Israel. Nay, they preached that Yahweh himself brought upon his people the very thing against which they had besought his protection. "I call forth against you, O house of Israel, says Yahweh, the God of hosts, a people that shall afflict you from Hamath to the stream of the plain." So said Amos (vi. 14). Isaiah (x. 5) called the Assyrians the rod of Yahweh's wrath, and Jeremiah repeatedly styled Nebuchadnezzar Yahweh's servant. How could we wonder that such words sounded like blasphemy in the ears of the people? Their patriotism rose up in protest, and with it the religious consciousness which as yet coincided with it. The prophets were, in fact, the farthest remove from being unpatriotic. But in order to see this the people must have themselves experienced the majesty of the Holy One in its overmastering strength, like Amos when he cried (iii. 8)—"The lion has roared; who should not fear? The Lord Yahweh has spoken; who should not prophesy?" This loosening of the band between Yahwism and the vulgar patriotism, the lecturer observed, was a fact of the utmost significance. But before further illustrating it and following up its weighty consequences, he dwelt at some length upon the direct influence of the recognition of Yahweh's ethical character upon the religious convictions of the prophets themselves. Thereby, as was pointed out, the conception of God was carried up into another and a higher sphere. From that moment it ceased to be a question of more or less mighty between Yahweh and the gods of the nations, for now he stood not only above them, as in Moabite belief Camosh was higher than his rivals, and, according to that of the Ammonites, Molech rose above his. Yahweh was now in very distinct opposition to the other gods. If Yahweh the Holy One was God, if he was God as the Holy One, then the others were not gods at all. In a word, the belief that Yahweh was the only God sprang out of the ethical conception of his being. Monotheism was the gradual, not the sudden, result of this conception. The lecturer took it as proven that monotheism did as a fact begin to show itself with unmistakable clearness in the writings of the prophets of the eighth century, and was taught in explicit terms in the last quarter of the seventh century in Deuteronomy and Jeremiah. The appearance of the Assyrian power in Palestine brought Israel and its neighbours for the first time into contact with the world, and the religion of Israel, in common with the rest, was thrown into confusion, as was seen in the syncretism of Ahaz and Manasseh. But the victories of Assur had no power over the ethical faith of the prophets, whose Yahweh could not be cast into the shade by Bel or Merodach. On the contrary, he became greater in proportion as the world-power made itself more mightily felt. There was revealed to their spirit no less than the august idea of the moral government of the world. Their ethical monotheism and universalism were next shown developing themselves in their writings, which were reviewed seriatim. At the end of the line stood the second Isaiah, the spiritual son of Jeremiah, and the heir of his thoughts as to the future of Yahwism. In his conceptions could be easily recognised the independent reproduction and elaboration of the hints noted in Jeremiah. The distinction between the fleshly and the spiritual Israel found classic expression in his "servant of Yahweh," whose task included not only the restoration of Israel, but also the proclamation to the heathen of the true religion, the ordinance and thorah of Yahweh. The idea was merely indicated, but even in its embryonic form it was a striking result, worthy of the remarkable movement that emanated from the prophets of Israel, and was continued by the most eminent among them throughout nearly three centuries. The final outcome was already contained in germ in the initiative of the shepherd of Thekoa, Yahweh, the Holy One of Israel, was predestined to become the God of all peoples. The second Isaiah was very likely in his grave before 500 B.C. To think of this was to remind ourselves that Israel's preaching to the heathen remained for centuries no more than a pious wish. How came it that the Israelitish religion, so far from spreading abroad, became rigidly exclusive, a wall of partition between the Jews and the nations? The answer must be, "Because, before the servant of Yahweh could be a 'light to the heathen,' he had to be duly trained for his task." No less than a complete transformation was involved, a breach with the deeply-rooted heathen practices and the rearing up of a fresh national existence. Hezekiah's attempted reforms were made abortive by his son and successor Manasseh. But they turned out to have been the prelude to the great events of the 18th year of Josiah, when Hilkiah's book of the law was brought to the king's knowledge, and, when confirmed by Huldah's prophetic authority, was put into practice by him. Here the prophetic aspirations of the time had found complete expression. A great part of the book, or, to give it the name under which scholars knew it, of the Deuteronomic thorah, consisted in patriotic exhortation to fidelity to Yahweh and prophetic warning against service of "the other gods." By the side of these stood legal ordinances derived from usage or from older law books and a whole series of moral precepts, breathing likewise the spirit of prophecy. But beyond all this the Deuteronomist entered on the field of cultus, untrodden by his predecessors. He made no change in the sacrifice or feasts. But, penetrated by the conviction that the mingling of Yahwism with the adoration of other gods could not be brought to an end so long as the bamôth were tolerated, he centralised the worship of Yahweh in Jerusalem. The king was quite won over to the new programme. Doubtless it was in conflict with the convictions and customs of the masses; so much so, indeed, that but for the strong arm of the law it would never have been accepted. But the popular attitude was not one of unconditional opposition. Yet, in spite of many favourable circumstances, it none the less failed. Josiah's death on the battlefield of Megiddo was a terrible blow to the reformers. Not one of his successors was thoroughly true to his principles, and Jehoiachim was even hostile to them. The kingdom of Judah lasted but a score of years after Josiah's death, and during that respite was exposed to all manner of disasters. Jeremiah's early joy in Josiah's reformation was followed by bitter disenchantment. The adoration of other gods by Yahweh's side did not cease; nay, after a short time, it was practised more zealously than ever. Accordingly, Jeremiah despaired of a gradual reformation of the existing state of things. To accomplish any true good Yahweh must begin again and make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah. This was a glorious expectation and a striking proof of Jeremiah's invincible faith. The fortunes of the Deuteronomic thorah, after the exile, were next detailed. Want of enthusiasm, of energy, and of inspiration was declared to have been the special characteristic of the period from Zerubbabel to Ezra. Meanwhile, the train was completely laid for a great change. In Judæa itself the priests had enjoyed great and growing influence since 536 B.C. In Babylonia the theory that corresponded to the practice had been elaborated in the first half of the captivity by Ezekiel in his plan of the new Jewish state, with the Temple for its central point. His successors kept up and further developed his idea. Finally, in B.C. 458, the conception seemed to be ripe for realisation, and in Judæa the ground seemed ready for the new edifice. Thither went Ezra, with the king's authority, at the head of a second band of returning exiles and armed with the law of his God. Some years later, when Nehemiah, on whose sympathy he could entirely rely, was governor, he saw that the moment was come for realising his plans. The priestly law was read aloud and the whole people solemnly accepted and swore to observe it. Judaism was established. What the prophetic preaching had failed to effect, what Deuteronomy, the prophetic thorah, had only half accomplished, was brought to pass by Judaism. In this form Yahwism became the religion of the Jewish people, and that people thenceforth identified itself more and more fully with it, till the identification was complete. In other words, the priests of Yahweh, from Ezekiel to Ezra, saw their attempt crowned with complete success.

JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

The Oxford delivery of Professor Kuenen's fourth Hibbert Lecture took place on Friday week. The subject was "Judaism and Christianity." He reminded his audience that although not denying Judaism, if judged by its first establishment, to have been rigidly national and exclusive, he had, nevertheless, asserted for it an internal heaven or universalism. It might fairly be asked where it had hidden this treasure bequeathed by the prophets? To begin with, it was pointed out that in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian Era it was only seemingly that the Jewish religion was subordinated to the national life. In reality, it had an independent existence, so that even in Palestine it was not impossible to be a deeply religious man and at the same a lukewarm patriot, or, in other words, in Judaism religion and nationality were no longer inseparably united. Still more was this the case, as was shown, amongst the Jews abroad. Through intercourse with the Gentiles, Judaism became one thing in the Greek world, at Alexandria for instance, another in Babylonia, and yet another at Rome. What an intensely interesting fact, for example, was the translation of the Law into the Greek tongue, as a proof how Judaism had already grown inwardly, even more than as prophetic of its future influence upon the heathen world! True, it had long remained, for all that, confined to the one people. But while the Scribes clung to the Law, such phenomena as a Jesus ben Sirach's glorification of Isaiah, and as the universalism of the Maccabæan Psalms, clearly proved that the prophetic ideas had not fallen into oblivion. To the same epoch was referred the Book of Daniel, which was imitated by later apocalypses, in painting the triumphs of Yahweh over the heathen. Nor was the Thorah itself, as was further pointed out in detail, exclusively directed to fashioning by strictly and exclusively legal discipline a single people consecrated to Yahweh. The lecturer especially referred to the historical introduction to the priestly laws, which were placed in a framework of sublimer compass. The conception, he said, is that of a progressive revelation of God, with the Sinaitic legislation as its keystone. Elohim creates the heaven and the earth in six days, and hallows the seventh day, on which He rests from His labour. The blessing which He pronounces on the first human pair He subsequently repeats after the rescue of Noah and his family from the Flood; while at the same time He lays His commandments on the new race of men, and establishes the rainbow as the sign of the covenant he has made. To Abraham he reveals himself as El Shaddai, God Almighty, and enters into closer relationship with him and his posterity, the seal of which is circumcision. Mindful of this pledge, he takes pity on Jacob's posterity in Egypt, reveals Himself to Moses as Yahweh, redeems the people by the hand of Moses and Aaron from slavery, leads them to Sinai, where He declares how He desires to be served, and finally, when a dwelling has been built for Him, establishes Himself in the midst of Israel. Modern feeling found a want of congruity in this progression, which begins with the creation of the world and at first embraces all mankind, and yet culminates in minute precepts about the sanctuary, the priests and their vestments, the sacrifices and ceremonial cleanness—precepts which, by their very nature, could only be put into practice within the narrow limits of one small people. The real question, however, was whether the authors of the priestly Torah and the Scribes who followed them were themselves conscious of the discordance. In the lecturer's opinion, it could hardly be doubted that they were. In the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, Malachi appeared as a prophet. Yahweh, so he declared, would not accept the lean and blemished sacrificial beasts which the priests were not ashamed to offer him; "for," says the prophet (i. 11) "from the rising of the sun to its setting, my name is great among the heathen, and in all places is incense offered to my name and a pure sacrifice, for my name is great among the heathen." Immediately afterwards (i. 14) Yahweh adds, "For I am a great king, and my name is great among the heathen." The lecturer disapproved the alleged reference to the Jews in the dispersion, and insisted that the words spoke distinctly of the adoration of Yahweh by the peoples already, whenever they served their own gods with true reverence and honest zeal. He cited other texts from Malachi and Deuteronomy to show that the opposition between Yahweh and the other gods, and afterwards between the one true God and the imaginary gods, makes room here for the still higher conception that the adoration of Yahweh is the essence and truth of all religion. Professor Kuenen said he had dwelt upon this single prophetic utterance because the man who spoke it stood by the cradle of Judaism. It was almost monstrous to suppose that Malachi and his contemporaries, the authors of the priestly Torah, expected the true religion to be ultimately confined to the single Jewish people. At one point we saw the universalistic principles breaking through the shell, as it were. The reference was to the regulations of the priestly Torah concerning the gerim, the strangers settled in Israel, who, the lecturer showed in his detailed account of them, must be distinguished alike from the aliens and from the foreign labourers who merely passed through the land. The attitude taken up towards these gerim by Judaism, as represented by the later legislation and the contemporary prophets, showed that it was enlarging its borders and that proselytism had begun. Before the Psalter was closed "they that feared Yahweh"—i.e., the proselytes—had already taken their place after "Israel" and "the House of Aaron," and had heard the exhortation of the Temple choir addressed to them also. "Praise Yahweh, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever."

In further pointing out how this promise of something broader and more exalted was fulfilled, or, in other words, how there grew out of Judaism a world-religion—Christianity—the lecturer assumed, as familiar to his audience, the general outlines of the history of Judaism and the fates of the Jewish people down to the fall of Jerusalem. On the other hand, he would not shut out the light that shines back from Christianity itself upon the earlier centuries. His answer to the preliminary objection, which at least had the merit of going to the root of the matter, that the development he spoke of is an utter fiction, might be short and simple. Judaism, he was told, did doubtless develop—into Talmudism. Christianity rose on the soil of Judaism, but to derive or explain the later from the earlier religion was a hopeless task. Christianity was a new creation, no more to be explained apart from the person of its founder than was that founder to be regarded as the product of his time and people. Would you explain Jesus away? he was asked. If not, re-cast your question, the rock ahead is the impossibility of a solution. The lecturer disclaimed all thought of ignoring the person of Jesus or lowering his high significance. He well knew the rise of Christianity would be an insoluble riddle were he to set aside him who for eighteen centuries had ranked as its founder. Whence he sprang—from Israel or from God, as the question was very incorrectly put sometimes, they needed not now decide. But he might rely on the assent of all in declaring that only in a very improper sense of the word could what Jesus founded be called a new creation. As far as our knowledge reached, man's spiritual life, especially including religion, was likewise subject to the law that nothing comes into existence that does not link itself on to what exists already. Nay, Ernest Renan could say from that very chair, "Christianity at its origin is no other than Judaism," and those farthest from granting this must own the points of contact and agreement to be innumerable. In Holland, not long ago, the Jewish scholar Tal summed up thus a comparison with the Talmud carried through the first chapter of the Sermon on the Mount:—"The ethics of the Gospel are no other than appear in the Talmud, are the same that were handled in the schools of the Sopherim and the Tannaïtes, the same that are held as law to this day by the Talmud Jews." Allowing that this could not be accepted till fenced with many reservations, it was impossible to deny the existing agreement. If so, how could they set Christianity and Talmudic Judaism in diametrical opposition, and deny the connection of the one, while asserting that of the other, with the earlier Judaism? Such a method would be utterly unhistorical, and our duty clearly lay in another direction. We must be equally on our guard against hasty identification and against explaining away any connection proclaimed by the facts themselves. When Christianity was founded, materials borrowed from Judaism were clearly employed. What they were was the question they were seeking to answer. And in asking it they had marked off the character of the investigation more sharply than was possible before. It was not the founding of Christianity itself, said the lecturer, that he was attempting to describe, nor the person and work of its founder. That might remain for one of his successors in the Hibbert Chair. He would have done enough if he could show them in the Judaism of our first century the indispensable antecedents of the work of Jesus and how he realised the universalism promised by the prophets. But first the lecturer disposed very summarily of the bizarre theory expressed in the words—"the origin of Christianity from Roman Hellenism"—adopted by Bruno Bauer as the second title of his "Christ and the Cæsars" in his second edition, published in 1879. In that work criticism had sunk to the bathos of sheer caprice. Professor Kuenen said it would much simplify his own work to define at the outset whether the Judaism in which they were to seek the materials for the edifice of Christianity was to be looked for in the Hellenistic Judaism, the Palestinian, or in both. Still narrowing the issue, he reminded the audience that many of the Greek-speaking Jews, even in Alexandria, were but the echo of Jerusalem, and that more than one Greek book of the old Testament Apocrypha might have been written, so far as regards its ideas, in Palestine—e.g., the author of Second Maccabees was a Pharisee of the Pharisees. Hence, in contrasting Hellenistic with Palestinian Judaism, what was meant by the former was that peculiar fusion of Judaism and Greek philosophy reflected in the Apocryphal Book of Wisdom, but whose true spokesman was Philo. It was undeniable that a spice of Hellenistic Judaism very early flavoured the Christian religion spread among the heathen. Paul had felt its power, and the Logos doctrine of the Fourth Gospel was essentially that of Philo. But Hellenistic Judaism had no hand in the foundation of Christianity. In the first three Gospels was found no trace of it. Yet it was in them that the teaching of the Founder of Christianity was presented in its most original form. In Philo's allegorical interpretation of Scripture we witnessed, not the lordly flight of the eagle, but the astounding feats of the acrobat; the last thing to be looked for in his school was the birth of a new religion. Christian theology found its account in Alexandrian Judaism, but its line might be produced ad infinitum without bringing us to the Christian religion.

Kuenen once more stated his starting point in unequivocal terms. The international religion, he said, called by us Christianity, was founded, not by the Apostle Paul, but by Jesus of Nazareth—that Jesus whose person and teaching are sketched with the closest approximation to truth in the Synoptic Gospels. The celebrated Edward von Hartmann, in his "History of the Developments of the Religious Consciousness of Mankind," just published, had done us the service of formulating with his wonted clearness and incisiveness the opposite opinion. The lecturer traced the fallacy of Hartmann's daring theory, that Jesus was the founder of a Judaistic Christianity of the most rigid and unbending type, but that out of this Jewish Christianity, with no abiding worth and without a future, Paul made a religion for the world, by interpreting the Messiah's atoning death and resurrection as the doom of legalism, so removing the barrier between Jews and heathens, and making Jewish monotheism accessible to all the world, to the author's identification of religion and dogma. This confusion Hartmann had driven to such a point that one would say he had expressly set himself to cure us of it for ever, and this was the great obligation under which he had laid his readers.

Upon Palestinian Judaism, then, our attention must be fixed, but Palestinian Judaism as a whole, and not simply some one of its religious schools, such as the Essenes. The derivation of Christianity from Essenism was examined and refuted. The persistency with which it was always cropping up afresh was explained by the elements of romance with which it was invested. The prop on which it had long leaned in Philo's account of the Therapeutæ, that enigmatical colony of kindred ascetic Jews on the Mareotid Lake in Egypt, had been knocked away two years ago by the young Strasburg scholar Lucius, who had proved that the work containing this account was not written by Philo in the first century of our era, but by some Christian forger at the end of the third century or the beginning of the fourth. On the other hand the Essenes were of great service as was pointed out in various particulars in the diagnosis of Palestinian Judaism, and their ethics especially shed much light on early Christianity.

Palestinian Judaism, regarded from a religious point of view, found its natural centre in Pharisaism, a critical exposition of which followed. In the Jewish state, the High Priest, with the Sadducee grandees around him, took the first place. But in religion the Sadducees represented no special principle. Here, as was demonstrated in detail, it was the Scribes who ed and ruled, supported by their pupils, the Pharisees, those virtuosi of religion as (Wellhausen styled them) who put the theory of their masters into practice. The New Testament polemic against the shortcomings of the Pharisees, even when not aimed only at the false brethren among them, was not meant as a complete description of their purposes and efforts. The New Testament itself showed, as well as Josephus and the Talmud, that to regard them all as hypocrites or mere formalists would be the height of injustice. No; Pharisaism was a thoroughly earnest attempt to realise the principle of Judaism itself—namely, complete obedience to God's will expressed in the Torah. This estimate of the Pharisees was illustrated at large. Pharisaism was but Judaism itself, and nothing more; and yet it was the practice, not of the whole nation, but of a sect—of some few thousands to whom the people looked up with profound respect, but who were seen by that very fact to be essentially different from the people itself. Geiger, who had shown much insight into the nature and relations of the Jewish parties, was mistaken in identifying the Pharisees with the Jewish bourgeoisie. But as this master thought it was, so it really ought to have been. Theoretically speaking, there was not the least reason why the whole people, castaways alone excepted, should not have complied with all the Pharisees observed. But practically the yoke was too heavy. As happens when the consistent application of a principle but half true leads to a deadlock like that to which Judaism was brought, about the beginning of our era, the melancholy alternative of subterfuges was grasped at, in which the conscience could not rest. Fortunately there was, however, another way of escape, and we were free to believe that some, at least, did not fail to find it. There was an internal contradiction in the system of the Sopherim or Scribes—a prophetic element clashing with its main principle of rigid legalism. This silent influence of the prophetic spirit propagated in the synagogues scattered the seeds of a religion which could not find its consummation in legalism. This religion was, in a certain sense, a stolen treasure. But those who provisionally enjoyed it had, as a matter of fact, risen to a higher standpoint than that of Pharisaism—a standpoint to be possessed and defended before long in right as well as in fact.

How penetrating was the new life thus burgeoning unseen was treated under two heads—the Messianic idea and Proselytism. Messianic hopes had not expired in post-exilic Israel. They survived mainly among the Scribes, Pharisees, and the people led by them, and were intensified by the pressure of the Roman and Herodian yoke. At the beginning of our era Judaism had no rounded system of Messianic dogma, but there was a dominant conviction that the subjection of God's "kingdom of priests and holy people" to the heathen could not last. Mutually agreed so far, the Jews parted at this point into two companies. In the one the Messianic idea generated Zealotism, of which a vivid description was given, according to Josephus (almost our only witness), who was forced to own the constant growth of this rabid fanaticism until at last it swept the whole people along with it in the outbreak of the Jewish war, A.D. 66. But this was in the teeth of the Scribes and Pharisees, who encouraged rather a passive Messianic hope, which often did not spurn martyrdom, in the firm persuasion of a life beyond the present. Dr. Kuenen wound up his masterly sketch of the proselytism carried on by Judaism on such a vast scale about the first century with a reference to the conversion of the royal house of Adiabene to the synagogue and to the contradictory dicta given by Hananiah and Eleazar as to whether King Izates must be circumcised. What Josephus told us on this point formed a commentary on Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, which was as much as to say that the question between national and universal religion had already been, the lecturer would not say answered, but at least asked, out there on the banks of the Tigris. Dr. Kuenen added that, after including Buddhism within the circle of his observations, he should return once more to Judaism and the relation in which Christianity stands to it.

In conclusion, he said they had already traced through its course the culmination of Judaism in an international religion, the birth of which now stood before their eyes as a historical necessity. Yet always, he must say again, with one most important reservation. He thought he had shown that the conditions of this transition were present, and that, too, in such definite terms as to bring the solution as close as possible. One thing only was wanting, and that was the solution itself. The elements lay mingled with one another, and the "Let there be light" must still be spoken. But was not this equivalent to the avowal of the failure of the whole undertaking? No doubt it would be so had he promised to explain the origin of Christianity apart from the person of its Founder. But at the outset he had declared that he could do nothing of the kind. What he did undertake to show was that Jesus ought not to be regarded as the deus ex machina who suddenly appeared to bring order out of the confusion and misery wrought by men, and that he might be strictly demonstrated not to have stood in opposition to the whole Jewish people in every phase and shade of its religion. Had he not kept these promises? Had they not witnessed the birth-pains of the Messiah?

The fourth lecture was delivered on Monday in St. George's Hall.

The May and June numbers of Mr. Walford's new Antiquarian Magazine will contain, inter alia, some interesting papers by the Rev. F. K. Hartford, Minor Canon of Westminster, on the true origin of our National Anthem, which he has traced back to its original source in a Latin anthem, sung in the Chapel Royal, St. James's, in the days of the Stuarts.

Correspondence.

THE REV. JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The enclosed letter was recently addressed to Mr. Thom, and forwarded to him by me, as the last person who had the opportunity of signing it. All who have joined in this petition will share the joy with which I have just read the consenting answer; as that answer, though addressed personally to me, and having some slight reference to my private note in forwarding the application, is in substance and in fact the reply to the collective request, Mr. Thom gives me permission to place it in your hands for insertion in the Inquirer. I will not attempt to modify a single phrase. It would not speak better to us all, for being less addressed to me.

TO THE REV. JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

Dear Sir,—We, the undersigned ministers and laymen, connected with various Christian congregations, respectfully request that you will consent to publish a volume of your Sermons and Prayers, which many of us have listened to with deep interest, and the publication of which we believe would be a source of spiritual strength to many members of the Christian Church in all its branches.

My dear Friend,—I am much moved by the application you have so kindly forwarded to me. Names such as yours and others from among my brethren in the ministry, and as Dr. William Carpenter's and others from our most respected laymen—though I cannot place you and them as a shield between me and the public—out of simple acknowledgment and respect for the honour done me, compel my assent to your request; and, whatever may be the result, will, in yielding to your wish, at least relieve me from any feeling of personal presumption. When some time ago you pressed upon me a similar request with so much friendly partiality, I thought that you had been reading your own mind into my words, for it was, and is, my belief that I can say nothing that has not already been said better, and that I have not the command of a style which gives fresh life to familiar truth. In the present case, reinforced as you are, I cannot but feel that it would be only ungracious and self-regarding to stand upon my own judgment, inclinations, or apprehensions; and that such impression or expectation as the application indicates should have existence touches me too deeply to leave with me any power of resistance. Yet I am quite aware that it requires other powers than mine to make the Press a full equivalent for the Pulpit, and it is one of the enduring sorrows of my life that, from a slight but insuperable cause, I have, without at least the consciousness of failing faculties in other respects, been cut off for so many years from the personal exercise of the ministry of religion.

The application asks for a "Volume of Sermons and Prayers." The word "prayers" is so placed on the paper, by aid of a caret, as to lead me to suppose it was an after-thought. I have always felt a difficulty about the publication of prayers, and if I should be able to overcome that difficulty I am inclined to think it is not desirable that the Sermons and Prayers should be in the same volume.

I have been so much in the habit of looking on my sermons as being on a dead level, that if I begin printing them you may be the occasion of my going on beyond the measure of your request; but, should I be so tempted or misled, I shall not, even in my most sacred thoughts, hold you and my other friends responsible for more than you have asked.

I must leave with you, dear friends, the question and manner of communicating with your co-memorials, and with the most respectful acknowledgments to you and them,—I am, ever affectionately yours,

JOHN THOM.

Rev. Dr. Martineau.

COERCION IN IRELAND.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—We shall be much obliged if you will spare space for the subjoined protest. It was hastily drawn up at Liverpool during the late Conference, but the difficulty of getting the few signatures which were assured in the crowd and hurry has caused the delay in publication. We are a very small minority, but we trust not quite limited to a bare dozen. There must surely be a few others who sympathise with us, and to such we apologise for not having had the good thought of soliciting their signatures also.

May 1, 1882.

We, the undersigned ministers of Presbyterian, Unitarian and other Free Churches, hereby express our deep regret that the present administration, which has had our loyal support, has in Ireland had recourse to the old and discredited system of coercion, and we desire to record our firm adherence—strengthened by the events of the past twelve months—to the often-quoted maxim that "Force is no remedy," and our earnest desire that henceforth the troubles which unjust laws or usages may occasion among the Irish peasantry may be met by thorough and speedy reforms, and by firm administration of the ordinary law of the realm.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In your leader of April 22 regret is expressed that, with hardly an exception, none but Unitarian Churches responded to the invitation of the Liverpool Conference Committee. Let me say that I sincerely share that regret. But I do not think too much importance should be attached to the absence of ministers of other Churches. Liverpool is a stronghold of theological conservatism, as is evidenced by the numerical strength of Subscription Churches—Episcopal, Presbyterian, Wesleyan. This will partly account for the absence of ministers residing in the neighbourhood of the Conference. As to those in other parts of the country, I think that the holding of the Conference so near the time of the May Meetings, when ministers are in large numbers looking forward to being in London, would add a difficulty in some cases. In my own case, it was by an unfortunate mistake that I found myself under an engagement to be from home that week, and unable, in consequence, to attend the Conference.

You ask what has become of the Leicester Conference? Not having been connected with it I do not know. But I do know this, that far beyond the Churches represented at that Conference prevails an intense sympathy with all that is rational in thought and Christian in spirit, let its form or symbol be what it may

A CONGREGATIONAL MINISTER.

THE RESURRECTION MIRACLE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In reply to at least a portion of the five columns of your last issue devoted to Mr. Bartram on "Miracle" may I crave a much briefer space for a few remarks?

How many of our scientists have given up their belief in the leading historical fact, that as all Christians for eighteen centuries have believed, forms the very foundation of our faith, I know not, and to me it matters not. I well know the difficulties that surround that fact—the doubts and surmises which in this age of science it must suggest to the inquiring mind. The confused accounts that have come down to us in the evangelical records are, to some minds, still more suggestive of such surmises; whilst to others they only indicate the confusion of mind and inconsistency of testimony, which such an unexpected and wonderful event was certain to create. Yet, doubt as we will, this fact remains to be accounted for, that it was belief in a risen Jesus that, if any human testimony is to be credited, formed the foundation of the first Christians' faith. It was belief in this, as a fact, that caused the Gospel to be propagated—a belief which nerved its possessors to do and bear such acts and sufferings as have placed them amongst earth's noblest heroes. And if such belief were delusion, it is surely one of which in the world's history we have no like instance.

Nor is this miracle to be classed, as Mr. Bartram does, with those that are ascribed in the sacred narratives to Jesus himself. These may, I admit, be ascribed partly to natural causes—partly to the love of the marvellous that is so certain to exaggerate, and in the course of time to weave some myth of mystery around the memory of every celebrated character. Still, that such a web of myth was woven around the memory of so humble and disappointing a teacher as the prophet of Galilee proves, I should think, beyond a doubt, that there was something unique in his personal presence—some commanding power in his calm look that could restrain the lunatic, some wondrous pathos in his gentle voice that could reclaim while it relieved the fallen—some potent spell of truth and action that caused all to feel there "went a virtue out of him and healed them." No such power was attributed to the Baptist. How did it come to be attributed to Jesus? That it was possessed in a much greater degree than I have here indicated all the narratives of his life testify. Nay, its manifestations are so woven into the very texture of these narratives that any attempt to extract them now is to destroy the whole as evidence. And yet I grant that Christianity is to be received, not on the strength of the miracles ascribed to Jesus, but on the truth of Christ's teachings, as they commend themselves to the conscience.

In the case of his resurrection, however, we have a miracle not wrought by, but wrought upon Jesus—a miracle attributed to the direct power of God himself. We all know how science treats such deviations from the course of nature. She says "they are impossible." Faith says, "with God all things are possible." Is such faith superstition? or connected with our spirit nature? are these facts which science, however wise in her own eyes, has yet failed to grasp?

We will not presume to solve these questions; but let us see how the answer which each may for himself render affects the histories we possess of Jesus, and the histories of our humanity. As to the sacred narratives we all know that these not only all concur in recording such event, but that all lead us to expect it. Whilst yet in Galilee, in the neighbourhood of Cesarea Philippi (Matthew xvi. 21), Jesus is said to have warned his disciples "how that he must go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes; and be killed and be raised again the third day." Again, when going up to Jerusalem, all the synoptics concur in representing him as taking the twelve apart by the way, and saying to them—"Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles to mock, and to scourge and to crucify, and the third day he shall rise again." And Luke adds—"And they understood none of these things; and this saying was hidden from them, neither knew they the things that were spoken." When for the last time, in Jerusalem, I need not say how numerous become the references to his own death and reappearance. In his conversations with his own disciples at the last supper the fourth Gospel is full of them. And at the last supper itself, he will not drink of the fruit of the vine, according to the other evangelists, "until the kingdom of God shall come." When asked by the Pharisees for a sign from heaven, he tells them that "no sign shall be given, but the sign of the prophet Jonah." Nay, some of his parables are founded on this expectation, as in that of the vineyard let out to wicked husbandmen, he is the heir, come to be killed by them,—"the stone which the builders rejected," which is yet to become "the head of the corner." The very accusation preferred against him was, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." And when adjured by the High Priest to tell them whether he were the Christ the Son of God, his answer is, "If I tell you ye will not believe. Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God."

Will it be said that these narratives were written long subsequent to the time when a belief in the reappearance of the crucified Jesus had seized on the minds of his followers, and that this belief led them to invent such sayings, and attribute them to Jesus? If so, what is the value of such fictitious stories? Those who record them admit they did not understand them. "They questioned one another what the rising from the dead should mean." And yet his words must have retained some strange fascination over them. Instead of flying from the city, as they did from Calvary, to their native Galilee, when all their worldly hopes were disappointed in him, they linger about Jerusalem, because persuaded that they have again seen him, and in less than two months begin publicly to reproach their rulers for having put to death "the Prince of life."

But further, how does the answer to the above questions affect the character of Christ himself? If he went up to Jerusalem to that last passover with no such purpose or conviction as these narratives attribute to him, his action was that of a fanatic foolishly casting away his own life. In Galilee and surrounding regions he had an ample field and opportunities for the exercise of his ministry. Even when he withdrew into desert places, the multitudes followed him. For himself and his followers he could get no privacy. In Jerusalem, he knew, dwelt his deadliest enemies. It was the seat of their power, the centre of their influence, sustained as they were by all the authority of Rome. What fatal impulse led him "steadfastly to set his face to go to it?" And why did he, amidst unchecked Hosannas, ride into it as its law-giver, drive the cattle traffickers from its temple, reproach its priests as "whited sepulchres," and leave them no alternative but, for the peace of the city, if nothing else, doom him to the death. If not, as the Apostle has it, to "conquer death and to bring to light life and immortality," this surely was the work of a fanatic rather than a preacher of such a sermon as that upon the mount. But no. He felt "he had a baptism to be baptised with (this time not of water but of blood), and how was he straitened till it was accomplished?" "The grain of wheat must fall into the ground and die," but if no green blade appeared to cheer the hearts of expectant followers, then verily Judaism had triumphed, and "the desire of all nations" been trodden in the dust!

And finally, how does the answer to the above questions affect our humanity? Not only between Sadducee and Pharisee; but also betwixt Epicurean and Pythagorean in the schools of Greece and Asia Minor, amongst a people not less refined than we, had such questions been debated, long before the coming of the Christ. And with what result? We know the testimony that history witnesseth of the Athenians when Paul preached the Gospel in the court of the Areopagites, "when they heard of the resurrection of the dead some mocked." Their motto, "Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die," proved, it is to be feared, more successful with the youth of Athens than the stoicism of a Zeno. Will the materialism of this nineteenth century, disguised under the name of Science, be more successful with our youths in nerving them to noble lives than that faith preached of apostles and "delivered to the saints?" Or is it unworthy of God who made us, and who planted the sun in the heavens at ninety millions of miles distant to give light and heat, to give us also some spiritual guidance in answer to the dark and anxious questionings of our humanity? Or if a God be denied us, and if we be but the creation of blind material forces, as science is each day discovering such wondrous secret developments of these forces as our grandfathers never dreamt of, may she not yet find indications in nature of a spirit-force greater than all material power, and which may have power to change those vile bodies into those "celestial bodies" of which the apostle speaks? In any case let us not confound, as Mr. Bartram does, the miracle wrought upon Jesus with the miracles ascribed to Jesus; for this holds a very different position indeed with respect to the truth and worth of the Christian faith?

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

The forty-fifth annual meeting of the friends and supporters of this Society was held on Monday evening, April 24, at the Mission-house; Mr. T. E. PAGET in the chair. There was a fair attendance.

The CHAIRMAN, in the first instance, congratulated the Society upon the accession to the furniture and decorations of the Mission-room of four very beautiful pictures, which had been contributed by the Kyrle Society, and were the work of four ladies belonging to that Society. He also alluded to the recent death at Birmingham of the Rev. John Wilson, who had been in former years an assistant missionary at Liverpool, and who had removed to Birmingham to take charge of a Mission there. The salary which Mr. Wilson received was not such as to enable him to make adequate provision for his family, and the Birmingham friends, impressed with his great worth, raised a subscription and invited the friends of the Liverpool Domestic Mission to assist. He (Mr. Paget) had issued a circular on that subject, and he was now happy to inform them that the joint result of the Birmingham and Liverpool subscription was that a sum of more than £1,200 had been realised—(applause). Next coming to the immediate object of the meeting, the Chairman said:—This is the forty-fifth annual meeting of the Society, and, if he understood anything of its traditions and of its workings, it preferred to move by slow, but sure and modest, measures rather than by anything startling or sensational. Turning over the report one cannot but be struck by the frightful amount of drunkenness which is everywhere prevalent, and which seems to lead to crimes and miseries of all kinds. Our missionaries have continually referred to it, and the present report forms no exception to the rule. It becomes all classes of society, by all the means in their power, to try to do something to mitigate this terrible evil. If we could reduce what Mr. Hoyle calls the "annual drink bill" by, say, one-half, no one would doubt that it would be a great blessing for the country—(cheers). The Chairman advocated at some length the opening of museums and art galleries on Sunday afternoon, and said in conclusion that in looking over the report one cannot help being struck by the great number of active workers which the Society at this moment fortunately possesses. He could not speak in too high terms of the earnestness and devotion with which young men and young women are working in the various institutions connected with this Society. There are now considerably more than one hundred helpers engaged as Sunday-school teachers, provident visitors, and in the work of assisting at entertainments, conducting mothers' meetings and some half-a-dozen other agencies which are particularised in the report. Through the kindness of one of the most liberal and active friends of the mission Mr. Anderton for the last two summers has been at liberty to select from the poor in the streets and courts immediately surrounding this building about a dozen invalids, or people who are not able to take much exercise on foot, and send them for a couple of hours' drive into the country on a fine Sunday afternoon. They had lost the services of their late missionary, Mr. Solly, who sent in his resignation about Christmas last. The Committee under all the circumstances thought fit unanimously to accept it. That resignation took effect from the end of last month, so that Mr. Solly was then present rather in the character of the late missionary, and he will receive in due course a vote of thanks and good wishes—(applause).

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD moved:—"That this Society begs to thank Mr. Solly for his interesting report, and in saying 'farewell' to him as its missionary to offer him its best wishes for his future prosperity. It would also convey to Mr. Anderton its highest appreciation of his services, and the fullest sympathy with him in his work." It has come to be a custom in connection with this Mission that the senior minister should move the first resolution, a custom which when it falls to my lot I always think would be more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The progress of time has unfortunately made me the senior minister in active service, though I am happy still to think that I am not the senior minister amongst us, regarded from another point of view; and I am sure nothing would give the subscribers so much satisfaction as for Mr. Thom to take his accustomed place on the platform and discharge the duties which I am about to discharge. We do not give up the hope that, on some future occasion, he may yet be able to testify to what I know to be his deep and unabated interest in the Society of which he is almost if not quite the only surviving founder—(applause). I can assure Mr. Solly that it is with very great regret that the committee think of the severance of the tie which has united them to him. But Mr. Solly informed us in the first instance—though the fact was not publicly made known—that he looked upon his settlement in Liverpool in connection with this Mission as in its essence a temporary one, and as affording him a phase and a sphere of ministerial experience which he could hardly go through elsewhere. And now, that the term of that experience has been reached, and he goes out to undertake ministerial duty of perhaps a less arduous, though I am sure not more rewarding kind, he is accompanied by our best wishes for his happiness and usefulness, and he will no doubt find that his experience here has really been a help to him—(applause). With regard to Mr. Anderton, who remains with us, what can I say except to exhort him to go on in the good course he has begun? for we all know that he gives the whole of his time and strength and energy to a work which he loves and in which he is successful. And although I could have wished that the task of conveying the sympathy of this Society to him had fallen perhaps into the hands of some well-known layman, and that there had been nothing in it whatever of a professional tone or tinge, yet I can say to him as I have said before to many of our missionaries, if I do not envy them their work I do at all events envy them the strength, the constancy, the patience with which from day to day and week to week they perform it—(applause). It is impossible to say anything really new about a work with the operation and details of which we are so thoroughly well acquainted. Sometimes we come here to testify our unabated faith in the purely moral and religious method of dealing with the great social problems of the time. We feel there is nothing like faith in the Son of God, faith in the Fatherly Providence of God, faith in human kindness and personal service to elevate the poor and degraded a little out of the mire and trouble of their lot, and in every variety of form we have, I think, expressed this simple conviction over and over again. But then again we turn round and look at the problem from the outside; we leave its spiritual conditions alone for a little while, and regard its external conditions; and we speak of such topics as the chairman has alluded to, the means of repressing drunkenness and introducing something like brightness and beauty into the homes and hearts of the poor; the establishment of parks and gardens, education, organs, museums, art galleries, and all the rest. When we speak of externals we are sometimes summarily reminded that this is not the kernel of the matter, which lies in the religious efficacy of missionary work, and when we dwell upon the religious efficacy of missionary work one is constantly apt to be pulled up and reminded of the necessary externals. At all events let us take these beautiful pictures, which take us so happily into an external nature quite different from anything to be seen in Beaufort-street—and which I am told on reliable authority, for I have not been able to see it, is putting forth a new and fresh beauty under the influence of kindly sun and genial rains—let us, I say, take these pictures as a proof that we include every side of Missionary work, and that whatever means are possible to raise our suffering fellow townsmen from the depth of their difficulty, those means we will endeavour to employ—(applause). One other remark I will make, and it is this: that I trust our Missionaries here and elsewhere will learn one thing from the experience of that strange religious organisation which is now attracting so much attention, and exciting so much criticism, some of it of an extremely rough kind. I am very much struck by the way in which when they convert a drunkard or wake up an indifferent person they set those people immediately to work to convert or to awaken others, and not only is this good for the person so converted or waked up, but it adds enormously to the power and efficacy of that work. I have not a word to say—God forbid that I should—against any unselfish work which is done here and elsewhere by young people who belong to the educated classes. It is better for them to give than it can possibly be to receive. It is no more than their duty; but in the pleasure of working, as so many do here from day to day, and from week to week, with a good and a kind heart they find their reward. Nor is it easy to estimate the civilising and refining influence which a kindly young gentleman, or genuine young lady may exercise among boys and girls of a rougher type, though not less genuine, perhaps, in heart and mind. At the same time I am convinced the success of this Mission depends very largely upon the extent to which the missionaries are able to make their own material, and to find their own helpers, and discipline their own assistants out of the material at their disposal. There is a certain home feeling about this place which those who have been taught and ministered to here; they have its welfare at heart; and they know the way to the hearts of those who are like themselves. There is an infinite amount of kindness and goodwill among the very poor, and you often find it amongst those whose lot is otherwise wretched and degraded. A case not long since occurred in London that affected me very deeply indeed. A poor girl, who, as the phrase is, was "on the streets," was brought up before a police magistrate for abducting a child. At first sight everything seemed to be against her. She had taken away the child from the lodging where the mother had put it, and had removed it from the mother's care and taken it to herself. It turned out that the mother was everything a mother should not be; that the child was beaten, and starved, and half naked; and this poor creature of the streets had taken away the child and clothed it and fed it and nurtured it so that its own mother actually did not know it in its improved condition. She had spent upon it a perfect wealth of motherly love; and for that she was brought up before the magistrate. I am happy to think that this magistrate had more sense than some magistrates have, and he did not certainly punish the woman. He told her that she left the court "without any stain upon her character;" but I could not help thinking that that poor creature was just one of the sinners to whom Christ would have said, "Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace"—(loud applause).

Mr. G. HOLT, in seconding the resolution, observed, that he might almost consider himself as the senior layman; for he had been present at these meetings since the foundation of the present building, and it was very satisfactory to him to see that it was still flourishing and carrying on its useful work, and that the same spirit was still abroad infusing earnestness and vigour into the various institutions of the Mission. He cordially supported the resolution, and begged to offer their warmest acknowledgments of Mr. Solly's services, and he hoped that prosperity would attend him elsewhere. He had also the heartiest appreciation of Mr. Anderton's labours; though he had not known him personally quite so well as he had done Mr. Solly; but they all felt the highest confidence in him—(applause).

The resolution was then put, and carried unanimously.

The Rev. H. SHAWN SOLLY said he could only thank the committee and the meeting for the kind expression of feeling they had just manifested. It was true that he had regarded his settlement there in the light of an experiment, and that he did hope to gather from it useful experience, and he believed this had been the case. He should never have ventured to undertake the responsibility had it not been for the unanimous advice received from his old friends Dr. Martineau, Mr. Gaskell, and others, all of whom strongly urged him to come there. He had certainly had one experience, viz.:—that week by week and year by year he had been able to take a deeper, a stronger, a more lasting interest in the actual work which the Mission was established to perform; and he would say to all the various helpers to whom Mr. Paget had referred, that it would be only as time went on, only when they found a real friendship growing up between them and those whom they helped, that they would feel they were really doing the work successfully which they desired to do. It was true, as the Chairman had said, that the report contained no sensational announcement of success; but it was also true that it contained evidence of steady growth and more real and growing interest in that place amongst the poor of the district. He thought it was most important that some united action should be taken by those who did not feel themselves able to join in any of the existing temperance organisations of the country, especially by those who did not feel impelled to become total abstainers. He suggested that Christian temperance societies might be advantageously formed in connection with all Christian congregations and Missions, which should, by a variety of ways, and by pressing forward along all the lines in which temperance could be faced, seek to effectually cope with the evil. A great deal might be done, as was well known, by furnishing counter attractions, by establishing cocoa-rooms and clubs, by furnishing information in regard to the effects of drink both economically and physiologically, by training the young in bands of hope, as well as by the exertion on all occasions of private and individual influence. Mr. Solly at this point related an anecdote of a gentleman who, though himself not a teetotaler, had, by the constant influence of kindness and remonstrance, effectually cured his own coachman of drunkenness. He believed that the evils of intemperance would never be effectually opposed so long as the temperance movement was left only to one section of those who should be its supporters—(applause).

Mr. ANDERTON said he was very grateful for the kind words which had been said, and for the good wishes of the Committee. This Mission had done a splendid and good work during the long years it had been in existence, and he was sure that at the present moment there was as pressing, if not a more pressing, need for work like this than ever there was before. They wanted a little of the spirit which animated the "Salvation Army," and which would stimulate men and women to go out into the streets, if necessary, to be jeered and scoffed at, to perform the great work which this Mission was attempting to do. It was not enough to go to their churches and chapels every Sunday and join in singing hymns and listening to splendid sermons, and then to retire to their homes and leave the world to jog on as it always did. The people to whom this Mission ministered belonged just as much to the members of the various congregations as they did to the missionaries, and he appealed to them most earnestly not merely for the support of the purse but for the liberal support both of heart and hand in the actual work of the Mission itself—(applause).

The Rev. C. J. PERRY, secretary to the Committee, read the Committee's report.

Mr. W. B. BOWRING, treasurer, read the financial statement, which showed a balance in hand of £95 odd.

Mr. ALFRED BOOTH moved that the report of the Committee be received, and the treasurer's accounts passed. Mr. Booth thought that there ought to be no lack of hearty support to missions of this character, particularly as the body with which they were for the most part associated was not burdened by the support of foreign missions. He paid a hearty tribute to the zeal and earnestness which characterised the work of their missionaries, and said he had been much impressed by the pointed and clear way in which the duty of congregations had been touched upon by Mr. Anderton.

Mr. CHAS. W. JONES seconded the resolution in a speech of much force and humour. There were a great many helpers already, but if they had twice the number they could find work for them. Surely there were numbers of young people now-a-days who read the Nineteenth Century and other advanced works, and who had some "ideal" that they would like to live up to and like others to live up to. Well, they had only to come down to the Mission and they would find a grand starting point for all their philanthropic ideas. He reminded them of Du Maurier's æsthetic picture in Punch, where the wife was exhorting her husband to live up to a teapot. This was not a very lofty ideal, and yet they might find hundreds of people who had not even got that far, and whose tastes and habits might be operated upon with advantage—(cheers and laughter). Mr. Jones next spoke of the importance of presenting counter attractions of various kinds on Sunday afternoons, with a view to check the propensity to idleness and drunkenness, which prevailed to such an extent amongst the poorer classes of the city.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS proposed the Committee for the ensuing year, which would be under the presidency of Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones would thus have a good opportunity of introducing his ideal Sunday to them in some practical way. Whenever he came to the Mission, and whenever he heard details of the work of the missionaries, his faith revived, and his hope blossomed again; and the feeling which accumulated from time to time concerning the supremacy of evil, and the almost powerlessness of good, became dissipated, and a healthy glow seemed to call back to his mind the original Gospel promise. He constantly had in his mind the echo of one of the sermons of Dr. Martineau, when speaking of those who despair of humanity, and those who hope for humanity, and surely in the ears of those who gave in too soon, or too readily, to the cuckoo cry of modern pessimism; those words might be uttered once again (and he wished he could remember them more correctly), that "it is not those who are living in daily and hourly contact with the misery and degradation, the vices and the sorrows of the world, but it is the retired student in his chamber of meditation who talks the most fully and frequently of the defects, and shortcomings, and miseries which he criticises with a melancholy so profound." In the present day we had this tone pervading a great deal of our philosophy, which had found its acme in the dictum that this is the worst of all possible worlds, and that man is the worst thing in it. And from whose fertile brain was that theory born?—from that of a man who spent his time contending with actual evil? No; but from a man who was the savant of a café, Arthur Schopenhauer, the man who, with a tender melancholy, exaggerated the vices which he knew only by hearsay. It was from the work of endeavouring to seek and to save that which was lost, and to bring the misery of sin into the joy of obedience, it was from this surely that the corrective was to spring, and from the men who went about among the poor and degraded with the love of God in their hearts and the gospel of Christ on their lips that we were to get new courage and new spirit. Mr. Odgers then alluded to the remarks made by a lecturer in one of the London hospitals who had recently been invited to give an address at the Hall of Science, and who, speaking of the discussion which ensued, said the thing which struck him so keenly, and which he could never forget, was the intense depression with which the earnest secularists spoke of the absolute insuperability of the physical evils which oppressed us. He (Mr. Odgers) happened the other day to see a cutting from a Secularist paper, dealing with what was to be done with our "residuum"; the class that the School Boards cannot reach, and with whom our educational efforts absolutely fail; what was to be done with the "rough" and the "rowdy?" This writer said, "Set one half to fight the other half and then exterminate the remainder." That was the conclusion and result of a hopeless philosophy; a conclusion which the humblest Christian worker would scout and repudiate; and every hour of his work, every day of his life, every word of his earnest speech gave the lie to those words as being in any way a necessary conclusion from human experience—(applause). Their friends of the Salvation Army were in one way discovering that while there was life there was hope; that it was very hard to extirpate all sense of good, all thought of return to the Father's house from the soul of man, and that if only these feelings could be touched and awakened there was almost no limit to the power of rebound from excess, and sin, and vice. In other ways, ways more penetrating and quiet, their missionaries had gone about testifying that there was still for the returning prodigal an open home; and that, however men might drop from our code of virtue and respectability, they could not drop out of the everlasting arms; and so he came to these meetings humbly and gratefully year after year, and took fresh hope, and his belief in the actuality of the kingdom of God revived, and his trust in the efficacy of the human agencies which God blessed was renewed—(applause).

Dr. POLLARD, in seconding the resolution, recommended that if an opportunity occurred the names of a few additional ladies should be added to the Committee.

The Rev. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS moved the resolution for the printing of the reports, accounts, and the Society's constitution, and the names of its supporters. Referring to visits he had himself paid to the Mission, Mr. Williams said that he had always felt it inspiring to witness the sincerity and zeal, the holy faith and courage with which the missionaries pursued their work in the midst of so many discouraging circumstances. With regard to Mr. Solly, though they must all personally much regret to lose him, they must feel that he had spoken words and done kind and beneficent acts amongst the poor of that neighbourhood which would keep his memory very long and very dear in their minds. In conclusion, Mr. Williams said that he believed if they, as a body, only had the courage thus to attempt to influence the great unchristian mass of men around them they would do a vast amount of good, which at present was left undone—(applause).

The Rev. HENRY SOLLY (Croydon) said that he was glad to second anything which had been proposed by his very excellent old friend Mr. Fletcher Williams, whose admirable work at Newchurch he was well acquainted with twenty years ago. With regard to this Mission it was many years since he first became acquainted with it. He was present at the opening meeting with which that building was inaugurated, when his much esteemed brother-in-law, the Rev. Francis Bishop, was the missionary, and when the late Mr. William Rathbone, Mr. Thom, and other old friends of the Mission were present. He was delighted to hear all that had been said of the way in which Christian and generous-hearted people were bringing gladness and health into the hearts and homes of the poor, and that little experiment of giving drives to poor invalids seemed to him especially touching, and most admirably adapted to the purpose. He had often thought in connection with this subject of the story of the eastern potentate who was so dreaded in his own country, and yet was served with such extraordinary fidelity by his emissaries, who would penetrate into the most secret recesses of the dominions of other potentates and stab them to the heart. It was a matter of the most intense curiosity to a travelled Englishman why this "old man of the mountains," as he was called, who was so much dreaded, was also so well served; and the Englishman, determined to find it out, paid him a visit, and obtained his confidence. The oriental chief took him to a place where a sentry was standing, and said to the sentry, "stab thyself to the heart." The man drew his dagger and dropped dead. They ascended to the highest pinnacle of the palace, and there was another sentry, to whom the chief said, "Throw thyself down," and immediately the man was a quivering corpse below. When the Englishman learnt the secret it was something like this; that these various young men were at first placed in a tent where they were drugged with a particular herb, and in that state of insensibility they were conveyed to an enchanted garden, where they were surrounded by all the pleasures and indulgences which the Mohammedan Paradise promised. After remaining there for a week or a fortnight they were again drugged and brought out to the world, and thenceforward they lived constantly under the thought that death to them would be but the passport to such a Paradise. Now if we, under the influence of an incomparably nobler and purer religion, could only fill the minds of the poor with a sense of the holiness and purity and mercy which God is preparing for them, if those who have the means and the power of giving happiness and health would only strive to fill them with some consciousness of what life and holiness will do, we should find a far larger number of devoted adherents to the Lord Jesus Christ, not from the selfish desire to obtain happiness hereafter, but because the happiness given on earth had been some revelation of Him who was preparing a higher and holier life for them in Heaven. He had much pleasure in wishing God-speed to the Mission—(applause).

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON moved a resolution of thanks to the Chairman for his services to the Society, and for his presidency that evening.

Mr. PAGET made a brief reply, observing that he thought they had had an excellent meeting, notwithstanding the great attractions of the past week.

This closed the proceedings.

THE UNITARIAN ANNIVERSARIES, BELFAST.

The fifty-first anniversary of the Unitarian Society of Belfast has just been celebrated. The preacher of the year was the Rev. C. C. COE, F.R.G.S., of Bolton, who preached admirable and eloquent sermons morning and evening in the Church of the Second Congregation (the Rev. J. C. Street's), Belfast, and in the afternoon in the church at Moneyrea. In both places he was heard with great attention and delight, and collections were made on behalf of the funds of the Society. In Belfast the amount collected was nearly £35, and in Moneyrea upwards of £6. The Moneyrea friends also doubled their individual subscriptions to the Society.

Mr. Ullathorne preached at Carrickfergus on the same day for the Society, and a satisfactory collection was made, while the congregation at Killinchy had already sent as a contribution £1 10s. in aid of the funds. Other churches in sympathy also called attention to the anniversary.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

On Tuesday morning, April 25, the annual breakfast of the members of this society was held in the Castle Café, Donegall-place. There was a large attendance, and the chair was occupied by Mr. HUGH HYNDMAN, LL.D. There were also present the Revs. C. C. COE, F.R.G.S., Bolton; A. Webster, Glasgow; J. C. Street, Belfast; Harold Rylett, Moneyrea; R. R. Dunne, J. J. Wright, Mount-pottinger; J. Cooper, Dr. Ritchie, J.P., Belfast; and Messrs. C. J. G. Eiloart, London; Frederick Allen, London; J. M. Darbishire, Thomas McClelland, J.P.; John Ritchie, James Campbell, R. M'Calmont, F.C.S.; Herbert Darbishire, T. Stronge, T. Ritchie, D. W. Moore, J. W. Bennett, G. Fisher, and a large number of ladies.

After breakfast,

The CHAIRMAN said the first business he had to ask them to proceed with was to welcome the friends who had come from a distance—from England and from Scotland—to express their sympathy, and to help them with the work which they have got to do in this part of the world. He was sure they would be gratified by the large attendance there that morning, especially when they considered that there were a great many difficulties in the way of people attending, because business and household duties would keep many of them away. On the whole, however, he thought they might congratulate themselves on the fact that they were advancing, and that they had something to work upon in the direction in which they were desirous of moving. He regretted to see the absence of some members of the church in Belfast, for he would like to see them taking part in their work the same as in other parts of the country, and he especially wished that some of their Belfast brethren had witnessed the great meeting in Liverpool which he attended the other day, where they all held their own individual opinions on various religious points, but where they all met together and worked pleasantly for the general good—(applause). He thought it was a pity they could not carry that spirit out more fully in Ireland. He was very glad indeed to welcome four gentlemen who were with them—three from England and one from Scotland, who had come across the water to show how much interest they and their friends were taking in their affairs in Ireland, and he hoped they would be able to give them some encouragement and some suggestions in the work they were doing or striving to do, and return to their own country without being obliged to give a doleful view of the position of the Church in Ireland. Regarding Sunday-schools, he looked upon them as one of the principal and most efficient means of promoting the views which they held, and therefore it behoved them as much as possible to develop and enlarge their Sunday-schools. In their school in Hopeton-street he was convinced they were doing a large amount of good work, and it certainly was necessary that their youth should be brought up and trained in the proper path which they should follow through life.

Mr. THOS. McCLELLAND, J.P., moved:—"That we extend to the representatives of kindred Associations who have honoured our anniversary with their presence a hearty welcome, and through them we would convey to the Associations they represent our cordial sympathy and good-will." They were in the habit of hearing very good sermons in Belfast, but he would say that he never heard anything more delightful, or any sermons he more enjoyed, than that preached by Mr. Coe on Sunday last. The other gentlemen had been here on several previous occasions, and to them all he was sure they would all extend a hearty welcome.

Mr. J. M. DARBISHIRE seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. FREDERICK ALLEN, the representative of the Sunday School Association of London, assured the meeting of the warm sympathy of the people of his society in London with the work in which they were engaged in Belfast, both in the Church and in their Sunday-schools, and he trusted they would always be found willing to support them in any work which they might undertake in Belfast.

Mr. C. J. G. EILOART, London, as the representative of the British and Foreign Association, responded, and he was followed by the Rev. C. C. COE, of Bolton, and the Rev. A. WEBSTER, of Glasgow.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT, of Mountpottinger, then read an interesting paper on "Sunday School Libraries," and was heartily thanked for it by the meeting, on the motion of the Rev. HAROLD RYLETT, seconded by Mr. GEO. FISHER. There was a very general desire expressed that an opportunity should be made at an early day for the full discussion of the paper, as it raised many points of interest in regard to the subject of literature for the young.

A cordial vote of thanks was given to Dr. HYNDMAN, on the motion of JOHN RITCHIE, Esq., seconded by the Rev. J. C. STREET. Dr. HYNDMAN having suitably responded, the pleasant proceedings terminated a little after noon.

ANNUAL PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening the annual meeting of the Belfast Unitarian Society and Northern Sunday School Association was held in the Lecture Hall, Rosemary-street, under the presidency of Mr. T. McCLELLAND, J.P. There was a good attendance.

The CHAIRMAN said he found the society during his year of office held fourteen meetings, and he had been present assisting at thirteen of these meetings. The society suffered to some extent by what they all so much regretted—the illness and absence for seven months of one of the secretaries, Rev. J. C. Street; but notwithstanding that, he was happy to be enabled to announce that financially they were in a sound and satisfactory condition, and the sales at the depository exceeded those of any previous year. For this state of affairs at the depository they were much indebted to Miss Dickson, who had discharged her duties with extreme faithfulness, and with a courtesy and kindness approved by all—(applause).

ANNUAL REPORT.

The SECRETARY (Mr. R. M'Calmont) then submitted the annual report.

"Though the year has been marked by a good deal of disorganisation in the work of the society, owing to the protracted illness and absence of one of your Secretaries, the Rev. J. C. Street, and the frequent absence from home of his colleague, Mr. R. M'Calmont, on the whole the society has suffered no great injury, but has gone steadily on in its useful and silent way. The Jubilee meetings were eminently successful, and their influence for good will long be felt in this community. The sales at the depository reached in 1880 the unprecedentedly large sum of £275 14s. 2½d. The same high figure has been maintained in 1881—the sales amounting to £278 12s. 11½d. The number of books sold during the year was 3,131, while large numbers of useful and valuable tracts were sold and given away. Miss Dickson has continued to discharge her duties as agent to the society with great faithfulness and success. The society was represented at the meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, the Scottish Unitarian Association, and the Manchester Sunday School Association, by the Rev. J. J. Wright, George Fisher, Esq., and R. M'Calmont, Esq., respectively, and received a cordial welcome. Only one Sunday-school conference was held during the year, when the Rev. J. A. Kelly read a paper on 'Our duty to our young people.' The report concluded as follows:—"It is sometimes asked whether, in these days, there is really any need for the maintenance of a Unitarian Depository. Your committee are convinced there is great need. Nowhere else can the broad literature of the age on matters of religious thought and life be so readily and so surely obtained; and certainly nowhere else can it be set before the eyes of the people that they may see it and judge for themselves. Your depository has no Index Expurgatorius. Whatever books bearing on any aspect of religious thought are sought for can be procured in your depository, if anywhere. Your committee do not sit as censors, nor decide by vote as to the suitability of any book for sale. The buyer is the judge. But your committee from time to time call attention to books they think specially worthy of attention, and so influence, as well as they legitimately can, the reading and thinking of the public. Your committee express the conviction that the full daylight of religious freedom and truth is still far in the distance, and that their own work and that of their successors for many years to come will be performed amid the deep shadows of ancient and vast superstitions, but that the brighter day will dawn and the perfect light appear. Meanwhile, the duty of all brave and true souls is to stand shoulder to shoulder for the right, to testify to the truth they have learned, to seek reverently for more manifestations of the Spirit of God, to guard valiantly their birth-right of spiritual and mental liberty, and to work and pray for the coming of that true light which will 'shine more and more unto the perfect day.'"

Mr. DARRISHIRE moved and Mr. JOHN F. MULLIGAN seconded the adoption of the report, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. HERBERT DARRISHIRE then moved that the cordial thanks of the meeting be given to the Rev. C. C. Coe for his kindness in preaching the annual sermons. The speaker passed a warm eulogium upon Mr. Coe for his admirable pulpit ministrations, and the good which had resulted therefrom.

Mr. DAVID M'MASTER, Moneyrea, seconded, remarking that the congregation with which he was more immediately connected was under deep obligations to the secretary of that society for the arrangements he had made for affording them an opportunity and privilege of hearing Mr. Coe in Moneyrea Church. He could scarcely express their thanks to Mr. Coe for his kindness in coming out to see them, which he had done at great personal inconvenience. He thought that a great amount of good had been done.

Mr. COE said he had come from a remarkable religious conference in order to be with them that evening. He felt that the meetings which were held in Liverpool a few days since must strengthen their hands here in the difficult task they had to perform, perhaps more than anything that could have taken place. The result of the meetings demonstrated this truth, that people who held diverse opinions on theological matters could come together, and be deeply and profoundly moved in spite of the existence of such differences. Referring to his recent visit to Moneyrea, the speaker said he was glad to have read the report of the proceedings in connection with Moneyrea congregation. He was pleased to learn of the good harmony that subsisted between the pastor and people. He had known something of Mr. Rylett in England; but when he had accepted an invitation to preach at Moneyrea he did not quite realise what it meant or where it was. He was pleased indeed to be present with that congregation, which he found to be large and influential, and he believed there was material there for great success in the future—(applause).

The Rev. J. C. STREET then moved:—"That we rejoice in the gradual enlightenment of the age in matters appertaining to religion, the softening and dissolution of the rigid dogmas of the past, the gradual spread of nobler views of the character of God, and the recognition of personal righteousness as the basis of spiritual communion." He said that all those whose eyes had been opened would have seen through all their literature and in all the public utterances of their public men that there had been a rapid and wonderful development in matters appertaining to religion during the last few years. They would observe there had been a gradual softening of those hard and rigid dogmas which had so long painfully separated men in matters of religion, and put churches into hostile camps, as if they had to fight each other to the death. They would also observe permeating literature and many phases of the human life, an advancing recognition of the spiritual relationship of the world to the living God, who cared for all His children, leading them according to His own ways closer and closer to Himself. They would also have observed throughout all the world there was a greater recognition of the fact that the basis of their union was not the speculative opinions which they were so eager to make known one to another, but the personal righteousness—the personal goodness—which they manifested in their characters, and which they tried to develop in their children.

Dr. GARDNER (Downpatrick) seconded the resolution, which was supported by Mr. EILOART, Mr. F. ALLEN, and Mr. A. WEBSTER.

The office-bearers were then elected.

The Rev. HAROLD RYLETT moved the following resolution:—"That we offer to all workers in, and friends of, Sunday-schools, our deepest sympathy, and we cordially wish them God-speed in all their efforts to develop the religious life of the young."

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT seconded and Mr. ALLEN supported the resolution, which was carried.

After a vote of thanks to Mr. Thomas McClelland for his kindness in presiding at the meeting, and for his services during the year as president of the society, the proceedings terminated.

TESTIMONIAL TO THE REV. J. MODEN.

On Thursday week several inhabitants of Ashford, Kent, met together at the Saracen's Head Hotel to present a testimonial to the Rev. J. Moden, in testimony of their appreciation of his public and private character during his residence in Ashford. The testimonial consisted of a very handsome clock in black marble with red marble pillars, bronze statuettes of Shakespeare and Milton, and two handsome marble tazzas to match the clock. On a plate on the clock was inscribed, "Presented to the Rev. J. Moden, in recognition of his public services at Ashford, by the Chairman of the Local Board and a number of leading inhabitants of the town, April 27, 1882."

Mr. Bugler said that Mr. Moden came to Ashford not many years ago a perfect stranger. He had been a genial and kind friend, and a man that had endeavoured to do his duty. Although they could not agree in his theological views, yet he had dealt with religious questions in such a way that they could but respect him very much indeed—(applause). The testimonial had been subscribed for by some fifty or more individuals, who were desirous of showing the respect in which they held Mr. Moden, and he (Mr. Bugler) most sincerely wished him happiness and prosperity, and that, wherever he might be placed in the future, he would meet with as many or more friends, and as sincere, as he had made at Ashford—(applause).

Mr. EDWARDS bore testimony to the aid which Mr. Moden had rendered at the meetings of the Gardeners' Society, the Fire Brigade, and other local institutions, and his general usefulness.

Mr. E. CHAPMAN spoke to the same effect.

Mr. E. W. THURSTON said that if any one deserved recognition for the services he had rendered during a short stay in the town it was Mr. Moden. He had known Mr. Moden at home and abroad, and wherever he had seen him his estimation of him had always been that of a thoroughly conscientious member of the profession to which he belonged, preaching and practising that which he believed to be right. As a public man, Mr. Moden had endeavoured to do his duty to the best of his ability; and he (Mr. Thurston) hoped that he and Mrs. Moden would live many years in Leicester in the enjoyment of happiness and prosperity.

Mr. SPAIN bore testimony to the kindness Mr. Moden had always shown to the poor; he heard of it on all sides, and especially from the poor themselves. Whenever any good deed was to be done he had always been foremost in giving time and trouble to forward it. He (Mr. Spain) knew that throughout the town Mr. Moden had earned the respect of all—(applause). He was only sorry that Mr. Moden's religious efforts had not been better appreciated, but he knew that Mr. Moden had induced people to attend his church who were not in the habit of going to any place of worship at all, and that was the class of ministers who were wanted. Then, as to the School Board, Mr. Moden gave a great deal of attention to it in the first three years after its formation, and he brought a great deal of knowledge of school board matters, acquired elsewhere, to bear on the business here.

Mr. WILKINSON remarked that he was one of those who, in a religious sense, Mr. Moden picked out of the gutter. He was brought up a strict Churchman; but when he grew older he could not subscribe to the doctrines preached there, the result being that for twenty-two years he never went to a place of worship at all. But when he heard Mr. Moden he found doctrines preached in unison with his own ideas, and a channel that he must follow. As to Mr. Moden's public services, there was no doubt he had been very active and done all the good he could.

Mr. Moden said he had often felt the kindness of the people of Ashford, and now he had come there to receive this handsome testimonial his feelings were too deep for words. It would not have required anything of that sort to remind him of the many pleasant hours he had spent with Ashford people; but of course such artistic objects as these would tend to bring before one's eyes the remembrance of them. He noticed that most of those who had joined in this gift held religious views not in unison with his own, and expressed his gratification in finding that they could sink their denominational differences and join in this kindness towards him—(applause). He had been exceedingly anxious that they might all be reconciled in one common Christian brotherhood, in spite of their religious differences. They must not confound the moral level of righteous purpose, social activity, and spiritual life with the religious forms and opinions which persons might hold in connection with them. This principle was not much accepted in this locality, hence he had not been able to do all the good he could have wished; they would not accept his services, but had regarded him as a heretic and had held aloof from him. He did not think he had one single thing to regret in regard to his connection with the School Board; he observed courtesy at all times to his colleagues, and endeavoured to do his duty to his constituents, never being absent from a single meeting, except when he was away for a short time for a holiday, and he thought his name was written rather largely on the handsome and commodious school buildings. Mr. Moden also alluded to the movements he had endeavoured to start for the incorporation of Ashford, for the embellishment of the principal streets by planting trees, his work in connection with the suppers for the poor, the penny reading entertainments, and the debating society, and spoke hopefully of his prospects in Leicester, observing that the men who had made their way in Leicester did not appear to be so estranged from their fellows as some of the successful men dwelling in other towns were: there was a hearty good feeling pervading them which augured well for the moral health of the place, and he concluded by again thanking all most heartily for their kindness.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Bugler for presiding, and to Mr. Wilkinson for the trouble he had taken in connection with the matter, ended the proceedings.

The Liberal Pulpit.

CHARLES DARWIN—IN MEMORIAM.
BY WILLIAM BINNS.

Old in years and possessed of world-wide fame Charles Darwin has just passed away. They buried him in Westminster Abbey, close by where Newton is buried. The Abbey is a fitting tomb, and the neighbourhood of Newton is the place of all others most suitable. Side by side moulder the bodies of the interpreters of the heavens and of the laws of the development of life on earth, while the mighty minds which once tenanted the bodies pursue their education for ever in ever-changing spheres.

It is twenty two years since Darwin startled the world of science with "The Origin of Species," and struck the theological world with dismay. Loud and long were the cries of anger on all sides, and these were loudest and longest where the new doctrine was least understood. Charlatan, Materialist, Atheist, were the names freely bestowed on him. They were all lies; for so far from being a charlatan, Darwin was a model of a scientific worker; so far from being a Materialist, he always recognised intelligence at the root of matter; and, so far from being an Atheist, he almost went out of his way to repudiate sympathy with that dreariest of the aberrations of humanity. Soon, very soon, the scientific world recovered from the shock that startled it. Last year Professor Huxley delivered a lecture on the coming of age of "The Origin of Species," and when it came of age there was hardly a man of note, or a man competent to form an opinion in Europe or America, who did not agree with its main principles. Here and there, no doubt, some of the older naturalists remained unconvinced; but even they modified many of their former views. Certainly the doctrine had no longer any thorough-going opponents, and its critics treated it with profound respect, and only professed to be waiting for more proofs. The theological world was slower in coming round, for it was more ignorant of the matters in dispute, and laid down the law with an arrogance proportioned to its ignorance. But by degrees it ceased to snarl, and grew into believing that perhaps the new ideas might serve to prop up the tottering walls of the old system.

A dozen years after the publication of "The Origin of Species," and when the wildness of the storm was dying away, "The Descent of Man" appeared, and the storm began to rage anew and with greater fury than ever. There was no sound reason why this should be the case. "The Descent of Man" only applied in one special instance the principles which had been already elaborated and fairly proved in "The Origin of Species." But, somehow, people seem to like to keep some one corner dark and hidden away from the sunshine, and they retreat into this, and refuse to let the daylight enter there, although they admit it everywhere else. Man was the dark corner they wanted to keep, and they struggled hard against illumination with a devotion worthy of a better cause. But at length they surrendered this last stronghold, the flag of science waved from its summits, and the flag of superstition was hauled down, and religion, which was expected to perish when the stronghold changed masters, renewed its life, and is now more vigorous than ever.

Darwin has revolutionised scientific thinking in the department of living creatures. With him there has begun a fresh epoch. The books of five-and-twenty years ago serve our purposes no longer. We have a new nomenclature. The struggle for existence, the survival of the fittest, environment and evolution, have taken the place of older phrases, and by their means we are able to explain a host of facts which under the previous dispensation we were obliged to leave in mystery, or expected to explain by a particular interposition of Providence. Mr. Fishe in America, Mr. Herbert Spencer in England, and Professor Haeckel in Germany, have all made great use of Darwin's hypothesis, and have pushed it to conclusions which may or may not be correct, but for which, whether correct or not, he must not be held responsible, as he has not drawn the conclusions himself. Darwinism proper keeps within moderate limits. Darwin does not venture to tell how the universe comes into existence, and he builds it up from a protoplasmic cell, as Mr. Herbert Spencer does, with a sublime daring that shrinks from nothing. Nor does he empty the vials of his wrath on other thinkers, and maintain a running fire against religious beliefs, as Professor Haeckel does, with the audacity of a man who seems to fancy that he alone is wise, and that all who differ from him are fools or knaves. Darwin deals with facts that he has accumulated or personally observed, and modestly suggests a probable interpretation of them, while he is invariably reverent in the presence of primary religious ideas, and even behaves courteously towards dogmas in which he has no belief.

The old idea of the origin of various species, an idea entertained alike by the bulk of scientific men and by theologians, was this—God created them independently. At the fiat of His word there sprang into being a pair of each sort. Whenever a new species appeared, it appeared through the direct fresh activity of God. The species did not run into one another; they were all distinct. God made them all complete to start with, out of the dust, or out of nothing, and there was an end of it. He never let one species grow out of another. When we come up to man the process of a new creation was again repeated. An impassable gulf separates one species of the animal kingdom from another, and separates man from all the rest. In this day there is a particular act of God to originate all the vegetable varieties, and the varieties of insects, fishes, birds, and animals. He begins de novo each time, and never uses up the old material or modifies the old organism to serve new ends. Another variety of butterfly requires another direct personal creation by God. Now, the species, as naturalists has been wont to reckon them, are hundreds of thousands in number. This idea of origin seems to be that entertained by the author of Genesis ch. 1., and therefore theologians clung to it. The problem was mysterious, and has been little investigated, and, therefore, men of science generally fell into much the same way of thinking as the theologians. They might not be so crass as the bulk of the theologians in their anthropomorphic conceptions of the nature of the act of God in creating. Still, in the main, they were quite as confident that species were distinct. Here and there a naturalist of a more speculative turn of mind, and at distant intervals, allowed for the influence of natural causes in modifying species, and suggested that within certain limits one species might be varied into another. And there was a strong tendency to reduce the number of independent species as far as possible. Lamarck theorised on the subject at large, and so did the author of "Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation," popularly supposed to be Robert Chambers. But in these guesses there was little system, and no intelligible process was presented.

It was reserved to Darwin to frame a theory of a higher order. He had long noticed that plants and animals often produced offspring that slightly varied from the parent stock, and sometimes largely varied. They did this in a state of wild nature. He had noticed, too, that gardeners and breeders were able to take advantage of these natural variations, and so by degrees produce something very different—so different that, if we did not know how it had been produced, we should call it a distinct species. He studied pigeons, and saw how all the different sorts, differing so widely, were descendants of the common rock pigeon. Finally, his hypothesis took this shape. Without going back to the very beginning of life in the mere aggregation of cells, he supposed a number of primitive forms of a rude type, yet containing the possibilities of higher forms under the influence of favourable circumstances. Every creature produces offspring so numerous that the larger number must quickly perish. Otherwise the earth would soon not have space enough for the offspring of any one. Where there are the means of life only for a certain number, then there is what he calls a struggle for existence, the weaker members are killed off, and the stronger survive. This he calls the survival of the fittest. There are born some varieties of creatures with some peculiarity that enables them say to catch their prey more readily than others. This is an advantage, and they live when others die. They pair, the process goes on for many generations, and ultimately we get a new species. This natural selection, or survival of the fittest, is assisted again by the fact that the strongest males are most likely to get mates and produce offspring. The weak ones die childless bachelors, both because their stronger companions beat them in combat for the female, and because the female has an eye for beauty and utility, and does not take to them. In this way, always bearing in mind that time is of no account, for we can draw upon it illimitably, the primitive forms with which we began millions of years ago have produced—by means of the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence, by adaptation to their environment, and by sexual selection on the part of the females of the finest males for partners—the various species that now exist. There has been no great leap or break in the continuity. Imperceptible gradation from one form to another has been the steady order of nature. The same process was pursued with respect to man. Before there were men there were beings who were half-human. These half-human beings were the natural variations of apes. Men are natural variations of these half-human beings. Our immediate ancestors were hairy, with long ears, tails, and of arboreal habits. I mean immediate in physiological order. History knows nothing about them. Human varieties once originating out of this half-human stock, they survived and gained masterdom. They had stronger social instincts. They had a rude language which grew, a rude tendency to civilisation which grew, a rude tendency to religious beliefs which grew, a rude tendency to morality which grew. And so we finally arrive at the men of our own era, the heirs of all the ages who stand in the foremost files of time.

This hypothesis has many difficulties, and he states them with admirable fairness, and frankly admits that the hypothesis cannot be proved. But he holds that it rests on an enormous basis of facts, and gives a better explanation of how the existing state of things may have come about than any other hypothesis gives. Science now echoes his verdict, and says the reality is beyond knowledge, but this is the most probable account of how it has all been. It is not Biblical. It cannot be harmonised either with creation in six days, or Adam and Eve, or Noah's ark, or the common notions concerning the Fall and Redemption of man. But if these Hebrew and Christian ideas be subordinated to larger and undogmatic views of religion, we shall find Darwinism essentially religious. The position takes a Creative Intelligence at the root of all; he holds the moral law and the religious sentiment to be the ripest flowers of many stages of evolution through which life has passed; he points out that the story is a story of progress, and encourages the hopes that higher stages still will follow; there has been no fall; the first step was upward, and the ascent has been constant. If this has been the method of nature, we must also call it the expression of the will of God; and we must so reform our Biblical criticism, and our anthropomorphic conceptions of design, as to bring them into harmony with the facts of the case. Any way, in the struggle for existence religion will eventually survive.

Obituary.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

We announced the death of Mr. Emerson in our last impression. He was buried on Sunday last near his friend Hawthorne, in the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, close to his late home at Concord. We now subjoin the admirable memoir from the Daily News :—

Though nearly seventy-nine years of age, and though his memory had for some years been failing, Mr. Emerson's general health had been so good that the announcement of his severe illness was a surprise. His philosophy had always included a practical as well as theoretical worship of health; and it is doubtful if he who in early life wrote, "Give me health and a day, and I will make the pomp of emperors ridiculous," had for forty years lost a day by illness up to the severe shock suffered ten years ago by the burning of his house. A brief tour in Europe appeared to have entirely restored him; but gradually it was found that his memory for the names of persons and things was slowly deteriorating. At the funeral of Longfellow he seemed to be at a loss to know the cause of the agitation and sorrow before him. His attractiveness to every word addressed to him had become of almost painful intensity, showing his struggle to overcome this invisible power which was drawing him farther and farther away from the circle of loving faces around him. But he continued his walks amid the familiar woods and fields around Concord, and in these scenes and solitudes his face is said to have been radiant with happiness.

Ralph Waldo Emerson was born May 25, 1803, in Boston, of a family variously distinguished in the colonial and modern history of New England. His father, a celebrated scholar and divine of the early Unitarian movement, died while Ralph, second of five sons, was yet a child. He was sent to the Latin School, as it was called, in Boston, and excelled in classical languages and studies. He entered Harvard University at fourteen years of age, and during his college life was remarkable for his fine translations from classical authors, his enthusiasm for Shakespeare and old English literature generally, and his refined elocution. Brought up under the auspices of such orators as the Rev. Edward Everett, then Professor of Greek at Harvard, and Dr. Channing, whose church the family attended, there was every prospect that young Emerson would become a shining light in the ministry, a profession that had become traditional in the family. After graduating he taught for a time, and then began the study of theology. It is probable that when the story of Emerson's life is written it will appear that his becoming a Unitarian preacher was due to influences other than the suggestions of his own genius. At any rate the study of theology does not seem to have agreed with his health, and he passed the first winter (1826-7) after his "approbation" in the south. At this period he wrote a good deal of poetry. In January, 1829, he was installed as pastor of a large and fashionable Unitarian congregation in Boston, a connection which continued to the autumn of 1832, when he resigned his pulpit on account of having adopted views of the sacraments resembling those of the Quakers. This pastoral work of Emerson, which lasted less than three years, and was never resumed elsewhere, made an important page in the religious history of Boston. For one thing, he was the first to open his church for anti-slavery lectures, a thing that even Dr. Channing had never ventured. Though only twenty-six years at his installation his preaching made a profound impression, and he was made chaplain of the Massachusetts Legislature. He entered with zeal on the philanthropic and educational work of Boston, and was regarded as judicious and practical beyond his years. Soon after Emerson's connection with the Boston church he had married Miss Ellen Tucker, to whom as "Ellen, at the South," one of his sweetest poems is addressed, beginning:

The green grass is bowing,
The morning wind is in it;
'Tis a tune worth thy knowing
Though it change every minute.

'Tis a tune of the spring;
Every year plays it over
To the robin on the wing,
And to the pausing lever.

She died, however, early in 1832. It was therefore from the shadow of a great sorrow that Emerson sought to escape by his first journey to Europe, which occurred in the following year. It was then that he made his pilgrimages to Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Carlyle, described with so much spirit in "English Traits," certainly one of the ablest and most entertaining books ever written about this country. How thoroughly Carlyle appreciated this visit is shown by a note concerning it quoted in Mr. Froude's recent work. The friendship formed between these two men at Craigenputtock lasted during their lives, a fact not a little remarkable when it is considered how diametrically divergent their views became as time wore on. There is an unpublished legend that on the one evening passed at Craigenputtock by Emerson in 1833, Carlyle gave him a pipe, and, taking one himself, the two sat silent until eleven o'clock, then parted, shaking hands, with congratulations on the pleasant evening they had enjoyed. It would seem, however, that there was a great deal of conversation on that occasion, though it is probable that Carlyle did not recognise the man before him so fully as he himself was recognised by Emerson. It appears, indeed, that the Boston scholar had been very eagerly studying Carlyle's "Signs of the Time," "Characteristics," and other early contributions to the Reviews, and that these may have had something to do with that discontent with pastoral offices which led to his withdrawal from the ministry. Emerson found Carlyle rather contemptuous towards Unitarianism, and Coleridge claiming that his previous heresy while he was a Unitarian had only expanded in his Trinitarianism. "If," he said to Emerson, "you should insist on your faith here in England, and I on mine, mine would be the hotter side of the faggot." Wordsworth gave the young Bostonian much advice upon his duties as an American citizen. On the whole, however, the amount of help and light which Emerson received from these several shrines was quite measurable, and he had learned much about that "self reliance," of which he afterwards wrote so finely. The only public appearance which Emerson made in England on his first visit was in the Unitarian pulpit in Edinburgh, now occupied by the Rev. Robert Drummond. On his return to America he declined all inducements to take charge of a congregation, though he still occasionally preached. An eminent journalist, Charles Congdon, of the New York Tribune, in Reminiscences published a few days ago, describes Emerson's visit to New Bedford. "One day there came into our pulpit the most gracious of mortals, with a face all benignity, who gave out the first hymn, and made the first prayer as an angel might have read and prayed. Our choir was a pretty good one, but the best was coarse and discordant after Emerson's voice. I remember of the sermon only that it had an indefinite charm of simplicity and wisdom, with occasional illustrations from nature, which were about the most delicate and dainty things of the kind which I had ever heard."

The same writer remembers certain lectures given about that time at New Bedford so "enchanting" that, he says, "I have hungered to see them in print, and have thought of the evenings on which they were delivered as true 'Arabian Nights.'" Emerson, in 1834, was evidently desirous of transferring his work from the pulpit to the "platform," which was beginning to be represented by mechanics' and other institutes. Many of the lectures of these years have never been published. His subjects were chiefly from English biography and literature. In September, 1835, he married Lydia Jackson, of Plymouth, Massachusetts, and immediately went to reside in the house at Concord where the rest of his life was passed. Concord had been the home of his ancestors. Celebrated in American annals as the place where the first resistance was offered to British arms in the War of Independence, that town has now gained a happier fame as the home of the thinker who has won English homage for the best fruits of independence. It is probable that in no two American homes have more Englishmen received hospitality than in that which has made Concord famous, and in Craigie House, once Washington's headquarters, whence came Longfellow's hymns of humanity and peace to conquer the hearts of our English people. For some time previous to his marriage Emerson had resided with a relative, Dr. Ripley, in the "Old Manse," at Concord, which has been made famous by Hawthorne's volume of sketches, "Moses from an Old Manse." There Emerson wrote his small volume, entitled "Nature," published in 1836. The poetic elevation of this essay was generally admired, and its charm of style admitted, but it was to take some time yet before the busy matter-of-fact citizens of America could comprehend this auroral flame of idealism. In the same year Emerson edited "Sartor Resartus," compiled by his friend, Dr. Le Baron Russell, from "Fraser," this American edition being the first appearance of any volume by Carlyle. Emerson's lectures, and his transcendental essay "Nature," had prepared Carlyle's audience in America. Carlyle also had the advantage of an optimistic interpreter able to utilise the quickening breath of his stormy genius, while turning aside with the providence of Franklin's rod any dangerous thunderbolt. Carlyle was warmly invited to visit America; but, as he could not do that, he seems to have been read there through Emersonian eyes, and his teachings hopelessly turned to the service of those "nigger emancipation" and other contemporary "gospels" which he so berated.

What has been known as New England "Transcendentalism" alarmed theologians of all schools in that region, and more especially those of Harvard University, who inherited the responsibility of having led the people away from the ancient standards of orthodoxy. This alarm took the form of certain manifestoes from the Unitarian doctors of Divinity College after a famous pantheistic address given by Emerson before the graduating class of that college in 1838. But it did not require more time than it did in the case of Darwin's generalisation to pass from the era of anathemas to that of homage. It is probable that at any time within the past twenty years the majority of thoughtful Americans would have pointed to Ralph Waldo Emerson as the man who had done more than any other to rekindle the religious life of his country, whose chief sign of activity was in the reaction against the relics of a Puritanism long discredited. Emerson's works were first introduced into this country in 1841, with an introduction by Carlyle, in which he said:

The name of Ralph Waldo Emerson is not entirely new in England; distinguished travellers bring us tidings of such a man; fractions of his writings have found their way into the hands of the curious here; fitful hints that there is, in New England, some spiritual notability called Emerson, glide through reviews and magazines. Whether these hints were true or not true, readers are now to judge for themselves a little better. Emerson's writings and speakings amount to something; and yet, hitherto, as seems to me, this Emerson is perhaps far less notable for what he has spoken or done than for the many things he has not spoken, and has forborne to do. With uncommon interest I have learned that this, and in such a never-resting, locomotive country, too, is one of these rare men, who have withal the invaluable talent of sitting still! That an educated man, of good gifts and opportunities, after looking at the public arena, and even trying, not with ill success, what its tasks and its prizes might amount to, should retire for long years into rustic obscurity, and, amid the all-pervading jingle of dollars and loud chaffering of ambitions and promotions, should quietly, with cheerful deliberateness, sit down to spend his life, not in Mammon worship or the hunt for reputation, influence, place, or any outward advantage whatsoever: this, when we get a notice of it, is a thing worth noting.

The publication, in England, of this and the second series of essays, which succeeded a year or two later, having stamped him as a thinker of indisputable originality and power, many of his friends were desirous that he should re-visit England and deliver courses of lectures similar to those he had given in various cities of the United States. The matter was taken up in this country by many, and especially by Mr. Alexander Ireland, whose friendship Emerson had found on the occasion of his visit to Edinburgh in 1833, and who made the necessary arrangements. He came in 1847, and it was in this country that the lectures that make the volume known as "Representative Men" were first delivered. The "Emersonian Sermon" in "Alton Locke" is an indication of the profound impression which Emerson had already made upon the minds of young Englishmen. The works of John Sterling also prove him to have been deeply stirred by the writings of Emerson, and it is to be hoped that the letters which passed between these two will now be published. Emerson lectured first in Manchester, then in London, and afterwards in various other cities and towns. In 1848 he travelled on the Continent, and in company with Arthur Clough witnessed some of the revolutionary proceedings in Paris. The influence of Emerson steadily increased in his own country, and the effect of it on a certain order of minds was visible in the famous association at Brook Farm, the scene of Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance." A literary biography of Emerson would be largely that of all the thinkers of his time in America. Happily the materials for that history are fully preserved in the writings of Margaret Fuller, Hawthorne, E. W. Curtis, O. B. Frothingham, and many others, who have always been eager to record their great debt to this great illuminator of their lives with the noblest ideals. The Dial, which he edited for some years in conjunction with Margaret Fuller, was the veritable register of a new day. Emerson also exerted a great influence in the direction of negro emancipation. His eloquence and his scholarly enthusiasm, taking the side of the lowly, were the means of carrying to the help of the humble reformers thousands of cultured young men, of the same class with those who made the noble list of Harvard martyrs in the war. Emerson has, indeed, espoused every advanced cause of his time. He has bravely advocated the woman suffrage cause, and, among the few purely political causes which he has resolutely promoted is that of Free Trade. "America," he said in one of his public addresses, "means opportunity, freedom, power. The genius of this country has marked out her true policy; opportunity—doors wide open—every port open. If I could, I would have Free Trade with all the world, without toll or custom-house. Let us invite every nation, every race, and every skin; white man, black man, red man, yellow man. Let us offer hospitality, a fair field and equal laws, to all. The land is wide enough, the soil has food enough for all. We should cling to the common school, and enlarge and extend the opportunities it offers. Let us educate every soul. Every native child, and every foreign child that is cast on our coast should be taught, at the public cost, first, the rudiments of knowledge, and then, as far as may be, the ripest results of art and science."

Emerson is precious to many English readers, largely because he is above all the true poetic seer of the New World. In his nine volumes there is no pessimist word or thought, his hope is always as wide as the world, and his faith in the tendency of man and nature invincible. An idealist never afraid of materialism; a reformer calm in his perfect trust in the good heart of the people; an interpreter of great men who called no man master; Ralph Waldo Emerson has exerted on our age a unique influence, an influence impersonal, spiritual, and at the same time co-ordinate with science. He has also exerted an influence in the highest degree moral and humanising. He has left a widow, two daughters, and one son, a physician in Concord. But all who dwell in that town will feel that they have lost a beloved relative and an exemplar. Two of his finest essays, one on "Love" another on "Domestic Life," remain nearly the best things in our language on those subjects; and they are all the more replete with wisdom and beauty to those who know that his family and near friends have lost a heart most tender, true, and faithful in him whom the world mourns as a great light gone out on the coast of life.

THE FUNERAL.

The funeral ceremonies on Sunday afternoon were very simple. Private services were held at the house at half-past two, and an hour later public services were held in the Unitarian church at which Mr. Emerson was a pretty regular attendant during the last years of his life. The church was thronged with townspeople and with eminent citizens from Boston and vicinity, for whom a special railway train was run. The services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Furness, of Philadelphia, an old school-mate and life-long friend of Mr. Emerson, and addresses were also delivered by the Revs. Dr. Hedge and James Freeman Clarke. At the conclusion of the service the body was borne to the cemetery, a quarter of a mile distant, the pall bearers and friends following on foot. The body had been embalmed, and the face wore the same calm and peaceful expression which so eminently distinguished it in life. The remains were deposited in a grave near Hawthorne's, with those of Mr. Emerson's first wife, son, and brother. Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, near Concord, where he lies, was consecrated twenty-seven years ago, when Mr. Emerson delivered the address. There was no ostentatious display of grief at the service to-day, but the utmost simplicity and solemnity.

MR. JOHN BRENT, OF CANTERBURY.
We deeply regret to announce the sudden death of Mr. John Brent, which took place on Sunday week, at his residence on the Dane John, Canterbury. The immediate cause of death was heart disease.

The late Mr. Brent was the son of Alderman Brent, who more than once filled the post of Chief Magistrate, and who was Mayor at the time so much excitement was caused by the proceedings of the notorious impostor Courtenay. His mother was a member of the well-known Kingsford family, and early in life he was engaged in business, but the study of literature and archaeology was to him more congenial than commercial pursuits. He was a member of the Kent Archaeological Society, and a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. It is by his work, "Canterbury in the Olden Time," that he will be chiefly remembered. This book, which was the result of many years of study and investigation, was very favourably noticed by the press, and won for its author a high position amongst English antiquarians. Mr. Brent wrote "The Sea Wolf," "Ellie Forrester," and other novels; and "Atalanta," "Winnie," and several other poems. He was a frequent correspondent of Notes and Queries, the Gentleman's Magazine, and the Antiquarian Magazine.

In politics Mr. Brent was a staunch and consistent Liberal with somewhat peculiar views on some subjects, but on the whole he had the confidence of his party, and especially of the working men. Whatever his opinions might be he always avowed them fearlessly, and was never dismayed, however small a minority he might belong to. As a rule he held himself aloof from cliques and recognised only the broad lines which divide the two great political parties in the State. He was opposed even to the abolition of politics in the election of Councillors, and did his best to stop the non-political system now existing, conscientiously believing it to be not for the best interests of the city. At times he was an effective speaker, although his style of delivery occasionally spoilt the otherwise good effect that his speeches would have had. But on the whole he was a valuable and trusted leader of the Liberal party, one who was upright in all his acts, courteous to his opponents, and faithful to his friends.

About forty years ago Mr. Brent was elected clerk of the Canterbury Board of Guardians and superintendent registrar. He occupied a seat in the Council for many years. He was elected an alderman, but resigned in 1871 in order to secure the post of city treasurer, which he held for about seven years. On the formation of the Canterbury and East Kent Permanent Benefit Building Society he was elected secretary, and he held the office up to the time of his death.

One of Mr. Brent's chief characteristics was his earnest desire, of which he gave many practical proofs, to alleviate human misery, and to assist those who were suffering from oppression and wrong. When the suppression of the Polish insurrection caused many refugees to come to this country, Mr. Brent became the local secretary of the Polish Association. He was also a member of the Anti-Slavery Society; and he supported many other philanthropic movements. Only a few weeks ago he organized a meeting at Canterbury to protest against the practice of vivisection, and delivered a most earnest and pathetic speech. He was a member of the Canterbury School Board; and, in order to teach the boys to treat the lower animals with kindness, he formed a Band of Mercy, for the members of which he recently provided a tea and entertainment.

Mr. Brent's connection with the Canterbury Museum extended over many years. Some time ago he published a catalogue of the antiquities the Museum contains, and he was appointed honorary curator of the department. He has made many donations to the institution, and took a great interest in the proceedings of the Museum Committee. We believe he possessed an excellent collection of ancient flint implements discovered in the district.

Mr. Brent married a daughter of Mr. Hounsell, a surgeon residing in the West of England; and she died about six years ago. He leaves no family; but two sisters and four brothers survive him. By his integrity, straightforwardness, and kindness of heart he won for himself a high place in the esteem of his fellow-citizens of all classes. He was seventy-three years of age, and nearly the whole of his long and useful life had been spent in Canterbury. Mr. Brent during the greater part of his life took an active interest in the Blackfriars (Unitarian) Chapel, but of late he had, from various causes, ceased to attend the services, although we have reason to believe that there was no change in his theological sentiments.

COLLEGE CHAPEL, STEPNEY.—The annual meeting was held on April 26, and was presided over by C. H. James, Esq., M.P. The chapel was fairly well filled. Mr. James said that he was pleased to find a chapel in East London, and two handsome school-rooms, which could not fail to be of service to the cause of pure religion in such a district. Mr. James then gave a most interesting address for fully twenty minutes, contrasting the present condition of society in England with the state of society when he was a boy. Much as we might deplore the sad state of Ireland, he recollected well when similar terrible scenes of disorder, fire, and bloodshed were witnessed in parts of England, and he hoped that great changes would ere long come over Ireland. He trusted very much to education both in day and Sunday-schools, and the progress of religion among the masses. He gave some account of his own efforts, in conjunction with others, to build up a Christian Church and Sunday-school in his part of Wales. He urged upon all present to work persistently and vigorously, so that they could testify that they had felt they had worked and made sacrifices for the good cause. The chapel reports were read by Messrs. Davis and Cook, which showed a steady improvement in both finance and chapel attendance. The meeting was addressed by the Revs. J. P. Ham, R. Spears, J. Van der Straaten, and by Messrs. Pyott, Malbey, Barrow, Taylor, Reckenzaun, Cornish, Jones, Wade, Toye, and Spelling. During the evening the choir sang several pieces of sacred music. The usual thanks to the chairman, &c., closed the meeting, one of the most successful and interesting that had been held here. The chapel was beautifully decorated with evergreens and flowers.

A LESSON FROM KUENEN.

ALTHOUGH Dr. KUENEN's lectures make no direct attack upon the Orthodox mythology, their indirect application is very obvious, and the fact of their delivery under University sanction at Oxford is a striking sign of the times. "Hibbert Lectures" a short while ago would have seemed as likely to occur at Mecca as in one of our old Universities. Their being heard in Oxford is an indication of the force with which an inquiring spirit is replacing the old unreasoning receptivity, and they will prove more valuable as scatterings of seed upon hopeful ground than from the positive amount of new information to be gathered from them. If we try to sum up their teachings, we find in them an application of the scientific doctrine of development, which is necessarily and diametrically opposed to the notion of Divine government by cataclysm and miracle. Yahwehism, according to KUENEN, passed through a series of natural stages, and was itself a natural outgrowth from what preceded it. The great thinkers amongst the Hebrews expanded the Yahweh conception beyond the limits of popular superstition and priestly ceremony. As they made it ethical, they raised it from the local to the universal, and thus fitted it to be the basis upon which the higher development of Christianity arose by methods as natural as those which are traceable in the earlier growths. JESUS of Nazareth, acting in the direction indicated by the wiser of the prophets, was himself the Founder of Christian Universalism, and not, as some have erroneously pretended, only the maker of an advance in Judaism, which would have remained, and local religion, had not others supplemented and extended it. This view, upon which KUENEN emphatically dilated, places CHRIST in his true position as the Great Teacher; but it is not in any way consistent with the supernatural theories of the Trinity and Incarnation. Neither in the moral world nor in the material does the development idea clash with a firm belief in the Divine government of the universe, but it abolishes the distinction between the natural and the supernatural: a distinction whose two grounds are ignorance and superstition.

The great thinkers amongst the Jews had arrived at a lofty ethical conception of Yahweh long before "Israel's preaching to the heathens was more than a pious wish." Dr. KUENEN accounts for this by saying, "It was because, before the servant of Yahweh could be a light to the heathen he had to be duly trained for his task." Unitarians find nothing new in these ideas, but they are quite inconsistent with the Orthodox notion of Bible inspiration and authority. The Bible is really what Unitarians have so long affirmed, a story, unchronologically arranged, of the growth of religious thought amongst a people of remarkable genius, for truth combining moral aspiration with intellectual speculation. In this way he recognised a providential design, but one marked out by the method of growth in successive stages, each one rising noticeably out of the preceding conditions.

If we apply the development doctrine to a branch of natural history, such as botany, we find very different gradations in the power of existing types to produce varieties. Some plants reproduce the parent form with pertinacious exactitude; while others, under appropriate treatment, supply the gardener with very important and useful variations, obtained and fixed in a short space of time. The same sort of facts meet us in the animal world, and when we look to human societies, we find some races and classes reproduced in long succession without any important change, and in other cases the frequent occurrence of individuals greatly beyond the average in some important capacity. No one has yet explained the reason why some families of plants, and some races of men, exhibit a progressive impulse much more than others; but the causes are, no doubt, referable to a law, that is, they belong to a regular method of operation, and are to be reckoned as fulfilments, not distinctions of a continuous plan.

We hope some, at least, of the Oxford Divinity students will carefully compare the KUENEN illustrations of historical development with the aspirations and assumptions of the creeds and articles they must accept if they enter the Established Church. It is becoming increasingly difficult to recruit the clergy with young men of sufficient ability and education to have any chance of influencing the cultivated classes, and who can be warranted orthodox in their opinions. The KUENEN lectures will add to this difficulty. They will prompt to further inquiry; and investigation is fatal to a religion that has not life enough to change. Dr. KUENEN justly claims for Christianity the vital principle of growth. Its "mutability" he calls "a priceless blessing." What, then, must be said of attempts to prevent its growing beyond the conceptions of pre-scientific times?

EMERSON'S INFLUENCE UPON LIBERAL THEOLOGY.

WHEN a great man dies a gap is made in the world's ranks, and we are often more conscious of his worth than while he is still among us. We at least begin to seriously ask ourselves what his work was, and in what his work to us and the world really consists. We have recently had to ask ourselves these questions respecting a great transatlantic but English speaking-poet, and we found he had glorified and beautified many of the relations of life and helped his fellows to gather inspiration from, and see a divine life pulsing in and through the phenomena of nature and the panorama of history. We have also still more recently had to ask ourselves similar questions as to the worth and work of a world-famed naturalist of our own race and land, and we have seen that the dignity of his labours and their imperishable worth are to be found in the mighty visions of related and inter-dependent existence which he opened up to our astonished and admiring gaze. And now we are called upon to estimate the labours of another of the world's greater sons, who was both poet and seer; we have to ask ourselves what claims the "Sage of Concord" has upon the gratitude and admiration of his fellows, and in what way he has specially helped to advance the slowly rising tide of human thought, progress and happiness. Happily this is an easy task, for all are agreed that his influence upon the higher life of his age has been deep and abiding. To us, however, as pioneers of religious thought and progress he stands in exceptionally close relations, and there are probably few congregations among our Free Churches which have not been largely modified by his influence.

Born of an intellectual New England parentage, which was Unitarian in its theology and Puritan in its lofty virtues and moral strength, EMERSON started upon the race of life with no small amount of inherited mental and moral power. By his thorough preparation, too, for the work of the Christian ministry, his intellectual and moral faculties were alike cultivated to the utmost. That he remained for so short a time in the ministry may be a matter for regret. Still there was other and no less sacred work for him to do. He was destined to be the English speaking Apostle of man's direct relation to GOD, he was to be the preacher par excellence of the Gospel of CHRIST in a form and under conditions which gave him a hearing with tens of thousands who might never have listened to him, in spite of his great genius, had he remained the regular occupant of a pulpit. While ceasing to be a Christian minister in the conventional sense of the term, he became the most distinguished preacher of Christianity in that form which can alone conquer the allegiance of the modern world.

Previous to the introduction of German thought into England by COLERIDGE and others, says Mr. COOKE in his recent "Life of Emerson," the influence of LOCKE and BENTHAM had been predominant. All innate ideas were denied and morality was based on custom or utility. To this scheme of thought most English and transatlantic Unitarians adhered, according to the author just quoted. They believed, in short, in what may be spoken of as a purely mechanical revelation. Now it was against such views that EMERSON protested. The new thought of which he became the leading exponent was a strong reaction against this old conception of revelation; it was an attempt of the human man to recover a natural and assured faith in moral things and in the directness of the religious life. It declared that man has a faculty transcending both the senses and the understanding, by means of which he finds a new basis for morality, and is brought into immediate contact with eternal things. EMERSON, for instance, as its great apostle, claimed for man a direct relation to the universe; he urged that it is illogical to see the immediate action of God in the revelations of old, and not to trace or recognise it in the spiritual life of the present age. His contention was that God reveals himself through every pure soul, and that every holy aspiration, every upward breathing of a sigh after divine things, is a sign of the indwelling and ever active Spirit of God, and that thus there is an ever-progressive revelation going on in the bosom of humanity.

These ideas and beliefs are usually summed up in the term Transcendentalism. This system may be considered under two aspects: its ethical and spiritual manifestations, which is virtually living on to-day, though under new forms; and its social outgrowth, such as the Brook Farm Community, which was doomed to pass away, after enjoying but a merely ephemeral existence. With the rise of New England Transcendentalism there was formed an enthusiastic band, who certainly believed that the day of a new and nobler life had dawned upon the world. EMERSON himself does not seem to have shared in the exaggerated hopes and beliefs of his friends and followers, since he never joined the community just mentioned, but contented himself with visiting the little world of enthusiasts who formed it. Alas! for the latter their scheme of life shared the fate of so many other visionary projects, and they had to abandon their cultured communism and come back to the slow ways and the dull plodding of the great world they had left. What we are more immediately concerned with, however, is the spiritual side of the Transcendental movement. It was in a lecture delivered at Harvard in 1837 that EMERSON first gave a full and distinct statement of the purposes and hopes of which it was an embodiment. He was then thirty-four years old, and had reached the zenith of his intellectual, though hardly of his spiritual power. Five years had elapsed since the resignation of his pulpit at Boston, and he had visited Europe for the first time and made the acquaintance of his life-long friend, CARLYLE. All his leading ideas found expression in this address, which, delivered with the full flush of the ardent hopes of early manhood, naturally attracted much attention. He dwelt, says the author already quoted, upon the law of Mind and its identity with nature. The "man thinking," of whom he spoke, is the man of intuition, and he insisted upon a rejection of books for an immediate inquiry into truth. The mind, he contended, was more than the instruments it had created—more than its own products. "The end of all truth is character, and a more perfect moral nature. Help can come to us only from our own bosoms, and all things become revelations of truth, because man is related to all." The most beautiful, however, of his thoughts was that "the strain of upper music is heard only in action and in bearing the common burdens of life."

It will be readily understood that this bold individualism had its more direct theological side, which could not fail to clash with the received opinions of even the relatively enlightened school of divinity in which he had been educated. It was some time, however, before it found expression. The new prophet seems to have waited, indeed, for a suitable opportunity to unburden his mind before his old tutors and friends, and at last the opportunity came. Though not a divine in the conventional sense of the world, he was asked to deliver the customary annual address to the students of the divinity class in the Harvard University. This was in 1838, a year after the delivery of the memorable lecture already mentioned, and it was on a Sunday evening in July, when he made, in this way, the first full statement of his faith in the Religion of the Spirit. Some of those who doubted the practical wisdom of his words felt, we are told, that what he said came nearer "the centre and core of things" than almost anything ever before uttered on the subject, while others were subdued into deepest reverence by "the gentle prayer" he made on the occasion, "which had in it no pronouns." There was the glowing vision of the seer and the devoutness of the saint in him side by side with opinions which many of his old friends honestly deemed incompatible with the maintenance and efficiency of Christian institutions. Not that he uttered a word that was other than in perfect harmony with the profoundest verities of the Christian faith. But in his admiration of the Universal, in his claims for untrammelled Individualism, in his rejection of all that was special and supernatural in Christianity, he seemed to be removing the very foundations of the faith he extolled and exemplified. Here are a few of the ideas to which he gave utterance:

Virtue is a sentiment of delight in the presence of certain divine laws. Those laws are not external revelations, they are the ordered pulse-beats of the Living. All Obedience to these laws makes the health and integrity of the soul. The truth can always be had by those who desire it, but each one must seek it for himself. God acts through all souls and no one is the measure of his truth. Jesus was a great prophet, but his power has been sadly degraded by adoration of him. Christianity found a man with an intuition and elevated the man, forgetting the universal power of the truth he taught. In the growth of true sentiments is to be found the only real conversion, not in any faith in a person. God is in every man, and he should be heard there. The old revelation is loved in lack of faith in the living truth. The true preacher must dare to love God without mediator or veil.

It will be noticed that the address in which these were prominent utterances, was pervaded by a spirit of Pantheism, though of the loftier and devout kind, and that it robbed CHRIST of all external authority. Either of these characteristics might have sufficed to render the Concord prophet a heretic; taken together it can hardly be a matter of astonishment that they had that effect. Be this as it may, the authorities of the University practically condemned him as a heretic, though, thanks to the force of truth and the vitality of his own ideas, in less than a generation he was chosen lecturer in the same University, and delivered his last course on the "Natural History of the Intellect" in 1870. But what is specially interesting to us as a denomination in the divinity address of 1838 is that it was listened to by THEODORE PARKER, then an obscure man, who was so moved by its stirring and lofty thoughts that he wrote the same evening in his diary, "my soul is roused in me," and proceeded to register the resolve to carry out a new and more searching method of religious teaching. We all know the result; we know how for good or for evil PARKER'S influence has been revolutionising the theology of our own churches and filtering down into others for the last twenty years. Thus EMERSON, whom the world mourns to-day as a great literary genius, and whom thousands on both sides of the Atlantic have long loved as a revered master, was the spiritual father of the man whose name is identified with the broad, and, as some still think, heretical, views of Christianity which are gaining ground in our midst.

Those of our readers who know anything about EMERSON'S works need not be told that his strong and richly suggestive thought is everywhere linked with a beautiful and soul-stirring mysticism. His words seem to clothe truths direct from the invisible world, they are symbols of a life passed in conscious relationship to the deep and holy verities of eternal things. If he erred it was on the side of an excessive individualism, it was in heeding too little the principle of authority as a requirement of weaker minds. But those who may differ from him in matters of opinion cannot fail to be moved and elevated by the consciousness that he dwelt much with God.

PREACHERS AND PREACHING.

WE have heard much of late about the ineffectiveness of preaching, and very well-meant and sometimes very sensible suggestions have been made with a view to amendment and remedy. The remarks hitherto made, so far as we are acquainted with them, do not seem to penetrate quite deep enough; they trim the boughs of the subject, but do not alter the condition of the root. They point to the intellectual rather than to the moral and spiritual side of a minister's qualification and training. Intellectual preparation there must undoubtedly be, and that too of a high order; but more important still, is careful attention to the general fitness of the character considered as a whole, heart as well as head, natural temperament and disposition as well as literary culture and capacity. The general tendency of our times in relation to education is to pour into the mind something from without rather than to draw out something from within. If the word education be derived from educare, to nourish, difference of opinion arises as to what really is the best nourishment of mind; and if the word be derived from educere, to lead forth, educators ought very carefully to study the natural undeveloped elements of character which they profess to educate. Some minds are forced by their trainers to grow like trees of the exogenous order, receiving all their accretions from the outside; others are judiciously allowed to grow endogenously by additions to their centre. But there should be a flow of life in both directions. No one can utterly ignore the influence of the outward, whether in present life or past literature; but to nourish a mind exclusively with the dogmas, opinions, logical or fanciful forms of thought of by-gone scholars and theologians is hardly likely to promote health, strength and freedom. It encumbers rather than enriches a mind. Some men seem to suppose that wherever there is much learning there is much intelligence; but this does not always follow. Intelligence is a light which shines in the whole character, not merely in a part; it is always harmonious and beautiful, whereas the intellect when cultivated exclusively may throw the character out of balance, become hard, ugly, and repulsive, and a harsh consumer of the affections. Truth has to be sought through the medium of the affections as well as of the understanding. Healthy emotions and delicate sensibilities are as necessary as sound reasoning in every department of thought.

Ministers of religion in this age and this country must undoubtedly be highly cultivated men; for it is found that culture when properly varied and rightly pursued has a tendency to produce a general refinement of the whole character in the highest degree favourable to purity of life and practical morality. It takes away the vulgarity and coarseness which sometimes concrete like an oxide round things that are substantially good at the core; it makes virtue attractive by making it beautiful. But the culture of schools and colleges is too often partial and patchy—a prominence given to one or two specialities and a neglect of the qualities needful to give them complement and harmony—a glittering here and there of one or two spots of light, but not a diffusion of gentle intelligence over the general atmosphere of the mind. Our ministers of religion are, we believe, well instructed, scholarly men in general, with rectitude of intention and blameless private character; but if they be young they must necessarily be lacking in one thing needful—a deep, varied human experience; and if their lives have been passed in secluded places of study and freed from the vicissitudes that mark the majority of human careers, they must almost necessarily be unable to enter fully into states of feeling generated out of the care and sorrow, toil and trouble of circumstances and influences totally different from their own. They may write good sermons, but that is not exactly the same thing as to live good sermons. They may utter wise words from the head, but these may not be always identical with words of the heart, which old THOMAS FULLER used to call “Cordiloquy.” They may have good-will and a sincere desire to render us service; but where is the power that comes out of a deep knowledge of human nature and an intense sympathy with its trials? They may be scholarly, refined, graceful, pleasant and kind—all very desirable and excellent qualities; but in the hour when our souls are “exceeding sorrowful,” when clouds of doubt and darkness gather over our mental skies, when “agonies and bloody sweat” stand upon our brows as we struggle with the imperfections of our temperament, with the dire temptations of the flesh and the contagious influences of a frivolous and sinning world around us, can these accomplished young gentlemen in the pulpit impart, out of their knowledge and experience, any strength and consolation to our souls? They would if they could, no doubt; and perhaps they may be able by-and-by; for their turn of trial and struggle, of endurance and sorrow, is almost sure to come sooner or later; and when they have gone into their Gethsemanes to weep and pray, and gather spiritual strength, they will come forth immensely better qualified to render help to others.

It is within the limits of possibility that some young ministers whose qualifications are rather of the literary and academical kind than of the spiritual, may yet incidentally and unawares be of some service. If they are good sermon-writers and good speakers it is possible that what are words to them may awaken life in others; for there are a few good people in the world who are excellent listeners, and will get more out of a sermon than the preacher ever thought to put in. They seem to have a faculty of getting “figs from thorns, and grapes from thistles,” and as long as there is any possibility of doing that, thorns and thistles are not to be condemned as utterly useless things. JUVENAL himself admitted that there were men who could show the way to others without knowing it themselves, “Qui sibi semitam non sapiunt, alteri monstrant viam.” They could describe it verbally. Without utterly repudiating that kind of help we should for our own parts greatly prefer as a spiritual guide one who had actually travelled the road which he described, and upon whose form we could see traces of all that he had gone through; the dust and the rain, the wind and the storm, the hunger and thirst, the effort and fatigue.

The minister of religion, to whatever Church he may belong, must, in addition to his intellectual qualities, be emphatically a man, with light in his mind and love in his heart, and with pulsations of beautiful life behind every beautiful word. He must be one who has laughed and wept, struggled and striven, mounted up, fallen down, been disappointed, thwarted, cast-down yet not dismayed, one whose whole life has been an aspiration and a prayer. The congregation that possesses such a minister should treat him with respect and reverence, with generosity and delicacy. For the matter of stipend that surely ought to be liberal even though it involve a little sacrifice and strain on the part of the suppliers. £150 a year recently proposed as a minimum appears to us too low. The average stipend ought, we think, to be not less than £200, considering that living in these days has become somewhat costly. Some congregations, it may be, are so small and so poor that they cannot raise amongst them any salary whatever. In such a case would it not be wise to carry on the worship without any minister at all? Ministers are very useful indeed in the various organisations connected with congregational work; but for the worship of the Heavenly Father they are not absolutely indispensable. Worship may go on almost as well without them as with them. It is very pleasant and refreshing for us all to “take sweet counsel together and walk to the House of GOD in company”; but when there, is it really essential that we should hear a sermon? All devout minds and hearts in the hours dedicated to worship are inwardly occupied in composing little sermons of their own. It has been a favourite fancy of ours that there ought to be in every Church a space set apart for silent worship as distinguished from that which is verbal and vocal. Both kinds are good, and we should like to see room for both. As a motto or inscription over the lintel or arch of that part of the building reserved for mute worshippers, one might perhaps not inappropriately borrow this line from Euripides—Σιγα, σιγα, λεπτον ιχθυς—Silence! silence! gently step! The inward, soundless speech that rises out of the heart in such silences might possibly be quite as efficacious as a minister’s sermon. If, however, from inveterate national and social habit we must continue to have sermons in all our Churches, are there not hundreds upon hundreds of volumes of sermons printed and published, enough and to spare for all the congregations that need them? The far greater part of this kind of literature is, we suspect, destined to find its way into chandlers’ shops as wrappers to candles or pennyworths of cheese; but amidst the immense mass of poor stuff there is a good deal which is not poor. In sermons as in other things there is a “survival of the fittest,” and amongst those that have survived and will survive there are some so excellent in literary form and so pure and spiritual in tone that they might be preached again and again from any pulpit in England. For poor dissenting congregations without a regular minister and unable adequately to pay one, these printed sermons would be the very thing, for any member of the assembly with a good voice would be able to deliver them.

In the preceding remarks it will be seen that we have not strewn the subject with rose-water. A little gloom and sadness hang over it: the difficulties are very great; but difficulties are vanishing things in time and should not generate despair. Human nature is in process of evolution. Its condition, though higher than it was ages ago, is still far short of what we should like it to be. It will rise higher by-and-by, and we must bide our time. If our best men are not always in our pulpits it may be because they discern a more effectual way of bettering humanity and choose a different agency and position. Those already in our pulpits if not the best are next to the best, and in point of character and endowment are by no means unworthy of our honour and regard. As for the wish expressed by one writer that members of our “best families” could be tempted into the ministry we are by no means anxious on that point. We care more for the best men than the “best families,” though we admit it to be quite possible and even probable that some of the “best families” do contain some of the best men. At Manchester, Liverpool, Leicester, Birmingham, and some other places it is cheering to observe that somehow or other the right menseem to have fallen into the right places. In their Churches there seems to be life in the pulpit and life in the pew, and happy influences flow through many minds and hearts from “the day-spring on high.”

THE DUBLIN TRAGEDY.

THE terrible crime committed in Ireland has some profound lessons for us; but none are so blind as those who will not see what these lessons are; and for the last two or three days we have been hearing sentiments against which every true Liberal should firmly protest, even in this hour of shame and mourning. We were told last Monday that in America “the almost universal exclamation was, ‘This seals the fate of Ireland, and decrees the downfall of Mr. GLADSTONE.’” These words point out the source from which the crime has sprung. It has been probably perpetrated by American Irish, who live, and live sumptuously, on Ireland’s unrest, whose vocation would be gone if a policy of conciliation succeeded in making Ireland happy and contented, and who thought by this foul blow to indefinitely postpone the day of peace and rest. But never was a wicked attempt destined to more signal failure if England now only does her duty. After a long period of callous indifference to mutilation and murder—an indifference which shows how deeply the canker of misery had eaten—Ireland has now awoke to a horror of assassination, and wishes no longer to profit by the assassin and hide his fall. It should now be possible to take more efficient steps for the prevention and detection of crime, with the consent and co-operation of the Irish nation. And yet there are everywhere people saying, "This shows Mr. FORSTER was right." It shows that locking up DAVITT and PARNELL threw the control of the Irish movement into the hands of fools and fanatics, while letting them out has enabled them to head a national expression of detestation of such crimes. It may have been necessary to confine them for six months and break up the Land League in order to allow the Land Act to come fairly into operation; but had this or some similar crime been committed while they were still in prison nothing but harm could have resulted, more stubborn angry feeling on either side the Channel, more disposition of both parties to cling to the force which is no remedy. As it is, we may have a historic parallel to the fact of early Christian days when "the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church;" but it all depends upon whether England is just enough to avoid confounding the innocent with the guilty, and generous enough to accept in a large-hearted spirit the evidence of Ireland's remorse.

A LETTER FROM CHICAGO,

CHICAGO, April 24, 1881.

I want to send my old friends one more letter from the Far West. I am moved to do it by hearing that our two foremost American Unitarian ministers—the Revs. James Freeman Clarke and Edward Everett Hale, both of Boston—are to be in England this summer; indeed, Mr. Hale is already on his way, and Dr. Clarke sails on May 13. I have been so often sorry to hear of our American ministers slipping through England without their presence being sufficiently known to ensure our people getting hold of them that I thought I would take care this time to let their coming be known beforehand. Now that Dr. Bellows is with us no more, these two men are our American leaders—and not our leaders only, but leaders in all that is best in American philanthropy and public life. I hope that, as authors, they are already known to your readers, for Mr. Hale's "Ten Times One is Ten," while full of the fascinating originality which characterises all his stories, is also better than any sermon; and Dr. Clarke's "Ten Great Religions" has opened to many a mind the world-wide and world-old greatness of the religious factor in humanity. But I will venture to mention something about each of them which is probably less known and will be of special interest in England. Dr. Clarke was the one Boston minister who, though himself no radical in Theology, cordially fellowshipped Theodore Parker, and continued to exchange pulpits with him, thereby losing a number of his own most influential supporters, all through the period when Theodore Parker was almost excommunicated by American Unitarianism. Dr. Clarke's church, the "Church of the Disciples," is also noteworthy, not only for its crowded congregation, but as being the one of our churches over here which approximates to the "open church system." There are no pew rents; but it is supported by voluntary yearly subscriptions, not by the offertory. It is curious how impossible it seems to be to revive the offertory here. American Christians pay much more largely for the support of their churches than English ones—but nothing could induce them to do it through the weekly offertory. Collection boxes or bags, except on special occasions, awaken no sense of responsibility, such as used to make the poorest Sunday scholar in Strangeways like to put in something. You could not support a respectable cat on an American offertory!

As to Edward Everett Hale, one incident has always struck me as a fine illustration of his thorough fairness and courage: in the early days of the war, when all America was at fever heat, and when at the news of the taking of the Confederate envoys, Mason and Slidell, from the "Trent," that heat rose into a passionate outcry applauding the deed, the very next Sunday Mr. Hale went down to his church, and declared before his great congregation that it was wrong, and that those men had got to be given back! I believe he was the first public man to take this stand—but when you see him and hear him, you will understand how he was just the man to do it.

There is another man of whom I would like to say a word to my old English friends—to make one of his books known to them, for he himself is not likely to visit England this year. I mean the Rev. Minot J. Savage, who, some nine years ago, came out from the Congregationalists, and now has gathered about him one of our largest congregations in Boston. He is about the most powerful preacher of our younger men—perhaps a little given to hewing the orthodox "Agag in pieces before the Lord," and then rather apt to turn and hew Samuel in pieces, also, by way of complete impartiality! But along with his incisive logic there is a grand sincerity and religious fervour in his preaching which makes you soon forget what school of theology he belongs to. It is, however, one of his recent books, which I want to make more widely known, his volume of sermons on "Belief in God." I can only say that, outside the writings of Dr. Martineau, I have seen no work that so successfully grapples with the agnosticism of the day. One of those sermons "Does God Exist?" seems to me the most cogent statement of the theistic argument that I have ever met with, and the others, on the "Personality of God," "Prayer," "Worship," &c., are almost as striking. When I came across the book recently it held me till I had finished it, and that so helpfully that I felt it upon me to try and make it more widely known.

I suppose this will be my last letter from Chicago. I have had nearly seven happy years here. I would have liked to remain here a few years longer; but as I could hardly contemplate settling here for life, and am getting to an age when men do not have many more openings, this invitation to the pulpit of Dr. Channing and Dr. Gannett, and to a congregation still aglow with their spirit, was irresistible. I rejoice, with trembling. One joy is that I shall be able much more frequently to visit my dear old friends in England, and to have them visit me.

BROOKE HERFORD.

CHICAGO: CHURCH OF THE MESSIAH.

The following letter and resolution, extracted from the Chicago Tribune of April 22, will explain themselves:—

CHICAGO, April 21.

To the Trustees and Congregation of the First Unitarian Society—Church of the Messiah.

My Dear Friends.—You are aware that I have recently received a call from the Arlington-street Unitarian congregation in Boston. After much earnest and anxious thought I have come to the conclusion that I must accept it, and I have therefore to tender to you the resignation of my ministry here.

In terminating a connection which has been throughout without break or jar, and in which I have found great interest and happiness, I owe you something more than the mere announcement of a proposed change.

May I remind you that when I accepted your own call I was so conscious of a doubt whether this could be a permanent settlement that I made the express proviso that at the end of six years, if I felt it best to leave, I should be free to do so without any interpretation of suddenness or unreasonableness? Those six years are more than past. It is, indeed, over seven years since my ministry among you really commenced; for, though my previous visit, in 1875, was nominally only for three months' "supply," yet your reception of me was such that I felt myself something more than a casual visitor. My three month's engagement was prolonged to the close of the Church season, and when I brought over my family in January, 1876, it was rather a renewal than the commencement of my ministry here.

These seven years have been years of rare interest and invigoration to me, and touched on the beginning by a wealth of kindly feeling which makes the thought of parting very painful—and yet I think it is best.

The causes which have led me to this decision are two—the one personal, the other relating to the character of the work.

The first is this: I hardly reckoned upon the strain of heart and feeling that it would be to live permanently so far from my old friends and kindred, and of late the longing has kept increasing rather than lessening to be either among them again, or at any rate a little nearer, within reach of quicker and more frequent communication.

The second cause relates to my work and my power of doing it. The ministry of religion in this eager, absorbed Western life requires much the same alertness, electric energy, and readiness for strain and tension as does Western business. To do his best work a man should come here while his mental limbs still have the spring and flexibility of youth, be able to become a thorough Westerner in feeling and sympathy, and be quick to throw himself into, initiate and lead, new plans of work. Now, the simple fact is that, for all this, I came here about fifteen years too old. I have tried not to let you find it out. I hope that to some extent I have succeeded; but it is none the less true; and in a very few years at most you would perceive it. I believe, therefore, that I can best lay out my life and power henceforth in a ministry more like that from which you called me, and into which I had grown through twenty-five years.

I have not sought for this change. I have not sought for any change. If I could choose I would rather such an opening had been deferred, that I might have worked on among you here for two or three years more. But, within a few months of its becoming clear to me that I must not try to settle down here for life, came this urgent invitation to Boston. It seems to me, on the whole, of all openings that have come to me, or are likely to come, the most eligible and hopeful, and, as I cannot help feeling that, if I am ever to leave, there can hardly be a time when the Church of the Messiah could better stand a change than now, I think it best to accept the invitation. I have, therefore, to resign my trust into your hands. If I do not say more it is because my gratitude for my own past, and my hopes for your future, are too deep and tender to be expressed in such a communication.

BROOKE HERFORD.

The Trustee stated that Mr. Herford said he would leave the society to fix on the time when the resignation would take effect. They had laboured with the pastor to stay, but without effect, and they felt that it would be of no use to delay the acceptance of his resignation any longer. It was eventually agreed to accept it, to take effect from July 31, and the following resolution was then unanimously passed:—

"The First Unitarian Society of Chicago have received with profound sorrow the resignation of the Rev. Brooke Herford, their pastor, and desire to place upon their record this memorial of their high appreciation of his faithful and efficient ministry, and of their regret that that ministry is about to be terminated. During his pastorate of more than six years among us Mr. Herford has constantly illustrated, both by precept and by example, the high qualifications which should characterise the Christian ministry. His sincere and earnest piety, his ripe scholarship, and his quick sympathy have not only endeared him to the members of his own parish, but have enlarged the circle of his influence to include much of the best thought and culture of our city. While his labours among us have broadened and strengthened the foundation of liberal Christianity, the catholicity of his faith and teachings has won for him the respect and esteem of all Christian people who have come within the circle of his acquaintance or influence. It is, therefore, unanimously

"Resolved: That, while we hereby accept the resignation of Mr. Herford, we at the same time extend to him the expressions of our heartfelt sorrow at the conclusion of a ministry which we had hoped might continue for many years, and we join as with one voice in expressing the hope that abundant success may crown his labours in the new field to which he has been called."

MR. J. G. HOLYOAKE has received a grant of £100 from the Premier in order to visit America to report on Co-operation.

MR. DARWIN has left an autobiography behind him.

THE REV. P. W. CLAYDEN is writing a biography of Mr. Samuel Sharpe.

Occasional Notes.

M. CHASTEL, the venerable professor of Ecclesiastical History at Geneva, and one of the foreign correspondents of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has had the degree of D.D. conferred upon him by the University of Strasburg.

It is interesting to record that the earliest schoolmaster of Darwin was the Rev. George Case, minister of the English Presbyterian congregation at Shrewsbury, the father of the late well-known W. A. Case, M.A., vice-master of University College School. It is stated by the Rev. S. Myers, the present minister of the congregation, that "in that church the whole family of the Darwins worshipped Sunday after Sunday, and Charles Darwin was a regular and most constant attendant. Children of Dr. Darwin, Charles Darwin's father, were baptised by the minister, as the baptismal register testified.

It is stated in some of the papers that the Princess Louise attended Bedford Chapel on Sunday week. When Mr. Stopford Brooke was Chaplain of the British Embassy at Berlin her sister, the Princess Royal, frequently attended his services.

THE Advertiser, of Boston, U.S., has been taking a census of church attendance in that city on the 16th of April. The showing is quite favourable to Boston piety. The total was 124,909, of whom 77,465 were present at the first service and 47,434 at the second. In some cases the figures represent three services, but these are not numerous. The total attendance at Baptist churches was 15,775; Congregational, 15,003; Unitarian, 10,131; Jewish, 1,063; Lutheran, 591; Methodist Episcopal, 9,336; other Methodist, 2,058; Presbyterian, 3,130; Roman Catholic, 49,337; Swedenborgian, 530; Universalist, 2,337; miscellaneous, 3,513.

The New York Independent says that one of the serious charges made against Dr. Newman Smyth's orthodoxy is that he believes it not wholly wrong to pray for the dead. Whereupon the Congregationalist says:—"If the state of the dead be such that prayer for them is legitimate, desirable, and useful, it cannot be a state as yet fixed beyond recovery." Passing the consideration whether any Calvinist who believes in the final perseverance of the saints could properly pray for living believers, we would call attention to the last sentence in the article about Dr. Bellows, from the pen of Professor S. M. Hopkins, D.D., of Auburn Seminary, which reads as follows: "The Lord grant unto him (and unto us) to find mercy of the Lord in that day." That is a prayer for a dead Unitarian from a Presbyterian theological professor.

At the recent meeting of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church in England, held in Regent's-square Church, London, the question of Subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith came up for consideration. Testimony after testimony was given in a very outspoken way to the burdensome character of the Confession. Dr. Edmond said that "candidates for the eldership were deterred by the very severe way in which the Calvinistic doctrines were expressed in the Confession. It was not very surprising, he added, if people considered there was a severity about the Confession that they found it difficult to accept." An elder in Dr. Dyke's congregation said that the difficulties complained of were widespread. He hoped the Church would be prepared to move in the direction of truth and liberty. Another speaker pithily remarked that there was such a thing as getting into too cast iron fetters, such as they did when they adopted the Confession. Mr. James Robertson, of Hampstead, said he was one of those who had serious doubts about the Confession of Faith. He was a minister in Scotland for two years, but gave it up, as he could not continue to preach what he did not understand. He thought nothing should be done until they were prepared to alter the Confession itself. Mr. Armour, of Liverpool, said that some of the most promising students for the ministry sought out another profession, because they could not subscribe the Confession, many points of which were out of harmony with the Church to which they belonged. It was a seventeenth century document, framed by fallible men, and the Church should bring herself into the light and leading of the nineteenth century. Dr. Donald Fraser said he had heard with great satisfaction the remarks that had fallen from the various speakers. He was still at a loss to understand what amount of dissatisfaction existed. If, however, the seventeenth century Confession was found unsuitable, let them frame a new one. Ultimately it was agreed that the matter should stand over for a year; but a most satisfactory feature in the whole discussion was the general expression of a feeling that even the Presbyterian Church had outgrown the old Confession. Will they give up their old endowments as they compelled the English Presbyterians to give up Lady Hewley's fund and other endowments? The Scottish Presbyterians are too canny for that.

AN unusually well-informed correspondent writes to us in reference to our recent articles on the Rev. John Hunter's York Lectures:—"Many of the Liberal Independents who will not work with Unitarians, or exchange pulpits with them, are virtually Unitarians themselves, agreeing with them in almost every point of importance, as you have so clearly shown in the articles on 'Dissolving Views of Orthodoxy.' And this in spite of their own Trust Deeds! Mr. Hunter ought by his chapel deed to be a Calvinist of the narrow type of his predecessor, the Rev. James Parsons. But he and many others live and preach in habitual violation of the duty legally attaching to their ecclesiastical position by their Trust Deeds." We confess for our own part that so far from regarding with satisfaction the spectacle of a Liberal occupying an Orthodox or close trust pulpit like that at York, we could without loss of equanimity bear to see their expulsion from every such pulpit as well as from the Congregational Union. We are among those who value honesty and sincerity far more than any amount of theological agreement. At the time of the British Association meeting in York a well-known Independent minister in the North, who would not on any account exchange with even Conservative Unitarians, invited Mr. Stopford Brooke, who publicly rejects all belief in the miraculous origin of Christianity, to occupy his pulpit. A similar invitation was at about the same time extended to him from an Independent congregation in Cambridge. If Mr. Brooke is wisely advised he will not listen to overtures of this kind from men who are only too ready to avail themselves of his great popularity without following the example of his outspokenness and fidelity to conviction.

We learn that at the Annual Breakfast and Business Meeting of the Sunday School Association, to be held in London in Whit-week, Edwin Lawrence, Esq., LL.B., will preside, and the Rev. F. E. Millson of Halifax will read a paper on "The Changed Methods for Changed Conditions of Sunday School Work."

OUR valued correspondent the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams of Liverpool gives the following illustration of "Darwinianism" in ancient times:—"It would seem that there is nothing new under an Eastern sun. In the course of my reading I came the other day across a curious character, in the person of a Mohammedan saint of the name of Mahmud, who lived in the time of Timur, about 1400 A.D., in a village in Gilan, near the Caspian Sea. This personage issued a fatwah to the effect that with him (Mahmud) the Islamic Dispensation had come to an end. The Mohammedans have found passages in the Bible in which the coming of Mohammed is foretold, and Mahmud discovered a verse in the Koran in which his advent was indisputably predicted. He had only, of course, to announce his divine mission and personality to attract around him a great number of disciples; and this number increased so rapidly and to such an extent that the Persian Government took serious alarm, and the Mullas denounced Mahmud as an arch-heretic. With all this and with his peculiar tenets I have no immediate concern, but his ideas on creation are of some interest at the present time. The alpha of creation was, he said, an atom of earth, or, as he calls it, 'nuktah-i-khak.' This atom of earth underwent strange changes, and in the course of time spread abroad in the shape of plants; the plants by gradual development became animals, and to this class belongs man. But not rapidly did this grand result ensue, for we are told that when man had sufficiently developed himself, so as to form a distinct species, the 'human form divine' was still very imperfect. Since then, however, it has been gradually throwing off impurities and advancing in glory, generation after generation, until it reached its perfection in the person of Mahmud, with whom Islam came to an end."

As an additional testimony to the value of our Sunday-schools, one of the oldest and most respected of our country members writes to us as follows:—"Every now and then I have evidence of the value of such institutions. When at C—I not only introduced a Sunday-school but gave an hour or two in the week for the instruction of young people who were anxious for improvement. In my class I had several lads, from one of whom the enclosed card inquiring for my present address was forwarded to me. I found he had pursued my instructions with advantage, and was lately chosen Chairman of the Education Board of K—, in Canada, where he and his brothers have risen to much local influence and usefulness. He is full of gratitude for the few crumbs of knowledge he received from me. I believe that if ministers were more earnest in their efforts to sustain our Sunday-schools as well as our congregations the position of many of our Churches would be greatly improved."

We are glad to announce that at the Ministers' Open Conference at Dr. Williams's Library on the Friday of Whitsun week Dr. James Freeman Clarke, of Boston, U.S., has promised to deliver an address on "Methods of Church Work." He will also occupy the pulpit at Little Portland-street Chapel on the morning of Sunday, June 4. Every additional opportunity which our distinguished visitor gives us of hearing him during his brief visit to London will be eagerly welcomed.

THE Rev. Dr. Fairbairn, of Manchester, was this week elected Chairman of the Congregational Union for the ensuing year. Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, was again nominated, but was defeated by a majority of fifty.—As many as 439 votes were recorded in favour of Dr. Parker. How thankful we have reason to be that we are not connected with the Congregationalist body!

THE Congregational Union has been holding its annual spring meeting this week. On Monday the business meeting took place, when the report was read and the new President elected. On Tuesday at Westminster Chapel, after a devotional service, the President, the Rev. Dr. Macfadyen, of Manchester, delivered an address, entitled "The Ideal of the Christian Church." He remarked that, assembled as they were as members of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, they did not forget their right to say they believed in the Holy Catholic Church, and they claimed association with the past, and claimed as their heritage the entire past of the Christian Church. They did not believe that their Lord's promise had failed, and that for many centuries between the era of the Apostles and the revival of the Congregational polity, 300 years ago, the gates of hell prevailed against the Church. They saluted all the Churches. Their churches were an attempt to express the yearnings of the heart of man for the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to realise that in outward form. To say that the ideal had never been reached was no proof that it was false, and if they erred in cherishing that ideal it was an error at once pleasing and profitable. But they did not err in cherishing it. The illusions of life were not necessarily delusions. Imagination was a faculty to be trained, not eradicated. Ideals did not remain ideals; they tended to become facts. Ideals had no modesty; they must be expressed; they must fight; they could not rest until they conquered or were conquered. If they realised their ideal, with what holy ingenuity would they improve their methods! They were not contending as Congregationalists for a human sect, but for the ideal of the Church of Christ. At present did not that fact seem all but forgotten amongst them? Radicals as they boasted themselves in politics and social questions, was there anywhere to be found more intense Conservatism than sometimes prevailed amongst them regarding the methods of their Church life? Surely this was reducing Congregationalism to the level of a sect, and forgetting that it sets forth the ideal of the Church of Christ. Congregationalism had made a nation. It had only once had the chance of laying the foundation of a nation, but it had nobly wielded its opportunity. It had made New England an intellectual garden, covered it with busy markets, schools, colleges, and universities, and adorned it with order and liberty, with moral progress and mental activity, religious sensibility and large-hearted liberality. They were addressing themselves now—late, though not, they trusted, too late—by united effort to bring the Gospel and its blessed influences to the homes of their countrymen.

In reply to a letter asking for his intercession on behalf of the Salvationist prisoners Mr. Bright wrote Mrs. Booth as follows:—"House of Commons, May 3, '82.—Dear Madam,—I gave your letter to Sir W. Harcourt. He had already given his opinion in the House of Commons, which will be to some extent satisfactory to you. I hope the language of Lord Coleridge and the Home Secretary will have some effect on the foolish and unjust magistrates to whom in some districts the administration of the law is unfortunately committed. I suspect that your good work will not suffer materially from the ill-treatment you are meeting with. The people who mob you would doubtless have mobbed the Apostles. Your faith and patience will prevail.—I am, with great respect and sympathy, yours sincerely, (signed) JOHN BRIGHT.—To Mrs. Booth, 101, Queen Victoria-street, London."—We read this letter with pleasure and entire concurrence. We have from the first expressed our sympathy with the good work which the Salvationists are doing, while disagreeing with their theology and their peculiar methods. The magistrates who have indirectly sanctioned mob violence, and illegally imprisoned these well-meaning fanatics, are, in our opinion, more foolish and mischievous than the ruffianly law-breakers themselves. The English magistrates and mob are treating the Salvationists just as Wesley, Whitefield and their followers were treated in the last century, and history will pronounce the same verdict of condemnation.

BOTH Houses of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury met on Tuesday. In the Upper House the opium traffic formed the principal subject of debate, while in the Lower the propriety of observing a day of humiliation and prayer was considered. We have not much faith in special days of humiliation and prayer, but we do think that the opium question would be a very fitting subject for a strong resolution at the approaching anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Why should we lag behind all other religious bodies on these great moral questions?

WURZBURG, the ancient city of Bavaria, is to celebrate next July the jubilee of its university. The fetes will last several days, and will include a grand historical and allegorical procession. This will comprise groups representing the foundation of the university, the celebrity it has acquired in Germany and abroad, and its development during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. The university was founded in 1522 by Bishop Echter. At present it has a thousand students, mostly in medicine.

The Liberal Social Union held its monthly meeting on Thursday evening, April 27, at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall. The chair was taken by Edwin Chadwick, Esq., C.B., and a paper was read by Mr. Edward J. Watherston, author of "Our Railways: should they be private or national property?" on "Our Iron Highways." A discussion followed, and the proceedings terminated in the usual way.

Thomas Carlyle. A History of the First Forty Years of his Life (1795-1835). By James Anthony Froude, M.A. Two Volumes. London: Longmans. 1882.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

Circumstances to which we need not further allude have prevented us from resuming our notice of these most valuable and extremely interesting volumes. In our former notice, published before the Liverpool Conference, we summed up our general impressions of the work as a whole, and we need not now enter upon an outline of Carlyle's career, which we gave in full in four articles upon the "Reminiscences" just a year ago.

The correspondence, which forms the largest part of both volumes, is a complete revelation of Carlyle's mental and spiritual history, of his gallant struggle with the most adverse circumstances and the formation during maturing of his literary work.

The tragedy of Carlyle's life, as appears more plainly in this memoir than in the "Reminiscences," was the spoilt life of his wife. Her first and most devoted attachment was to his friend Edward Irving, to whom her whole heart was given, and who was peculiarly qualified to inspire the most romantic affection. But he was bound by an early promise to marry the lady who afterwards became his wife, and who kept him to his engagement, even when she knew that she no longer had his heart's best affections. She was evidently a weak hysterical kind of woman, who understood but little of the higher qualities of Irving, and encouraged only his morbid tendencies. "There would have been no tongues," said Mrs. Carlyle, in after years, "had I married Irving." But Irving was not to be hers. Jane Welsh was romantic and highly cultivated. Carlyle with all his faults and eccentricities, his uncouth appearance and peasant birth and manners, was after Irving the only man of real intellectual power she had then met. To assist and further the advance of a man of extraordinary genius who was kept back from rising by outward circumstances, was not without attraction to her. As Mr. Froude plainly puts it, Miss Welsh after having lost Irving had consented to be Carlyle's wife as soon as he was in a fair position to marry, in the conviction that she was connecting herself with a man who was destined to become brilliantly distinguished, whom she honoured for his character, and admired for his gifts, in whose society and in whose triumphs she would find a compensation for the disappointment of her earlier hopes. But men of genius are "kittle folk," as the Scotch say, and Carlyle had a strange temper, and from a child, as his own mother said, was "gey ill to live with." It is evident throughout that ambition much more than love attracted Jane Welsh to Carlyle, and that her disappointment was bitter until in long after years she became proud of his great fame. It was equally evident that Carlyle himself cared more for his peasant mother than for any other woman on the face of the earth. "He admired Miss Welsh, he loved her in a certain sense, but like her he was not in love." The natural result was that he became more and more absorbed in his literary work, and came to regard his clever and accomplished wife as little more than his housekeeper. Bitter was the disappointment on her part. Both were equally selfish in their way, although in many respects Mrs. Carlyle's was a higher, finer nature than her husband's. Mr. Froude evidently sympathises greatly with the wife, and more than hints that the passionate outpourings of the "Reminiscences" are confessions of too late remorse. He forgets that when a clever woman marries a man for the sake of his genius, when her heart had been given to another, she must bear with the eccentricities of genius. Mrs. Carlyle did bear her fate in a truly heroic spirit; but it is only too evident throughout the biography that she felt that her life was spoilt. Mr. Froude almost implies that Carlyle was greatly to blame for neglecting his wife in his devotion to his solitary studies. But he himself has shown that she only reaped as she had sown when he says: "Had she felt towards Carlyle as she had felt towards his friend, she would perhaps have encountered cheerfully any lot which was to be shared with the object of a passionate affection. But the indispensable feeling was absent." And Carlyle knew it from the first, and possibly felt in his inmost nature a disappointment as deep as hers. "The stern and powerful sense of duty in these two remarkable persons held them true through a long and trying life together in the course of elevated action which they both set before themselves. He never swerved from the high aims to which he had resolved to devote himself. She, by never failing toil and watchfulness, alone made it possible for him to accomplish the work which he achieved." But she was not happy. Long years after, in the late evening of her laborious life, she said, "I married for ambition. Carlyle has exceeded all that my wildest hopes ever imagined of him—and I am miserable." After forty years of life with him—forty years of splendid labour, in which his essential conduct had been unblemished by a serious fault, she said to her younger friends, as the sad lesson of her own experience, "My dears, whatever you do, never marry a man of genius!" Thank Heaven most of the women within our circle of acquaintance are safe in that respect! Mr. Froude dwells a little too much throughout the memoir on the unhappiness of this extraordinary pair, with, as we have intimated, a decided bias in favour of the long-suffering wife. But there are indications that she had a tongue almost as bitter, and power of sarcasm almost as great as her husband's; and, after all, the main result, the chief thing we cared to know, is summed up in the satisfactory conclusion of the biography, that "though the lives of the Carlyles were not happy, yet, if we look at them from the beginning to the end, they were grandly beautiful. Neither of them probably, under other conditions, would have risen to as high an excellence, as in fact they each achieved; and the main question is not how happy men and women have been in this world, but what they have made of themselves."

We have dwelt at some length upon this painful subject, because it is the undertone, as it were, of this biography, and forms the most conspicuous feature in the private life of the great man whose literary career is chiefly displayed in his enduring works.

In both volumes there are some extremely interesting references to Carlyle's religious views. Early in the course of his career "there came upon him the trial which, in these days, awaits every man of high intellectual gifts and noble nature on their first actual acquaintance with human things,—the question, far deeper than any mere political one, What is this world, then, what is this human life, over which a just God is said to preside, but of whose presence or whose providence so few signs are visible?" Brought up in a pious family on the old Calvinistic lines, Carlyle, like his parents, had accepted the Bible as a direct revelation from Heaven. To the family in which he was born the Westminster Confession of Faith was a full and complete account of the position of mankind, and of the Being to whom they owed their existence. The Old and New Testament not only contained all spiritual truth necessary for guidance in word and deed, but every fact related in them was literally true. To doubt was not to mistake, but was to commit a sin of the deepest dye, and was a sure sign of a corrupted heart. Carlyle's wide study of modern literature had shown him that much of this had appeared to many of the strongest minds in Europe to be doubtful or even plainly incredible. So like most other men of genius Carlyle, early in life passed through the valley of despair and humiliation, although he never appears to have come to "the Everlasting No," but always held a clear and unswerving faith in the essential spiritual realities. Later on in his career he confessed to Irving that he did not believe as his friend did in the Christian religion, and that it was vain to hope that he ever would so believe. Mr. Froude, explaining Carlyle's religion partly from his conversations and partly from unpublished fragments of essays, tell us that he was "a Calvinist without the theology." The materialistic theory and kindred ethical speculations, as any one can infer from his works, he always utterly repudiated.

Scepticism on the nature of right and wrong, as on man's responsibility to his Maker, never touched or tempted him. On the broad facts of the divine government of the universe he was as well assured as Calvin himself; but he based his faith, not on a supposed revelation, or on fallible human authority. Experienced fact was to him revelation and the only true revelation. Historical religions, Christianity included, he believed to have been successive efforts of humanity, loyally and nobly made in the light of existing knowledge, to explain human duty, and to insist on the fulfilment of it; and the reading of the moral constitution and position of man, in the creed, for instance, of his own family, he believed to be truer far, incommensurably truer, than was to be found in the elaborate metaphysics of utilitarian ethics. In revelation, technically so called, revelation confirmed by historical miracles, he was unable to believe—he felt himself forbidden to believe—by the light that was in him. In other ages men had seen miracles where there were none, and had related them in perfect good faith in their eagerness to realise the divine presence in the world. They did not know enough of nature to be on their guard against alleged suspensions of its unvarying order. To Carlyle the universe was itself a miracle, and all its phenomena were equally in themselves incomprehensible. But the special miraculous occurrences of sacred history were not credible to him. "It is as certain as mathematics," he said to me late in his own life, "that no such thing ever has been or can be." While he rejected the literal narrative of the sacred writers, he believed as strongly as any Jewish prophet or Catholic saint in the spiritual truths of religion. The effort of his life was to rescue and reassert these truths, which were being dragged down by the weight with which they were encumbered. He explained his meaning by a remarkable illustration. He had not come (so far as he knew his own purpose) to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil them, to expand the conception of religion with something wider, grander, and more glorious than the wildest enthusiasm had imagined.

And so Carlyle conceived, as we of the Liberal Churches do, that a revolution precisely analogous to that which Galileo had wrought in our apprehension of the material heaven was silently in progress in our attitude towards spiritual phenomena. In striving to bring about this revolution we have at least the great encouragement that we are on the side of the strongest, bravest, and most far-seeing thinkers of our age.

During the autumn of 1853 and the beginning of the year which followed, a close correspondence was maintained between Carlyle and J. S. Mill. Carlyle's part of it Mr. Froude says he has not seen, but on both sides they must have been of the deepest interest, and it is hoped that the letters may be published hereafter by those to whom they belong. They related almost entirely to the deepest questions which concern humanity. They throw some light on the religious views then held by both the correspondents. Mill spoke tenderly and reverently of the personal character of the Founder of Christianity, and on this part of the subject he wrote as if he was confident that Carlyle agreed with him. But, as Mr. Froude writes, below the truth of any particular religion there lay the harder problem of the existence and providence of God, and here it seemed that Carlyle had a positive faith, while Mill had no more than a sense of probability. Carlyle admitted that, so far as external evidence went, the Being of God was a supposition inadequately proved. The grounds of certainty which Carlyle found in himself, Mill, much as he desired to share Carlyle's belief, confessed that he was unable to recognise. So again with the soul. There was no proof that it perished with the body, but again there was no proof that it did not. Duty was the deepest of all realities, but the origin of duty, for all Mill could tell, might be the tendency of right action to promote the general happiness of mankind. Such general happiness doubtless could best be promoted by each person developing his own powers.

But space is failing, and the rest of our notice of a work which constantly tempts us to quotation and comment must be confined to a few passages relating to persons well known to us.

R. W. EMERSON.

The Carlyles were sitting alone at dinner on a Sunday afternoon at the end of August, 1833, when a Dumfries carriage drove to the door and there stepped from it a young American then unknown to fame, but whose name now stands connected with Carlyle's wherever the English language is spoken. Emerson had just "broken his Unitarian fetters," as Mr. Froude calls them—very light fetters in his case—and was looking out and around him like a young eagle longing for flight. "He had read Carlyle's articles, and had discerned with the instinct of genius that here was a voice speaking real and fiery convictions, and no longer echoes and conventionalisms. He had come to Europe to study the social and spiritual phenomena; and to the young Emerson as to the old Goethe, the most important of them appeared to be Carlyle." The acquaintance then begun on the Dunscore moors ripened into a deep friendship, which remained unclouded in spite of wide divergences of opinion throughout their working lives. Emerson's account of the visit is recorded in a well-known and very charming passage in his "English Traits." They talked of great books, of the vexed question of English pauperism, of the Immortality of the soul, and after a night's stay Emerson went on in the morning seeking other notabilities. Two days afterwards Carlyle wrote of his visitor in a letter to his mother—"He seemed to be one of the most lovable creatures in himself we had ever looked on, and left us all really sad to part with him." Who ever met and conversed with the gentle and deep-discerning Emerson without being sad to part with him?

W. J. FOX.

Here is a passing reference to W. J. Fox, late M.P. for Oldham, and former minister of South-place Chapel, who is more than once and always kindly spoken of:—

August 15, 1834.—We dined with Mrs. (Platonica) Taylor [afterwards Mrs. J. S. Mill], and the Unitarian Fox one day. Mill was also of the party, and the husband—an obtuse, most joyous-natured man, the pink of social hospitality. Fox is a little thickset, bushy-locked man of five and forty, with bright, sympathetic, thoughtful eyes, with a tendency to pot-belly and snuffiness. From these hints you can construe him; the best Socinian philosopher going, but not a whit more. I shall like well enough to meet the man again, but I doubt he will not me. . . . For me, from the Socinians as I take it, wird nichts.

DR. SHEPHERD.

A notice of our late friend Dr. Shepherd, of Gatacre, one of the wittiest and most genial men of his time, is not quite so kindly:—

Jan. 18, 1832.—Came upon Shepherd, the Unitarian parson of Liverpool, yesterday, for the first time, at Mrs. Austin's. A very large, purply, flabby man; massive head, with long, thin grey hair; eyes both squinting, both overlapping at the corners by a little roof of a brow, giving him (with his ill-shut mouth) a kind of lazy, good-humoured aspect. For the rest, a Unitarian Radical, clear, steadfast, but every way limited. He said Jeffrey did not strike him as "a very taking man." Lancashire accent, or some provincial one. Have long known the Unitarians intus et in cute, and never got any good of them, or any ill.

It is at least satisfactory to find that we did Carlyle no harm, and we are glad to acknowledge that he has done us nothing but good.

These and other passages we have given in our former notice illustrate Carlyle's acrid judgments of almost every person he met. It is no use disguising the fact that his temper was none of the sweetest; and that if he penetrated more thoroughly into the real nature of men than any of his contemporaries he saw also the worst side more clearly than the best side, just as he inclined to pessimism in his judgments on the social and political tendencies of our times. But his was a grand nature and a great heart, embittered as it was by early struggle with poverty and disappointment, and after reading this invaluable instalment towards a complete biography we entirely adopt Mr. Froude's words: "When the Devil's advocate has said his worst against Carlyle, he leaves a figure still of unblemished integrity, purity, loftiness of purpose, and inflexible resolution to do right, as of a man living consciously under his Maker's eye, and with his thoughts fixed on the account which he would have to render of his talents."

The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Co. The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.

The Nineteenth Century is decidedly more interesting this month than the Contemporary, and contains scarcely an article which will not interest even the omnivorous general reader. It opens with another long list of protestations against the Channel Tunnel, comprising ever so many dukes, earls, barons, a few bishops, M.P.s, J.P.s, Reverends, &c. Following this protest are three short papers, taking the same view, by General Sir Lintorn Simmons, Lord Bury, and Major-General E. Hamley. Sir Lintorn Simmons, whose reputation as an engineer is second to none, contends that if the country had found it necessary, either in the interests of passengers or of trade, to procure increased facilities for crossing the Channel, it would long ere this have insisted upon the far more practicable and less costly expedient of making better harbours, so that larger ships might be used, having a greater draught of water, which, being more steady and running at higher speed, would permit of through railway trucks and carriages being run, as proposed by Mr. Fowler, and reduce the journey between London and Paris to within a few minutes, probably less than half-an-hour, of what it will be through the Tunnel. In a fourth paper M. Joseph Reinach, with light and airy sarcasm, dismisses all our English fears as preposterous, and rallies us on the "injurious suspicions which are almost inducing a great civilised people to take a step backwards towards barbarism." But even he cannot deny that a tunnel would occasion frequent panics, involving constant expenditure for fortifications against more or less imaginary enemies. There are two other political articles which will attract considerable attention at the present crisis. One is by that particularly reactionary Liberal, Lord Brabourne, on what he is pleased to style "The Duty of Moderate Liberals," which he exemplifies by endeavouring to thwart the present Ministry on every possible occasion. According to this eminent authority, the three traditional courses are open to Moderate Liberals—first, "to bow their necks before the yoke of Birmingham Radicalism, and trust their consciences and their opinions to the leaders who have so wounded the one and offended the other"; next, to form an independent party of their own, and fight for their own hand; or, thirdly, to throw their weight into the scale of the Conservative Opposition. Having thus stated the three courses, the writer oddly enough comes to the conclusion that "no immediate action may be necessary on the part of the Moderate or Whig section of the Liberal party," except that they must be "prepared to speak and vote in accordance with what they believe and say to each other in private conversation," which indeed is quite obvious and hardly needed an elaborate paper to demonstrate. We rise into a higher and more bracing atmosphere in the next article, on "Town and Country Politics," in which the Rev. J. Guinness Rogers, one of the principal representatives of cultured Nonconformity, shows that notwithstanding the Conservative reaction in London, and notwithstanding also the Bradlaugh difficulty, Liberalism is as strong as ever in the country, and the Prime Minister has as firm a hold upon his majority to-day as when he first resumed office.

The Contemporary has almost as little theology this month as its rival, and is strong in politics. The principal paper is that by Mr. E. A. Freeman on "The Position of the Austrian Power in South-Eastern Europe." His well-known bias against Austria is not concealed, and his main conclusion is in the expression of a hope that those provinces which have shared in the bondage of Lombardy and Venetia may yet share in their freedom from both the Turk and the Austrian. There are two articles on the crisis in Ireland. One is entitled "The Social Revolution in Ireland." The writer, R. W. A. Holmes, advocates the doubtful measures of compensation to landlords and wholesale emigration promoted by the State. Mr. Goldwin Smith, in an article entitled "Parliament and the Rebellion in Ireland," restates his well-known views on Ireland, and advocates the now discredited policy of coercion. We are told, he says, that "Liberals shrink from what they call coercing a nation. It is with a conspiracy—and a conspiracy having its real base in a foreign country—not with a nation, that they have to deal. If the veil could be raised, we should probably see that the mass of the Irish people were slaves and victims rather than members of the secret societies. On both sides of the Atlantic alike the Irish character, with all its attractiveness, is fatally wanting in moral courage and independence. Irishmen are driven and fleeced like sheep, not only by their priesthood, but by demagogues and political sharpers. The blow which strikes down the conspiracy will set the people free.” But query: is there much more moral courage and independence among the smaller farmers and the peasantry of England; and are they not just as much subject to these two ruling powers, the squire and parson of the country parish? Mr. Goldwin Smith is not so one-sided and reactionary as are most of the advocates of coercion. While urging energetic measures of repression he justly says of the Irish landlords, that “their general failure to perform their duties has made their property as difficult for the State to defend as any property could be.”

There is no article of a Theological character in the Nineteenth Century. In the Contemporary there are two. The first is “Disestablishment in Scotland,” in which Principal Tulloch replies to the Free Church Dr. Rainy’s statistics and arguments, serenely oblivious of the fact that Scotland, like Ireland, is destined to have its Church disestablished, whether the Establishmentarians like it or not. So it is written in the Book of Fate, as we read it. The other article to which we referred is an elaborate paper on Comparative Religion, entitled “Samothrace and its Gods; a new exploration,” by Mr. J. S. Stewart Glennie, who has carefully studied the subject and has worked up a good deal of the graceful classical mythology in a very interesting form. The remaining articles are “British North Borneo, or Sabah,” a story of British adventure in the East, told by R. S. Gundry; another contribution to the everlasting “vivisection” controversy, in two papers, one entitled “An Evolutionist to Evolutionists,” by Vernon Lee, the other, “The Ethics of Vivisection,” by Dr. S. Wilks, each advocating a different side of the controversy; “The Last King of Tahiti,” a charming sketch of a visit to the Hawaiian islands, by C. F. Gordon Cumming; and finally, what to most of our readers will prove the most attractive contribution in the present number, two articles under the common head, “Professor T. H. Green—In Memoriam,” the former a sketch of the philosophy and teaching of this admirable and most accomplished man, by Mr. R. L. Nettleship, the other a narrative of personal impressions and a sketch of character, by Professor James Bryce, M.P.

Returning to the Nineteenth Century, the only article at all bearing on Theology is that entitled “The Goal of Modern Thought,” in which W. S. Lilly, writing from the Roman Catholic standpoint, strives to convince us that not only the pessimism of Schopenhauer, but even Kant’s “Critique of Pure Reason,” one of the profoundest things that ever issued from the human intellect, effects the destruction of all theology and theological ethics, and makes wholly for evil. In an article entitled “The Arcady of our Grandfathers,” the Rev. Dr. Jessop reports, in an admirably life-like manner, the sayings and experience of some of the oldest peasantry of his Norfolk country parish, and proves incontrovertibly that the so-called English Arcadia of fifty or sixty years ago was in that district at least more like a scene in Dante’s “Inferno.” We must pass rapidly over the four next articles—all interesting and valuable in their way—“What is a Standard?” a discussion of a currency question, by H. R. Grenfell, Governor of the Bank of England; “A School for Dramatic Art,” in which Mr. F. C. Burnand, the dramatic author, criticises an article on the same subject in the preceding number by another dramatic author, Mr. Hamilton Aide; “Notes on Turner’s Liber Studiorum,” by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, which in their subtle criticism and delicate appreciation of beauty in Nature and Art make us long for the forthcoming work; and “Anti-Vaccination, a Reply to Dr. Carpenter,” in which Mr. Peter Taylor, M.P., re-enforces with considerable force and ability his well-known views in that controversy.

We have reserved to the last what is to us, as it will be to most readers, the most fascinating article in the present number, “A Word About America,” by Mr. Matthew Arnold—a rich specimen of that famous critic’s mordant sarcasm, relieved by a gentle play of delicate humour. We are afraid it will make our sensitive American brethren very angry, but some of the most biting criticisms apply just as much to ourselves, and are not at all worse than the hard things that have been said about the British Philistine. Our critic quotes the Atlantic Monthly as saying that “the hideousness and vulgarity of American manners are undeniable,” and that “redemption is only to be expected by the work of a few enthusiastic individuals, conscious of cultivated tastes and generous desires.” Taking this as his text, and premising for our own benefit that the people of the United States are “the English on the other side of the Atlantic,” Mr. Arnold, in his own inimitable style, and in his old incisive way, points out that whereas our society in England distributes itself into Barbarians, Philistines, and Populace, America is just ourselves, with the Barbarians quite left out and the Populace nearly. This leaves the Philistines for the great bulk of the nation—a livelier sort of Philistine than our Philistine middle class, but left all the more to himself and to have his full swing.” The English middle class, continues Mr. Arnold, presents us at this day for our actual needs, and for the purposes of national civilisation, with a defective type of religion, a narrow range of intellect and knowledge, a stunted sense of beauty, a low standard of manners. “That type of life of which our middle class in England are in possession is one by which neither the claims of intellect and knowledge are satisfied, nor the claims of beauty, nor the claims of social life and manners.” We are not concerned to deny the essential truth of this somewhat sweeping impeachment. But the sting of the article is in the sentence, “That which in England we call the middle class is in America virtually the nation.” It is generally industrious and religious as our middle class. Its religion, Mr. Arnold adds, somewhat scornfully, is even less invaded by the modern spirit than the religion of our middle class. He quotes an American of reputation as a man of science, who says that he lives in a town of a hundred and forty thousand people, of whom there are not fifty who do not imagine the first chapter of Genesis to be exact history. Probably there is no Unitarian congregation to enlighten that benighted place. He quotes also Mr. R. W. Dale as saying that “Orthodox Christian people in America are less troubled by attacks on the Orthodox creed than the like people in England; they seemed to feel sure of their ground and they showed no alarm.” He further quotes Mr. Lowell as himself describing his own nation as “the most common-schooled and the least cultivated people in the world.” The old H.M. School Inspector peeps out in Mr. Arnold’s concluding remark that “good secondary schools, not with the programme of our classical and commercial academies, but with a serious programme really suited to the wants and capacities of those who are to be trained, is what American civilisation most requires, is what our civilisation, too, at present most requires.” It will be seen that our American friends have little reason to complain of satire which is directed with perfect impartiality upon ourselves. Liberal religionists on both sides of the Atlantic, except those of the old preternaturalist persuasion, will at least agree with this passage:—

The real cultivation of the people of the United States, as of the English middle class, has been in and by its religion, its “one thing needful;” but the insufficiency of this religion is now every day becoming more manifest. It deals, indeed, with personages and words which have an indestructible and an inexhaustible truth and salutariness; but it is rooted and grounded in preternaturalism, it can receive those personages and those words only on conditions of preternaturalism, and a religion of preternaturalism is doomed—whether with or without the battle of Armageddon for which Lord Salisbury is preparing—to inevitable dissolution.

It is a striking article, whether the reader agrees with it or not, and this and Dr. Jessop’s “Arcady,” and Mr. Stopford Brooke’s “Notes,” are the gems of a number of more than ordinary value and interest.

Short Notices.

The Pioneer Boy, and How he Became President. By W. M. Thayer. (Hodder and Stoughton, 1882.)—This is a re-issue of the charming story of the “Life of Abraham Lincoln,” by the well-known author of a corresponding book on the late President Garfield, “From Log Cabin to White House.” The delightful American essayist, Dr. Holland, in his “Life of Lincoln,” characterises this little book as “a singularly faithful statement of the early experience of Abraham Lincoln.” The author has now greatly improved and enlarged his work, and has had the advantage of access to the numerous lives of the President published since his death. Garfield and Lincoln were remarkably alike in the circumstances of birth, early struggles, and later experiences; and for popular use Mr. Thayer’s two biographies, constructed on precisely the same plan, are among the most fascinating works of the kind. The author in his humbler sphere has evidently followed the illustrious example of Thucydides in his reports of speeches and conversations.

A Lecture on Tobacco. By Russell Lant Carpenter, B.A.—The lecture recently delivered in the Bridport Town Hall, the Mayor presiding, has been published in a pamphlet form, with a few omissions and additions. The lecture appeared at the time in two successive numbers of the Inquirer, so that we need hardly remind our readers that it is an exceedingly effective plea addressed to the conscience, the pocket, and the self-interest of the smoker. We have heard of one valued friend—a minister too—who read it through, with pipe in his mouth, and remained unconverted. But there are some hardened sinners, so devoted to their bad habits, that sound reasoning is utterly lost upon them. It is a noteworthy fact that even the most inveterate smokers generally dissuade others from beginning what they acknowledge to be a bad habit, and wish they had the courage to free themselves from its slavery.

Electricity and its Modern Applications. By Annie Besant. (London: Freethought Publishing Company.)—This little pamphlet is the substance of four very useful and interesting lectures delivered at the Hall of Science. Some time ago Dr. Aveling, to whose efforts was due the establishment of Science Classes at the Hall of Science under the South Kensington Department, instigated the commencement of a series of “Hall of Science Thursday Lectures,” and these lectures by Mrs. Besant fall under that category.

Tact, Push, and Principle. By William M. Thayer. (Hodder and Stoughton, 1882.)—This is a very useful and instructive little work, from an American source, the author of “The Pioneer Boy,” noticed above, and belonging to the same class as Smiles’s “Self-Help,” “Duty,” and “Character.” It is full of quotations, biographical illustrations, &c., designed to recommend to young men the practical elements of success as exemplified in the lives and characters of successful men in various departments of thought and work. Among the examples adduced are the most prominent men on both sides of the Atlantic, including several living names, and it is quite noteworthy that a large number belong to the Liberal movement in religion. There is a little of the Evangelical tone in some of the writer’s comments; but it is also interesting to notice that the chapters in “The Bible” and “Religion in Business,” are characterised by an eminently practical spirit, and are entirely free from the Orthodox dogmatism which used to characterise publications of this class. The book is admirably adapted for Chapel and School Libraries, and as a present to young men just entering upon the active duties of life.

Literary Notes.

THE Athenæum states that Mr. Darwin has left an autobiography behind him. There has also been found among his papers a sketch of his father about equal in length to that of his grandfather which was published some time ago.

MR. FROUDE, in the first two volumes of his “Life of Carlyle,” regrets that he has not been able to discover more of the letters which passed between Goethe and Carlyle. It now appears that a series of hitherto inedited letters which passed between these distinguished men of letters, and which has been recently discovered, will shortly appear in the "Magazin für die Literatur des In- und Auslandes."

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, M.P., who recently returned from an extensive tour in South Africa, is engaged in preparing a paper for one of the monthly magazines, in which he will recount his experiences and give his opinions on the political problems which await solution in the South African colonies.

THE EARL OF LYTTON is engaged in preparing for publication during the ensuing autumn the earlier volumes of his father's life.

MR. FOLEY has nearly ready his seventh volume of the "Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus." This volume contains an exhaustive list from original documents of the members of the Society in England and Ireland from the first foundation of the two provinces, with biographical and genealogical notices invaluable to the antiquary and genealogist. Mr. Foley also gives a great deal of hitherto unpublished information respecting the working of the penal laws in the Archbishopric of Canterbury, and in other dioceses.

MR. ERNEST LONGFELLOW, the son of the poet, announces that an authorised biography of his father will be issued in due time.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN and Co. have in the press Professor Sayce's long-expected edition of the first three books of Herodotus, which will form a volume of "The Classical Library."

MR. BOSWORTH SMITH has completed his "Life of the late Lord Lawrence." The work is now undergoing careful revision. No date for its publication has yet been fixed.

THE Irish Monthly for May gives the first of some articles entitled "O'Connell: his Diary from 1792 to 1802 and Letters." The diary, extending from O'Connell's seventeenth to his twenty-seventh year, and the letters have not hitherto appeared in print. The passages selected from the diary in the present number include notes on the acting of Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, records of O'Connell's reading, &c.

ON May 14 will be published in Birmingham the first number of the Sunday Echo, a non-sectarian and, we understand, a non-political Sunday paper.

MR. J. COMYNS CARR will deliver the last course of Cantor Lectures for the present session at the Society of Arts, on Mondays, May 15 and 22, the subject being "Book Illustration, Old and New." In the first lecture Mr. Carr will treat of the proper relations of printed text and illustrated design, and of the history of early wood engraving. The second lecture will be devoted to the consideration of the various modes of book illustration, and the modern development of wood engraving. Modern processes of illustration, and the influence of photography upon the art, will be considered in the last lecture.

THE HIBBERT LECTURES.

BUDDHISM.

Professor Kuenen delivered his fifth and last Hibbert lecture in the theatre of the University Museum, Oxford, on Saturday afternoon, April 29, and at St. George's Hall, London, on Friday morning, May 5. He descanted upon Buddhism, adding a general retrospect of the ground covered by the whole course of his discourses. He began by reminding his hearers that when Christianity was born in Palestine there was a world-wide religion in existence already, a religion which, unhindered by difference of nationality, had overstepped the boundaries of its fatherland two centuries before. This was Buddhism, the firstborn among the universal religions. Repeated attempts had been made to raise it to the rank of parent of the other two, Christianity and Islam. But a single glance was enough to teach us that in these theories a lively fancy played the chief part. The advent of Buddhism to Western Asia came far too late in the day to have had anything to do with the genesis of Christianity. Philo's Indian gymnosophists were not Buddhists, and to Clement of Alexandria, who mentions the Buddha as the founder of a religion whom his followers, "because of his supereminent worth," revered as a god, that religion was still—i.e., in the former half of our third century—a remote phenomenon. But the study of Buddhism, though not for any light shed thereby on the origin of Christianity, the lecturer deemed not the least important part of his task, owing to the relation in which it stood to the national religion of India. He owned he approached the problem with fear and trembling, for lack of the necessary preparation. In Buddhistic phrase, his place was not in "the community," but among the "adherents." The close connection between Buddhism and Brahmanism was denied by no one. But though not many years ago Indian scholars like Weber, Max Duncker, and Monier Williams thought Buddhism sprang from the earlier creed only as the French revolution, for instance, sprang from the ancien régime, that time had gone by. Many facts had gradually led to a notable change in the conception of the relations between Brahmanism and Buddhism, and we were now told that "the priest-ridden, caste-ridden nation" of which Buddha was said to be the redeemer is the creature of the Western imagination. The evidence compelling us to tone down the traditional opposition was reviewed at some length, the rock-inscribed edicts of the Buddhist Constantine, Asoka, King of Magadha in the third century B.C., supplying the firmest foundations for our knowledge of the earlier Buddhism. They were shown to breathe throughout a spirit of appreciative tolerance. To the citations from these epigraphic texts, 2,100 years old, were added others from the Buddhistic scripture, as expounded by Mr. T. W. Rhys Davids (Hibbert lecturer last year), Kern, Oldenberg, the Rev. J. Wood, Bühler, Max Müller (first Hibbert lecturer), Senart, and others. In these texts Brahman was not a term of reproach, but a title of honour. Buddhism when in power did not abolish castes, as witness Ceylon, where it was a question whether its adherents did not introduce them. The great extent to which Buddhism was indebted to Brahmanism for its doctrine and organisation, as proved by continued research, was exemplified in many particulars. The Buddhist metaphysics and ethics were alike borrowed from the older systems. Even the Buddhist monachism was copied, down to minute details, from Brahmanic ascetics, though it should be added that asceticism holds quite a different place in Brahmanism from that which it takes in Buddhism. Even gregarious asceticism was pre-Buddhistic, and Sakya-Muni did nothing unheard of in gathering round his hermitage a circle of disciples. At this very moment it was being eagerly discussed whether the ascetical communion of the Jainas had not been formed just before the Buddhist monkish order. Mr. Rhys Davids had shown that the Buddhists appropriated a large measure of the popular wit and wisdom of the Indians, carrying it with them and spreading it everywhere, so that after many wanderings it reached our quarter of the globe. The founder of the new faith lived and died a Hindoo, and the fact being certain that the universal religion sprang out of the national, they had been brought so much the nearer to the real question before them—namely, how this came about. This problem was only to be solved by a critical examination of the legendary history of the Buddha, an inquiry of enormous difficulty, involving the discussion of all the various theories of any importance down to Senart's explanation of the founder as a mythical sun-hero. The same thesis was now defended on a far broader scale, and still more thoroughly by Kern in his great work on the history of Buddhism in India, the publication of which began at Haarlem last year. The real question seemed to the lecturer to be whether Buddhism was or was not "une œuvre impersonnelle." As he did not aspire to an epitaph such as Phaeton's, he would not himself attempt a solution. He limited himself to the expression of opinions justified by the present state of the researches. He evolved much meaning from the short formula of adhesion to Buddhism:—"I take refuge with the Buddha, the doctrine (dharma), and the community (sangha)." The result of the investigation was this—"A monastic order with affiliated believers—such was Buddhism. It was always so represented in the legend of the founder. The crowds he gathered round him might make us forget it; but he himself remained a monk, and they who followed him on his journeys were monks likewise. Why should we not accept this representation as it stands? They had now learned the terms in which to put the question as to the origin of Buddhism. It was not the point of departure—the order of Bhikshus or Mendicants itself—that they had to account for, since it rose quite naturally out of Brahmanism, and was not the only one of its kind. Nor was it that emancipation from the Vedas which doubtless characterised it from the first, for in this, too, it had been shown to have followed existing analogy. Even the spread of the Buddhistic order beyond the boundaries of Magadha, with its continued existence after its first formation, was, however remarkable, by no means inexplicable. Why should we not suppose, in accordance with the indications of the sacred books themselves, that, in distinction from earlier ascetic unions which remained dependent upon their teacher and upon his presence with them, the Buddhistic order extended itself more freely and took up fresh members wherever it had established its branches? But now, added the lecturer, they had reached a point, if he were not mistaken, at which analogy failed them. For Buddhism was not content with this freer and wider extension of its borders. Without ceasing to be a monastic order, it became a Church. It took up into itself countless lay brothers and sisters. Presently it overstepped the boundaries, not only of its narrower fatherland, but even of India itself. It established itself in Ceylon, in every region to which its missionaries could penetrate. Whence was this? How did a religion for the world spring out of a monastic order? They would not exaggerate the difficulty of such conquests. Up to a certain point such an extension was not unnatural. The householder looked up to the ascetic with reverence and admiration, while the ascetic, on his side, depended on the lay brethren for his daily rice, and was thus naturally led to show them goodwill, and to give attention to their questions and difficulties. And when, during the rainy season, the ascetic left the forests awhile, a closer connection would establish itself between them and the farmers. Under special circumstances and in particular places this bond might be drawn still closer. Nay, Buddhism provided something more than this voluntary and loose relation between the monks and the laymen. For its upāsakas, or "adherents," though they did not withdraw from social life, yet renounced the laws and usages prevalent in society. And the monks on their side went out to preach and to convert. Though we could not follow the detailed course of their propaganda, it admitted of no doubt that they early devoted themselves to missionary enterprise. The history of Christianity furnished us with a truly striking analogy—indeed, more than one. As contemplative asceticism prepared the way in India for the rejection of the authority of the Vedas, so did the ecclesiastical Reformation of the sixteenth century find its antecedents in the mediæval mysticism, and in the cloisters where it was most sedulously cherished. Again, there were the Western Mendicant orders, especially the Franciscans, between whom and the Buddhistic brotherhood an elaborate parallel was drawn. Take away the Papal crosier, and substitute the unbounded freedom and toleration of India, and there would grow up a community similar to the Buddhistic Church. There was another thing. Francis and Buddha had in common a tender compassion embracing every living thing, not forgetting "our brothers, the birds," and "our sisters, the swallows," but turning, above all, to suffering man. And this one thing—was it not much? Was it not everything? After all, the ascetic's effort to flee from the world was a selfish one. But it need not remain so. The ascetic might strive to make others partakers of the salvation which he had himself found outside the world. Now, in Buddhism this radical change of spirit was realised, and it was this, the lecturer thought, which must be set down to the personal initiative of the Founder. Even those who questioned the right thus to argue from the work to the work-master would readily grant that the thought thus ascribed to the Founder did actually become a power in the order he founded, and take a foremost place among the causes which led to its amazing extension. As we liked to picture him in history, such in thought and deed was the Buddha in the legend. It was tender pity for suffering humanity that made, according to the legend, the Saviour of the World, and it was that same feeling which the spread of the story could not fail to warm everywhere into life.

And now, at the close of the whole review, asked Dr. Kuenen, what had we gained that would bring us nearer our goal? This, that we had learnt how Hinduism became international in Buddhism, and in this knowledge was found the key to the latter. "Buddhism sprang from a single Indian monastic order; asceticism—more specifically the Brahmanic, the contemplative asceticism—was the connecting link between the national and the universal religion"—such were the fruits gathered from their study. He needed not to sound the praises of the Buddhist ethics, as though anyone had run them down, nor to dwell on their beneficent influence in more lands than one. Reckon fully with the meaning and the consequences of its principle. It must and it did result in absolute quietism—nay, apathy, as was fully shown. It was matter for thankfulness that at first compassion overbalanced quietism. But that quietism had at last maimed compassion, who could wonder?

In speaking of the limits between which Buddhism swayed to and fro he had had Christianity in his mind. Our judgment of the two religions could only gain in value by our placing them side by side and letting the light fall on their resemblances and their differences. No comparison could be more natural, though it would be far otherwise if the doctrine touching God adopted by each of the two religions formed the heart of it and determined its character. In that case Christianity would have nothing in common with Buddhism, for it had been said of the latter, not without reason, that, if a religion at all, it was at any rate a religion without God. But for more reasons than one, no such standard could be accepted, without extremely important qualifications. Although the theological conviction was far from being matter of indifference, yet in religion still more stress must be laid upon the disposition of the affections, upon the tone of mind, upon the consecration of heart and life. We must remember also that the denial of God's existence rested in the original Buddhism upon a purely philosophical basis, and left the popular belief in the Devas undisturbed; while in the later development, with its deification of the Buddha, scarcely any trace of it was left. In spite of this difference, then, the resemblance between Buddhism and Christianity retained all its significance. In the one, as in the other, the idea of the redemption was the central point. In both religions the ideal of self-denial, purity, devotion was realised by the Founder himself. The moral requirements of the two coincided in some of their main features and in many details. Nor was this all. By the side of the Buddhist we had the Christian monachism, with the striking likeness between them. But not even this likeness struck one so much as the fact that two-thirds, or at least a whole half of the Christian Church recognised life in the cloister as the complete realisation of the demands of Christianity. But still deeper, nay fundamental, was the difference between the two religions. In Buddhism there was monasticism from the first. In Christianity it appeared later on and gradually, winning in the face of opposition its place in Catholicism. And this was no mere chronological difference. There could be no Buddhism without bhikkhus—there was a Christianity without monks. In other words, that which in the one case constituted the very essence of the religion, and could not be eliminated from it even in thought without annulling the system itself, was in the other case but one of the many forms under which the religion revealed itself, or rather the natural but one-sided development of certain elements in the original movement, coupled with gross neglect of others having equal or still higher rights. The conditions under which Buddhism arose were before them. What a contrast in the genesis of Christianity! Born out of the national life of the Jews, Christianity stood in immediate connection with the political pressure of those days that revived the aspiration kindled in the course of ages by the national religion. Accordingly it was at first intimately bound up with the Jewish nationality. The first Christians never dreamt of withdrawing from their own people. When, after a time, their religion revealed in action the universalism which from the first had belonged to it in principle, the inevitable issue was that a great part of Israelitism accompanied the newly-born world-religion on its march through the Roman Empire. But this could not obviate the necessity, wherever it settled down, of adapting itself to new circumstances and assuming new forms. In a word, Christianity was calculated, by virtue of its origin, to enter into ever fresh combinations with the national life of its confessors. It could not help nationalising itself, nor had it ceased throughout the centuries to do so. In such a history how could monachism, or any other one-sided phenomenon whatever, possibly be more than one of the many shoots of the wide-spreading tree? But it was not only as regards its form that the special characteristic of Christianity was explained by its origin. To its birth from the Jewish, in distinction from every other nationality, it owed an essential portion of the content to which amid all its changes it had never been untrue. The lecturer spoke of it now with exclusive reference to the contrast with Buddhism, the difference between which and Christianity was closely connected, he showed, with the respective absence and presence in the two cases of these specifically Jewish elements. Christian aggressiveness against unbelievers and misbelievers was quite wanting in Buddhism. Again Christianity, in right of its Israelite lineage, inherited the idea of the Kingdom of God, an idea which was the secret of its power and the pledge of its endurance. They stood, he said, in conclusion, at the end of the path marked out for them to tread together. His audience would forgive the hope that no further justification of his thesis was necessary. If not already borne out by the facts it would be labour lost to try and prove it now. Only a few more hints would be in point. Bearing in mind the distinction between universalism as a fact and as a principle, they had to note, not the area and number of the adherents of each of the three world-religions, but their character, and then none could hesitate to award to Christianity the palm of universalism. It was the best for the work of inspiring and hallowing personal and national life. Up to a certain point only did Islam and Buddhism acquit themselves of their task. There they found a line drawn which they could not pass, because their origin forbade it, as was pointed out. And now the third world-religion? Richard Rothe had said—"Christianity is the most mutable of all things. That is its special glory." History refused to be silenced by the outcries raised on all sides by the paradox. That Christianity was liable to deprivation might be granted, but mutable in itself—never! It had been fixed once for all in the Founder's life and teaching, according to one; in the New Testament, shouted another; in the Church, cried a third; in such and such a Protestant creed, insisted a fourth. But Rothe was right. Historical criticism recognised the great difference between the three main types—the earliest confessors of Jesus's name, the Catholics, and the Protestants. What was the sum of them but Christianity, and how could that religion be denied to be "the most mutable of all things?" And, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, this mutability of Christianity remained a priceless blessing. What was unable to change might continue to exist, but had ceased to live. And religion must live, if it was to answer its destiny, and, refusing to freeze into formulas, was to work like the leaven, to inspire and to strengthen all. Casting a single glance forward, Dr. Kuenen discussed in a few parting words the future of Christianity in these troublous times, and pointed those who had lost confidence in ecclesiastical forms to the universalism of the Gospel as the sheet-anchor of their hope. Eighteen centuries bore mighty promise of its weathering the storms howling round us. Not yet was the vital power exhausted which manifested itself so clearly in the rise of the Catholic Church and again at the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Our own experience bore witness to it, and the future, too, would proclaim it!

DARWINISM AND THEOLOGY.

The New York Independent (Liberal Congregationalist), in a leading article on Darwin, writes:—

The attitude of the Church toward him, more hostile than suspicious even, is an occasion for deep mortification. Never has an investigator lived less polemic, more careful, more candid, more anxious for the truth and nothing else than Darwin. He has not one word to say against religion. He recognised God as a Creator, and then sought to find out, by most careful inquiry from Nature, how the world of living things was made. Because his object was truth, and because he sought it with great candour and devotion, he ought to have been regarded by our Christian teachers as a dear friend. But such was not the case. No man of the age was so feared and hated by the large body of Christian teachers—we will not say all—as was Darwin. The reason was that the explanation he gave of the production of species was one that contradicted their notion of the interpretation of an obscure part of the Bible. His theory was not the one common up to his time, of special creations; but of development or evolution. With great ingenuity and great wealth of research he expounded this doctrine, first propounding a very gradual development from the mere predominant survival of such individuals as were but slightly better adapted than others to their environment. Afterward other ideas, his own or suggested by his disciples, introducing other forces and more sure and rapid in their action, have now greatly modified the original idea as propounded by Darwin and enunciated by Spencer. But this great idea of evolution has been accepted as a basis for research by the whole world of students and has given rise to a marvellous range of discovery. Whether true or not, it has given a biological philosophy which is generally accepted, and is of the deepest interest, as it brings us so much nearer to the original of existence. But the attitude of a great mass of religious dogmatism to this new philosophy has been no less than scandalous. It has been most unfortunate, because it has put religion in the false position of hostility to investigation. Religious faith has now adapted itself, as it easily could, to the new doctrine. Religion does not live with one scientific theory, and perish if attached to another. At the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, in New York, Dr. Hodge read a paper to prove that "Darwinism is Atheism"; but now probably not a professor in Princeton Seminary would dare to make the assertion. Certainly the President of Princeton College has again and again since then shown us how Christian faith may be harmonised with the doctrine of development. It is not the fashion nowadays so much as it was for religious teachers to abuse what has become the prevalent scientific position. Too many Christian scientists believe in it, and those who cursed it in the name of the Lord are beginning to fear that their curses may come home to roost, and all but a few, of small discretion, now hold their peace. So Darwin has died, having revolutionised the thought of the scientific world and silenced his theological foes. Not now, perhaps, but by-and-by it may be seen that he has done much indirectly to put religious faith, as well as scientific knowledge, on a higher plane. The riddle of Samson may again come true, and out of the strong may come forth sweetness. From the philosophy of the world which he has expounded may come forth new and rich evidences of a wonder-working God.

EMERSON AND CARLYLE.

The Spectator writes:—

Emerson and Carlyle were in their way very remarkable contrasts. Emerson was as benignant and gentle as Carlyle was arrogant and bitter. Mr. Ruskin has asked, "What can you say of Carlyle, except that he was born in the clouds, and struck by lightning?" Of Emerson it might, perhaps, be also said that he was born in the clouds, but assuredly not that he was struck by lightning. There is nothing scathed or marred about him, nothing sublime, though something perhaps better—a little of the calm of true majesty. He has the keen kindness of the highest New-England culture, with a touch of majesty about him that no other New-England culture shows. He has the art of saying things with a tone of authority quite unknown to Carlyle, who casts his thunderbolt, but never forgets that he is casting it at some unhappy mortal whom he intends to slay. That is no Emerson's manner; he is never aggressive. He has that regal suavity which settles a troublesome matter without dispute. There is no thinker of our day who, for sentences that have the ring of oracles, can quite compare with Emerson. Mr. Arnold, in a sonnet written near forty years ago, on Emerson's essays, said—

To-day a hero's banner is unfurled."

And the first line at least was true, whatever may be said of the second. No man has compressed more authoritative insight into his sentences than Emerson. He discerns character more truly than Carlyle, though he does not describe with half the fervent vigour. There is something far more royal and certain in Mr. Emerson's insight than in all the humorous brilliance of Carlyle.

The Saturday Review speaks of Emerson as the only man who exercised on the ideas of a generation younger than his own an influence comparable in its depth and penetration to Mr. Darwin's. He philosophised like a poet and wrote poetry like a philosopher; wherefore specialists of both kinds are disappointed with him. Yet for this very reason his work has a higher strain and a subtler charm than faultless verse or vigorous dialect often attains. He is a more deadly enemy to formulas than Carlyle, because a profounder one. The resemblance between their thoughts (as between their styles so far as there is any) lies only on the surface. Carlyle taught men to mock at formulas, Emerson to rise above them. Carlyle's prophesying and testimony became at last a string of opposition formulas after their own kind, and just as easy, when a man had learned them, to make intellectual counters of as the old ones. We greatly doubt if any one ever succeeded in extracting a formula from Emerson. No modern writer is fuller of the philosophical spirit, or less explicit on particular philosophical questions. He contemplated not only without dogmatism, but without criticising in the ordinary sense. He found Plato's greatness not so much in his eloquence or intellectual subtlety as in his being a "balanced soul," "a man who could see two sides of a thing." He relished the oriental mystics, and enjoyed the active life of the modern world; not alternately or as corrective one to the other, but at the same time, and with full consciousness of both being good in their kind and embodying truths. Originality is one of the attributes most commonly ascribed to Emerson, and justly. Nevertheless, like most men of creative mind, he thought very meanly of originality in the popular sense. This contemplator was no dreamer; like the ideal Athenian described by Pericles, he was in no wise unmanned by philosophy. Emerson, in fine, was a man of notable and singular power in English letters; a thinker, the operation of whose works is more easily reflected on than described, more easily felt than reflected on, and goes deeper than that of instructors who make mere formal professions.

Punch has the following graceful lines:—

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

Born, May 25, 1803. Died, April 27, 1882.

A cheery Oracle, alert and quick,

Amidst the joyless voices of the hour—

The dirges dull of singers who are sick,

The peevish plaints of thinkers who are sour—

Its utterance was still of hope and health;

Its silence lessens the World's better wealth.

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ AND DEAN STANLEY.

In a letter to Canon Farrar, published in the Calcutta Liberal, P. C. Mazoomdar pays the following tribute to the memory of Dean Stanley:—

What young Hindoo, who has been to the land of his conqueror, can wipe off the memory of the warm cordiality, the hearty sympathy, and the unspeakable grace with which Dean Stanley greeted to his hearth and his table, or took him over explaining everything of the great national sanctuary committed to his care which, in his own beautiful words, "enshrines the witness and the genius of every sect alike, that temple of silence and reconciliation in which the enmities of twenty generations lie buried and forgiven." His heart as wide, or wider perhaps than the sanctuary over which he presided, reconciled not only sect with sect, but race with race, and the Hindoo felt, while looking up to him, that he was looking upon the face not of a conqueror, not of a teacher and a missionary who would denounce his faith, and criticise his conviction, but of a brother, of a friend, of a humane sympathetic man. More than ten years ago a remarkable meeting was held in your City of London to receive a leader and reformer of our race, viz., Keshub Chunder Sen. You know he is the head of the Brahmo Somaj, the Theistic Church of India. Dean Stanley was the first speech of the meeting. He referred to what he said to Bishop Cotton when that great divine asked his advice whether he should accept office in India. "Accept it by all means," said Dean Stanley, "because I believe you will not only act impartially towards Christian churches in that country, but you will be able to do justice to the old religion of India." If that hope was fulfilled in Bishop Cotton, it was more than fulfilled in the attitude which the Dean himself always observed towards the Brahmo Somaj. His enthusiasm of humanity was evidenced by his feeling "that every Church is great and noble only in proportion as it is able to recognise what is noble and great in other Churches, and that we approach most nearly to the spirit of the Founder of our Faith in proportion as we are able to recognise his traces in every form and shape of human excellence wherever it might be seen." To him the most convincing proof of the divine origin of Christianity was that having sprung from the East it was able to assimilate the West, and that proceeding back from Europe it may once again win the higher intelligence of the remote East. He hoped and desired that India should not take without change and modification the European form of Christianity, but that there should rise some native form of Indian Christianity. He has not been spared to enjoy the fulfilment of his glorious predictions. But if from the better world to which he has proceeded he can still watch the progress of our race he will see that in India there is slowly growing up a national religion embodying the divine truths of Christianity, through a process of national development, which combines the characteristic spirit of the East and West. The Church of the Brahmo Somaj of India in its New Dispensation recognises not only what is great and noble in all other Churches, but finds the light manifest in all these, as the broken fragments of the "light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." In India the great spiritual pantheism of our forefathers recognised the traces of the Divine Spirit in every form of human worth and excellence. Our departed friend in recognising the traces of the Founder of his faith in every Church and every phase of virtue and piety, only proved how deeply the ancient Aryan nature was sealed in his heart. It is the primeval spirit of Hindooism manifest through an unsectarian all-embracing Christianity. And if he did but know our profound soul-felt relations to the everlasting sonship of Christ, he would, I am sure, accept us in his heart as Christians though we do not take that name. A reformed Hindoo of the Brahmo Somaj, like Lessing's Nathan the Wise, might exclaim in his presence "that which makes me a Christian to thee, makes thee a Hindoo to me." Yes, sir, in the late Dean Stanley we discovered a sympathiser who, going beyond the limitations of name and creed, saw into the soul of all true religion and interpreted it with a nameless catholicity that produced endless responses, according to the variety of nature to which it was addressed. The religion of modern India in the Brahmo Somaj has no name. We call it Theism, but finding that not to be expressive enough we have begun to call it the New Dispensation. But however we may designate it, it means nothing more than that reconciliation of the faith of the East and West which involves within it the religious future of mankind. To develop that religious future in life and doctrine amongst his own nation none laboured more faithfully, and suffered more unpopularity, than did the departed great man. He has baptised England, yea and India also, in a new spirit of Christianity. He has helped forward our aspirations towards a universal Christian ideal more effectively than any other of his countrymen. And it is only in warm participation of that enthusiasm of humanity that filled his soul I venture to address you this humble letter.

We cannot but feel that his spirit inspires you, and his sympathies you represent. We feel that you too would be delighted to find in India a new fold of Christ filled with other sheep than those who obey the old party cries of an exhausted Christendom, that you cannot view with indifference in India an order of national assimilation of the immortal truths of Christ's life, teaching and death which is sure to make not only India new, but also re-act upon the moral and spiritual development of England.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—“C. B. U.” is of opinion that man could not be a morally responsible being if he were not independent of conditions in the forming of his determinations, or, in other words, if it were not possible in precisely the same conditions of character and surroundings that he should have determined in a different way from that in which he did determine. To me it is evident that it is not independence of conditions, but it is the possession of a power of self-government, which is the ground of man's moral responsibility. In childhood, before the young being has acquired this power, he cannot reasonably be considered morally responsible; and it is by the acquirement of this power in the progress of his mental development, and not by passing from dependence to independence of conditions, that he becomes so.

Independence of conditions would be something worse than insanity. It would be power to do the most insane acts without being insane. It would be not only the power to determine as wisely and well when we are ignorant and badly disposed, as we could and would determine if we were well informed and well disposed; but also the power to determine and act most absurdly and wickedly, however intelligent and well disposed we might be. It would make our character and surroundings of no effect in the causation of our determinations and acts.

When my conscience tells me that I am to blame for having done wrong, why does it do so? “C. B. U.” says it does so because my conviction is that under the circumstances—that is, in the internal and external conditions which then existed—I could have determined to do right. These words may mean that my conviction is that I have a power of self-government. And it is because I have this conviction, because I find that this conviction is in agreement with facts, that I feel that I am to blame when I have deliberately done wrong. Or the words may mean that it could have been that I should have determined otherwise in the then existing internal and external conditions. And it is because I find that this conviction is not in agreement with facts that I reject it.

“C. B. U.” says that by the rejection of this last conviction moral disapprobation in the ordinary sense of these words is very effectually extinguished. And we may say that it is so in this sense; because in this sense the words imply not only the correct conviction that man has a power of self-government, but also the erroneous conviction that man is independent of conditions in the exercise of this power. But by this change moral disapprobation in a true sense is substituted for moral disapprobation in the ordinary sense of the words. And this true kind of moral disapprobation is much more beneficial in its influence upon man's social feelings and the formation of his character than the ordinary half true and half erroneous kind, because it retains all that is beneficial in the ordinary kind of moral disapprobation, and which goes with the truth that man has a power of self-government; and it excludes all that is injurious in the ordinary kind, and which adheres to the erroneous supposition that man is independent of conditions in the exercise of his power of self-government.

I should not say to the criminal, as “C. B. U.” supposes, “my poor fellow, make yourself quite easy,” and so forth. All this I might say if I imagined that man's character and his determinations are formed for him and not by him, and if I had no knowledge of the influences by which evil has been and good may be produced in the causation of character and conduct—knowledge which could not exist if man were independent of conditions in the forming of his determinations. But with the knowledge of the courses of character and conduct, I should say to the evil doer—“Do not run away with the idea that because in this case you have been caused to fail to exercise your power of self-government effectually, therefore, you have no such power. Remember that you have a power of self-government; and that it is your duty to exert this power to put down all wrong impulses. And that therefore you have merit when you neglect to do so. And remember that by failing to do so you not only injure others, but at the same time you injure yourself, by causing yourself to be regarded with disapprobation and dislike. For men cannot feel towards the wrong doer as they feel towards those who act rightly. And you weaken your moral habits, instead of strengthening them as you would do by the effectual exercise of your power of self-government upon all proper occasions. It is folly to excuse yourself upon the plea that you 'could not help it.' To say that you could not help it is to say that you have no power of self-government; and this is not true, unless you are insane. Let us hope that in the future the recollection of this experience will be an influence to induce you to exert your power of self-government effectually. And I hope you will determine that it shall be so."

And I certainly should not think of punishments as effectual means of reformation. I should only look upon them as very ineffectual means, which must be employed in the present state of society to remedy in some small degree the evil effects of the injurious formation of character and causation of conduct which are the natural effects of the injurious social influences to which all are now subjected from infancy, and of which the most influential for evil has been the ignorance of society respecting the causes of character and conduct, and the consequent erroneous idea in which it is supposed that man is the primary or independent cause of his determinations and his acts, or, in other words, it is denied that the formation of man's determinations, though dependent in part upon his personal agency, is in all cases dependent in the first place upon internal and external conditions, operating, of course, according to supreme laws of causation.

For this absence of knowledge and this denial are the root-cause of evil from which have proceeded the defective formation of the character of mankind, which has hitherto been universal, and all the injurious effects in the social arrangements and in the general social proceedings of mankind consequent upon this defective formation of character. Punishments are necessary evils in the present state of society. But, with the ideas from which they proceed, when it is supposed that man is himself the primary cause of his determinations and his acts, they are causes of very injurious feelings between man and man, and are very powerful causes of evil in the formation of character. And if man's determinations were formed by him independently of conditions, how could he be influenced to determine beneficially by punishments or by any other means?

I think that any one who will consider these remarks will see that there is no likeness between what seems to your highly respected correspondent "C. B. U." to be the logical outcome of my doctrine of causation in relation to human conduct, and the inferences which really proceed from it. HENRY TRAVIS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The interesting discussion in your columns of a subject which has exercised for so long the minds of thoughtful men without hitherto producing a universal consensus of opinion seems to me, when read in the light of the grand series of facts which modern science has established, to support, on the whole, the not altogether popular view that law will have ultimately to be recognised in the sphere of the volitions.

We must, I think, regard it as proved that the world, as known to us, is far from being a perfect world. The difficulties, therefore, which beset an acute metaphysician like "C. B. U." have their parallel in the world of so-called irresponsible nature; so that to look back upon our individual past in order to blame ourselves for not having done so and so, is perhaps as philosophically incorrect as to upbraid the earth with having produced Compsognathus, Ichthyosaurus or Pterodactyl in past ages, or in still producing the crocodile, the wolf, or the tape-worm. Everything is best studied in its simpler forms. Let us, instead of treating the world as if composed solely of philosophers, regard it as composed rather of improved savages, slowly advancing by secular stages, and meanwhile realising the benefits of social order. These conditions constitute limits within which, as "C. B. U." admits, the free will of the individual is restrained, and when once the principle of limitation is admitted, where is it to stop?

In what sense, may I ask, are we to apply the word blame to the indifference to human life exhibited by the Fuegian, to the fiendish cruelty of a Bonner, a Torquemada, or an Alva, or a Napoleon, or to the "customs" of the kingdom of Dahomey? When we come to analyse them, blame and praise alike appear to have really very little moral significance, for we never think of praising a Christ or a Socrates. The fact, as it seems to me, is that we fix upon a certain average of possibilities for each individual, to which we affix the sense of ought. In the case of acts slightly above or below that average we praise or blame, as the case may be; but when the divergence is very great—amounting to criminality or heroism—we simply have to reconsider our original estimate, and admit that there were elements which we had omitted to take into account. We feel admiration or disgust, but no longer praise or blame.

The sentiment which "C. B. U." has put in the mouth of a supposed visitor to an incarcerated criminal is one which I so far concur in as scarcely to regard as a caricature. But the so-called criminal classes are not philosophers, and it is quite unnecessary to tell them everything that we think beyond impressing upon them that punishment is the most merciful thing that could happen to them. We do not blame or scold a tiger for eating man, but we nevertheless endeavour to wipe him out of existence as one of those mysterious parts of the All which require to be eliminated. In the same way, we ought not to add insult to injury, by scolding the unfortunate human criminal. The worst human crime is probably selfishness; but we do not even blame an individual for that. He excites merely our loathing, as reminding us too keenly of the struggle for existence which has developed a quality so essential for success in life, and so indispensable to man in a savage state. We hope the time is coming when the selfish man will be, like the crocodile, an anachronism in civilised communities.

The question is then asked. If there be a joint causation and not absolute freedom of will, is it right to inflict pain? This only repeats in another form the question, "Why are we not in a perfect world," and "Why is there any pain at all?" For pain meets us everywhere, quite dissociated from moral agency in the subject at any rate. To this question I will not venture to give an answer. O. A. S.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The discussion between Dr. Travis and "C. B. U." on the doctrine of necessity, which has recently appeared in your columns, must have interested many of your readers on both sides of the controversy. Into this discussion I have no desire to intrude, but I wish to be allowed to remind the young Unitarians of to-day that all the objections of "C. B. U." to Necessarianism on moral grounds were raised a century ago, by Dr. Price, and satisfactorily answered by Dr. Priestley. If our young people will go to the shelves of their chapel libraries and take down their great predecessor's work on "The Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity," they will there find all those difficulties as to moral responsibility, praise and blame, remorse and the like, which "C. B. U." so ably states, fully and carefully considered, and most conclusively removed. Truth should be pursued and error shunned, quite independently of any consequences that may be supposed to flow from either; but it is very desirable that it should be widely known, and especially by the younger members of our own denomination, that the moral dangers of Necessarianism which "C. B. U." delights to dwell upon do not really exist, and that, against the high authority of his name, we may appeal to that of Priestley, whose fame has increased from year to year during the century that has elapsed since he wrote, and whose merits classic Oxford and busy Birmingham have alike recognised, by giving his statue a conspicuous place amongst those to whom they thus do honour.

I cannot ask you to give any lengthened extract from the admirable work to which I have referred, but I would crave leave to conclude with a short passage on the influence of motives. Dr. Priestley says:—"In short, where the proper influence of motives ceases, the proper foundation of praise and blame disappears with it; and a self-determining power, supposed to act in a manner independent of motive, and even contrary to everything that comes under that description, is a thing quite foreign to every idea that bears the least relation to praise or blame. A good action produced in this manner is no indication of a good disposition of mind, inclined to yield to the influence of good impressions, and therefore is nothing on which I can depend for the future. Even a series of good actions, produced in this manner," gives no security for a proper conduct in future instances; because such actions can form no habit, i.e., no necessary tendency to a particular conduct; but everything is liable to be reversed by this self-determining principle, which can turn a deaf ear to all motives and all reasons." That your readers may obtain and read the book whence these words are taken is the earnest desire of April 25. AN OLD UNITARIAN.

THE REFORMED CHURCH IN PARIS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I find that De Pressensé's account (quoted in your last issue) of recent changes in the Reformed Church in Paris has puzzled some who are anxious to understand what is the actual gain to the Liberal party. The confusion arises from the use, in the account, of the word Presbytery in a sense which it does not bear in any part of the United Kingdom.

What English Presbyterians called a Classis, and Scottish Presbyterians call a Presbytery, is termed in France a Consistory. The Paris Consistory has now been divided into two.

What De Pressensé calls the Presbytery, is the Church Session, in France the Council, that is to say, the governing body of an individual congregation. But, in France, the whole number of the Reformed, in any given town or village, is treated as one congregation, and while there may be several places of worship the minister to each is appointed by the representatives of the worshippers in all. It is easy to see that a dominant conservative majority would keep out all liberals. The Church Session, or Council, of Paris has now been subdivided, so that practically each place of worship is to have its own Council.

This will enable the Liberals, where they can get a majority on a Council, to call a minister of their own views. But there still remains the possibility that the Consistory may refuse to ordain or instal him. However, it is clearly the mind of the present Government that the Liberals are to have fair play.

De Pressensé's testimony to the justice of the Liberal demands, in the existing circumstances of the Reformed Church, is all the more noteworthy, inasmuch as the Liberals themselves do not, I believe, consider him their friend.

ALX. GORDON.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The protest on the subject, which you published in your last issue, was exceedingly gratifying to me. Perhaps the most unfortunate feature of the Coercion policy was that it created such angry and bitter feelings. When I first joined the Land League, it was purely from a sincere conviction that, once this Land Question were settled on a just basis, there would be free play for political forces, and what questions remained, and especially the national question would be debated with a freedom from agrarian embarrassment, which would go far to secure amicable relations between England and Ireland. But when Michael Davitt was arrested, and I found the people in different remote localities of the country at the mercy of a domineering and tyrannical magistracy and police force, then I shared the angry feelings which moved all Ireland, and which have led to the use in moments of excitement of expressions which can scarcely be justified in calmer moments. But all appearances to the contrary notwithstanding,

I aver that the most powerful party at this moment in Irish politics is [the party to which I belong, and the aims of that party are perfectly legitimate, and their methods are perfectly legitimate also. We seek to secure legislative recognition of the principle laid down by J. S. Mill, that "the land of Ireland, like the land of every other country, belongs to the people," and also for the further principle that the administration of Irish domestic affairs should be in the hands of an Irish House of Commons, on due guarantee being given for the integrity of the Empire. It often happens that we get the credit both of the aims and the methods of other parties or sections; but Michael Davitt is the leader of the moral force and the conventional-methods party, and when he was cast into Portland Prison we suffered such a blow as can hardly be described. Those of us who had the courage of our convictions kept to the platform, but we lost power rapidly, for our party was arrested one after another, and the party or section which worked in the dark, and outside the League—not inside—enjoyed absolute immunity. The Irish police could not see in the dark.

When the Government saw their mistake and released the leaders of our party, we raised a great shout of triumph. Victory was within our grasp. By the power of enlightened and organised public opinion we hoped to carry our principles speedily into law. We had again the upper hand in Irish politics, and those of us who spoke in public proclaimed again, and with acceptance, the doctrine that, given her national rights, Ireland desired to live on terms of peace with England and all the countries of the world. We gained all the moral support which belongs to victors in a battle.

Then came the appalling tragedy of Saturday last. I cannot speak of it. But I am anxious to point out that, since everybody admits—the Tory Standard and the Liberal Prime Minister—that this act has been committed with the view of discrediting the party of the released prisoners, it would be well to avoid any legislation which would have the effect of again tying our hands. Instead of discrediting us, the deed has in Ireland made us absolutely supreme. From all sides with a unanimity, a sincerity, and an indignation as gratifying as it is, no doubt, to some surprising, denunciation of this deed is heard. If we are allowed to avail ourselves of this feeling the Government may rest assured that we shall be able to suppress illegitimate secret societies. We must be allowed to conduct an agitation for the abolition of Landlordism and National Independence—(by which, I have already said, we mean a House of Commons in Dublin to administer Irish affairs)—in an open manner as before, and the conciliatory attitude of the Government towards us, and the generous and almost unanimous sympathy of the people of Ireland, will enable us to do more to secure the tranquillity of the country, and secure peace between England and Ireland, than any one can possibly imagine.

I therefore beg that the gentlemen who signed the protest I have referred to, and all who sympathise with its spirit, will still urge upon the Government the expediency of pursuing a policy of conciliation and concession; and if they do I believe from my soul that we shall see "beauty spring out of ashes and life out of the dust." This awful crime—which made strong men stand in the streets and sob—will in God's inscrutable providence prove to have been a turning point in our common history; and the gentle lady who now mourns her irreparable loss may feel that her husband's life was not in vain, and that even by his death he served the cause of righteousness and peace.

LONDON WHITSUNTIDE MEETINGS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to invite the attention of our friends, both lay and clerical, to the Whitsuntide Meetings of the Association, which promise to be of unusual interest this year? Though the interval is very brief from the largely-attended gathering in Liverpool, it is earnestly hoped that the spirit of union and zeal which was manifested on that occasion will also contribute to the success of our anniversary. Most of our ministers from the country have friends in London with whom they make their temporary home. For some, however, who could not count upon this resource arrangements have been made from year to year to meet the difficulty; but it is the desire of the Committee to extend the advantages as far as possible, so that none may be hindered from coming on this account. I would, therefore, beg the friends in London who can accommodate visitors to communicate with me without delay. It would also materially help us if we could know what visitors would wish to be provided for. I am not in a position to make promises, but we would do the best we can.

THE REV. J. H. THOM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The correspondence Dr. Martineau was able to send you last week will have been read with much gratification, not only by those who signed the letter to Mr. Thom, but also by very many others who had not the opportunity of joining in the request to which he has so kindly acceded. It is a real joy to know that from the enforced retirement to which Mr. Thom so touchingly refers, he now consents to address a larger circle than his voice could ever reach.

But my object in writing is to express the hope that Mr. Thom will overcome the hesitation which he still has about the publication of some prayers. His feelings will be readily understood and appreciated, but they will not, I trust, prevent him from enriching our devotional literature with an addition which he is so specially qualified to make. There will be, I imagine, a general agreement in his preference to keep the sermons distinct, if only we may look forward to a separate volume of prayers.

THE RESURRECTION MIRACLE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Mr. Orr says, in your last, that the Resurrection of the Lord was "a miracle not wrought by but wrought upon Jesus." But, speaking in prediction of the event, he said, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." How can this divine declaration be reconciled with Mr. Orr's?

ENGLISH THEISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I was astonished to read in your last issue, under the heading "English Theism," the news copied from the organ of the Brahmo Somaj, that "Mr. Charles Hargrove says, 'I do not believe the Universe to be the work of God.'" To a statement which, though in my own words, yet separated from context and qualification is simply a libel on my faith. Perhaps the worthiest answer would be by another statement as bald and unqualified, and as such, quite equally true, "Mr. Hargrove does believe the Universe to be the work of God."

I would subscribe to neither as an "article" of faith, but would ask for a definition of the word work. In the ordinarily accepted sense the implication is the old one of the relation of God to the universal being, that of the watchmaker to the watch, and as such I reject it, as I should for similar reasons reject what I take to be a far truer expression, "God is the life of the universe."

As a few lines expressing disapprobation of an attempt to formulate a new creed have led to the—to me—wholly unforeseen result of the publication of my name and views in India and England, I must add in regard to the goodness of God that my faith is that of Paul. With the great apostle I believe that "the invisible things of God understood by the things that are made are power and Godhead" only. Moral qualities. I seek in vain in nature, but I find them in the heart of man. The Father is revealed to me in the Son, His goodness in the good, His pity in the compassionate.

I trust those who know me will not need these explanations. Had I imagined in writing to Mr. Tyssen that my letter was for publication at home and abroad it had certainly been otherwise worded—though no care can hinder unscrupulous extracts—or rather it had never been written.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

Wednesday was presentation day at the University of London, and the Theatre in Burlington-gardens was densely crowded with graduates, undergraduates, and their friends. An interesting feature of the occasion was the presence for the first time of "girl graduates," wearing the academical robe, The Vice-Chancellor of the University, Sir G. Jessel (Master of the Rolls), presided, in the absence of Earl Granville, the Chancellor. Among those present were Dr. Storrar, chairman of Convocation, Lord Sherbrooke, and Sir J. Lubbock, M.P. for the University. The first business was the reading by the Registrar, Mr. Milman, of the reports of examinations during the past year, with which was intermixed the presentation of the graduates and undergraduates, who received from the Vice-Chancellor their diplomas, exhibitions and scholarships, medals and prizes. Several young ladies had obtained distinctions, and they were heartily cheered as they came up to receive them. These proceedings over the Vice-Chancellor addressed the assemblage, and referring to the presence of lady graduates, said he regretted that they could not carry their academical costume into the drawing-room, where it might aid them in attaining an object which, notwithstanding graduation, he supposed was still dear to the female heart. In the course of his address Sir G. Jessel referred to the fact that the Duke of Devonshire was the first Chancellor of the University, on which account convocation had passed a vote of condolence and sympathy with him in the lamentable loss which he had sustained through the atrocious and unparalleled crime which had been perpetrated in Dublin—a crime which he was sure had awakened feelings of sympathy with the noble Duke and his family, and of indignation at the atrocity, throughout the three countries forming the United Kingdom.—Sir J. Lubbock, M.P., next spoke, and bore testimony from years of personal knowledge to the qualities which had characterised Lord Frederick Cavendish. He had felt that Englishmen might safely rely on the soundness of that noble Lord's judgment. All who knew him had formed the greatest expectations of his success in his arduous duties from his kindness of heart, his warm sympathy, and his great tact, in winning the hearts of the Irish people. The hon. baronet also spoke of the loss which science had sustained by the death of Mr. Darwin.—The proceedings then terminated.

The annual meeting of Convocation of the University of London was held on Tuesday at Burlington House. Dr. Storrar was re-elected chairman of Convocation for the ensuing three years, and took the chair accordingly. On doing so he moved a resolution expressing to the Duke of Devonshire, the first Chancellor of the University, their profound sympathy with him and the other members of the family of the late Lord Frederick Cavendish under the bereavement they are suffering in consequence of the atrocious crime lately committed in Ireland. The resolution was unanimously agreed to.—Mr. W. A. Bennett moved and Mr. Shaen seconded a resolution, which was also carried, recording the sense of the meeting of the irreparable loss which science and philosophy have sustained in the death of Mr. Darwin.—Dr. Pye Smith moved a resolution requesting the Senate to ask for a new charter, under which vacancies in the number of Fellows of the University should be filled up, one-third directly by the Crown, one third by the Senate, and one-third by Convocation.—An amendment that future appointments to the Senate shall be made in turn directly by the Crown and by Convocation was lost and the original motion carried. A motion by Mr. A. MacDowall that the Senate be requested to consider the desirability of urging the claims of the University before the City of London Livery Companies Commission with especial reference to Gresham College was also agreed to. The debate on Mr. A. K. Rolit's motion, adjourned from the 17th of January, giving the Senate power to confer the Fellowship of the University on graduates who may have eminently distinguished themselves in after life was resumed, and the motion was ultimately carried, and on the motion of Mr. J. Hennell, another resolution was carried affirming the desirability of nominations made by Convocation to the Senate being made as a general rule alternately from the Faculties of Arts and Laws and the Faculties of Medicine and Science.

SOUTH SHIELDS.

FAREWELL AND PRESENTATION TO THE REV. R. COWLEY SMITH.

On Monday evening, April 24, a meeting was held in the schoolroom of Unity Church for the purpose of making a farewell presentation to the Rev. R. Cowley Smith, who is leaving that church to assume the pastorate of the Unitarian Church at Stanington, near Sheffield. There was a large audience, composed of members of the church and friends of Mr. Smith connected with other denominations. The proceedings commenced with a coffee supper. The after meeting was presided over by Mr. F. M. WALLER, and there were also present the Rev. Alfred Payne, of Newcastle, the Rev. R. Cowley Smith; Messrs. J. H. Thompson, Isaac Carr (secretary), James Downey, T. Crofton, J. Sanderson, J. R. Middleton, Wm. Marshall, and others. Letters were received from the Rev. Wm. Elliott, of Sunderland, Mr. S. M. Hawkes, M.A., of Marsden, and others, regretting their absence.

An interesting address was delivered by the Rev. Alfred Payne, after which Mr. J. H. Thompson, on behalf of the members of the church and the Unity Literary Society, rose to present Mr. Smith with a purse of gold and the following illuminated address:—

"To the Rev. R. Cowley Smith, Minister of Unity Church, South Shields.

"Respected Friend,—We, the members of Unity Church, Westoe-lane, South Shields, and of the Unity Literary Society held in conjunction therewith, take the opportunity of your leaving the sphere of your labours in the North of England to assume the spiritual charge of the ancient and historic church of Stanington, near Sheffield, to convey to you our kindly feelings of friendship and regard, and to express our high appreciation of your worth—and also that of your esteemed wife Mrs. Smith, and likewise of your son Frederick, who have assisted you so much in the spread of Unitarianism in South Shields and district. In asking you to accept this simple address and the accompanying purse of gold, we would beg to express our heartfelt sorrow at parting, but at the same time wish you and your beloved wife and family long years of health, prosperity, and happiness, and may your labours in the future be crowned with abundant success.—We remain, dear Mr. Smith, your sincere friends and well-wishers, (Signed) ISAAC CARR, Secretary."

The address, which was beautifully illuminated in gold and mounted in a very tasteful frame, was the work of J. Shaw and Sons, London.

Mr. THOMPSON referred to his intimate acquaintance with Mr. Smith from the time of, and even twelve months prior to his appointment to Unity Church, and to the pleasant relations which had existed between them. He claimed that he was somewhat instrumental in inducing Mr. Smith to come to Shields, and said he had nothing to regret in the part he took in that act. He then referred to the indefatigable manner in which Mr. Smith had discharged his duties during his four years' pastorate of Unity Church. Whatever Mr. Smith had taught in the pulpit he had carried out in his daily life—(applause).

Mr. ISAAC CARR in the course of some congratulatory remarks spoke of the pleasant duties he had had to encounter in raising the testimonial fund, and of the many expressions of regret at the departure of Mr. Smith their friends on all sides had given vent to.

After some remarks from Mr. JAMES DOWNEY, Mr. SMITH rose to reply, and was received with hearty applause. He referred to the kindness he had received, not only from Mr. Thompson, but from others during his pastorate at Unity Church, and said by such kindness he had often been cheered and supported in the time of depression and gloom. To all these friends he desired to express his deep felt gratitude. He referred to the work of the Church and the societies connected therewith, and to the lively interest Mrs. Smith had taken in the welfare of the Sunday-school. Having again returned thanks for the expressions of kindness thus manifested towards him and his family, Mr. Smith resumed his seat amid loud acclamation.

Several other gentlemen also spoke, some of whom belong to other denominations. After a short entertainment, a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Waller for presiding, and the meeting terminated.

On Sunday last two farewell sermons were preached by Mr. Smith to large congregations, the subject in the morning being "The Growth of my Unitarian Convictions," in the course of which the contrasts between Orthodoxy and Unitarianism were described, and the reasons why the preacher felt his faith increasing in the progress of an enlightened and rational religion gone into. In the evening the subject was "Farewell," and after referring to the struggles through which their cause had gone urged the members to increasing energy, earnestness and unity.

HINDLEY.—On Sunday afternoon the Rev. P. Vancesmith, M.A., alluded to the loss which the scientific world has sustained in the person of Charles Darwin, who will probably be thanked in after ages on a level with Newton and Copernicus. After briefly touching upon his simple, laborious life, he explained what Mr. Darwin's great contribution to human knowledge had been, the conception that all the phenomena of life as at present known, and as displayed in the records of geology, may be ascribed to the operation of certain definite laws whose action can still be recognised; and that this is a more probable account of things than the assumption of a special creation for each geological epoch. After giving one or two examples of the kind of evidence adduced in favour of this view, Mr. Vancesmith said that he could not pretend to establish its probability. We must go to the scientific men of the day, whose business and profession it was to judge of such questions. Finding amongst them a general agreement to accept the hypothesis as the best available explanation of the facts of nature, we must be prepared also to admit it, and we must determine how far it accorded with those beliefs which alone could justify their presence in that chapel. No doubt if the theory militated against those beliefs it would become our duty to study it more thoroughly, and to qualify ourselves to judge between it and them. But for himself he could see no such opposition. The evolution theory did not even profess to deal with the origin of things. It only said, granted that origin, we could account for all we see by certain definite laws. Those laws themselves remain the expression of the creative mind no less than a number of special creations. We find that God has acted slowly throughout countless ages, and not, as was previously believed, spasmodically, now and again at different periods; and, to his mind, that was a far higher conception of the Almighty Creator. No doubt the new light was opposed to many old and popular ideas. No amount of ingenuity could reconcile the first chapter of Genesis with Darwin's theory. But we must remember that biblical science had advanced no less than that of biology, and had shown us that the book of Genesis was not written by Moses under the direct inspiration of God, but was a compilation of much later date. And, although of no scientific value, it would always be a masterpiece of art. The dignified simplicity of the account of creation, free from all degrading ideas of the Creator, would always read like a constant challenge to render glory to God; and we might learn from the old Hebrew writer a reverent modesty in dealing with the things of God which was perhaps too much wanted in the world.

Dr. JOHN BROWN, author of "Rab and his Friends," died at his residence, Portland-street, Edinburgh, on Thursday, in the seventy-first year of his age. Within the past few weeks Dr. Brown had published two volumes—"John Leech and other Papers," and another, "Locke, Sydenham, and other Papers." The former is already in its third edition. Dr. Brown was the great grandson of the celebrated Dr. Brown, of Haddington, and was a zealous member of the United Presbyterian Church.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure food and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps' Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Obituary.

ORVILLE DEWEY, D.D.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

To die in one's nest—what a sweet privilege is this! Granted to few, but it was granted him. He died on the very spot, in the very house, where he was born eighty-eight years ago, March 28, 1794. His parents were simple farmer folk, of sterling character and sound intelligence. At the age of sixteen he went to Williams College. The poet Bryant entered at the [same] time, but one class in advance. The two, born in the same year, were destined for friendship later, when, in New York Bryant was one of Dewey's people. Gradually, with the highest honours, he was compelled by a persistent trouble in his eyes to restrain himself from those theological studies on which he had set his heart; but after two years of teaching in Sheffield and clerkship in New York he went to the Andover Theological School, and remained there till he had completed the prescribed course of study. But these three years were remarkable for theological excitement. The Unitarian controversy, which had fairly begun in 1815, was already at its height. The noise of battle had reached the young student at his vigil in the school, whose teachers met their classes with the smoke of conflict on their garments and its sweat upon their brows. Dewey began to doubt the soundness of the creed, and even dared to go to Boston and hear the man who was the head and front of infidel offending. But he must do all things with deliberation, and after leaving Andover, he assumed the charge of a little orthodox society in Gloucester, Mass., with a distinct understanding that he was wavering in his faith. He wavered more and more, and then began to grow stable, but upon a new foundation. Once, when the flesh was weakest, he cried out to a classmate, "Come and see me; I am all alone; I must have sympathy; let us talk together once more; come, I am desolate;" and the answer came back, "I cannot. It is a crime worse than murder to doubt as you do."

After leaving Orthodoxy he spent several weeks in the home of Channing, and for two years preached at his desk. Channing was on the ground at first, but afterward in Europe. Until he went abroad he attended Dewey's preaching, sitting in the pulpit as was the miserable custom of those days. Channing's first criticism on his preaching was, "You address yourself too much to the imagination and too little to the conscience," which is certainly not true of the Dewey whom we know in his collected works.

In 1823 he was called to New Bedford, and remained there until 1833. He came to New York in 1835, and took charge of the Second Unitarian Society. William Ware, the historical romancer, was preaching for the First Society, which had four years to wait for Dr. Bellows. The society to which Dr. Dewey came was small and weak. It was large and strong before many years had passed away.

If Dr. Dewey's volume of New Bedford sermons admits us to the secret of his earlier successes, the volumes which contain the most significant of his discourses in New York are not so serviceable when we come to the success that waited on his metropolitan preaching. Not because these discourses are inferior to the first collection, but because their average quality is so superior to that and to the average quality of all the preaching that has found audience in Christian churches from the earliest to the latest times. Take, for example, the course of sermons on Moral Views of Commerce, Society and Politics. Some of the subjects were, "The Moral Law of Contracts," "The Moral End of Business," "The Moral Limits of Accumulation." These sermons were delivered to churches filled to overflowing with attentive, interested and enthusiastic hearers. Here was a living conscience speaking to the consciences of his fellow-men. This chastened style, these formal arguments, must have been fused as they were spoken by the moral seriousness of the preacher into a glowing mass that burned away the meanness and frivolity, the selfishness and hardness, of the listening multitude with its consuming heat. It must not, however, be supposed that all of Dr. Dewey's preaching in New York had this pruned severity of outward form. Some of the printed sermons of this period are full of high imagination, genial sympathy and flaming inspiration.

Dr. Dewey's New York pastorate terminated in 1848. Of its thirteen years he had spent two in Europe, seeking for health which, partly found, soon failed again. Hence, in good part, the resignation of his trust and his retirement to his country home. But this retirement had a positive inspiration also: the desire to brood over his thought more patiently. Non multa, sed multum,—not many things, but much,—was henceforth the motto of his life. Indeed it had always been his motto, but now it was so more decidedly. In the thirty-four years that have elapsed since he left the Church of the Messiah he has had but one settlement,—at the New South, in Boston,—and this, beginning in 1858, lasted but four years. He also preached one winter in Albany and two winters in Washington. His next longest tarrying was here in Brooklyn with our own society.

The mental product of Dr. Dewey's thirty years of home-staying quietness has been, so far as published, a volume of lectures, "The Problem of Human Life and Destiny," and a volume of sermons, "The Two Great Commandments." These were delivered in many places. Another course, upon "The Education of the Human Race," repeated this experience.

The professional life of Dr. Dewey has synchronised almost exactly with the lifetime of Unitarianism in America. And his views for many years were of the most conservative character, not only in regard to the Bible, the Sabbath, the nature and offices of Jesus, and the atonement, but also in regard to future punishment. From 1820 to 1840 there was much softening and sweetening of these things, but in 1844 his face is still set as a flint against the criticism of Strauss, the radicalism of Parker. His dictum is: No Christianity without acknowledgment of its character as a supernatural revelation, or without acknowledgment of the final and complete authority of the teachings of Jesus. There is little or no sign of his variance from these positions until in 1864 we suddenly discover that they have been utterly abandoned. Not yet, perhaps, the supernatural position for himself, but the disposition to make it a test of Unitarian or Christian fellowship. The liberality of his sentiments outran the rationalism of his intellect. He deprecated not only denominational, but "Christian sectarianism." He pleaded for a more intelligent appreciation of the famous infidels and heretics. "There is hardly any book," he said, "that I should more welcome than a fair, impartial and discriminating work upon the great sceptics."

But Dr. Dewey was representative not only of the increasing liberality and rationality of the Unitarian development from first to last, but of what seems to me to be the loftiest expression it has yet attained—its dual faith in God and man, with the co-ordinate hope of an immortal life.

It seems to me that the God-side of his religion was as calmly reasoned, as consistent, as legitimate in its sphere as the man-side. We have had among us no other man with such capacity for awe and reverence and adoration. When I am told that worship, prayer, is a survival of the past, which has no logical standing-room in any scheme of rational religion, I think of this man's hushed and tender lifting of his face and voice and mind and heart to the Eternal Life, and I know that he was right, and that those who cannot worship, cannot pray, have snared themselves in some miserable literalness of thought and phrase, which will not long entangle and impede the spiritual motion of any simple, natural, and healthy man. His hope of immortality was the inevitable corollary of his faith in man and God.

I have read many hundred pages of his writings during the last few days. I must confess that they have filled my mind with shame at the comparative frivolity of my own thought and speech. They had bred in me a high resolve that I will attend more earnestly to the problems of our social life, if haply I may bring the everlasting principles of truth and justice more intimately home to you in your business and your politics and your domestic life. I wish that I could stir up hundreds and thousands of young men and women to the perusal of these writings. I know that they would rise from them with a new sense of the dignity and splendour of their own endowments, and with an equal sense of the magnificence of their environment and of the unspeakable perfections of the in-dwelling and inspiring God.

TAUNTON.—The annual business meeting of the Mary-street Congregation was held on the 30th ult., when the financial statements were received and adopted, and officers and committees appointed for the ensuing year. The report of the Chapel Committee, read by the secretary, Mr. Philpott, gave full particulars of the restoration of the chapel, which had been successfully taken in hand by the minister and congregation during the past year. The total cost, excepting about £100, had already been raised with the aid of friends, and it was hoped that the remainder would soon be cleared off. The Rev. John Birks gave the twelfth record of Church life and work for the year ending April, 1882, dwelling upon the present position and future prospects of the Congregation, and its various connected institutions. All these continued to prosper, notwithstanding very severe losses by death and removal. The regular subscriptions to the numerous funds of the chapel had been well kept up, and the amount in collections for various purposes was a considerable increase upon the former year, although a great effort had been made in contributions to the Restoration Fund.

BELFAST.—The annual meeting of the Second Congregation was held on Friday evening, April 28, Dr. Hyndman in the chair, and the occasion was taken of offering a resolution of welcome to the Rev. James C. Street, on his return in renewed health from a voyage to the Mediterranean and Constantinople. Mr. McClelland moved, and Mr. James M. Darbishire seconded the resolution, which, being supported by a number of members present, was put to the meeting, and carried by acclamation:—"That the Members of this Congregation extend to their beloved Pastor, the Rev. James C. Street, a cordial and affectionate greeting on his return from abroad in renewed health and vigour. That they look forward with hope and confidence to his continued vindication of those principles of religious toleration and spiritual freedom which he has hitherto so persistently and successively striven to maintain. And that they rejoice to know that, in returning from the proceedings of the Conference held last week in Liverpool, he brings with him new hopes and fresh encouragement, combined with the consciousness that he is fortified in his work in the North of Ireland by the moral support of the Free Christian Churches of England and America." Mr. Street acknowledged the resolution in feeling and touching terms, and after dwelling on the close and affectionate ties by which he and the Congregation had been united for upwards of eleven years, he spoke in glowing terms of the noble and animating spirit which characterised the proceedings of the Liverpool Conference, and expressed his conviction that the prospects of a free and enlightened Christianity had never been so encouraging as they were at the present time.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.—At a meeting of the committee of this society, held on May 7, Professor Corfield, M.A., M.D., in the chair, the death of Mr. Emerson was referred to, he having been an honorary member of the society. The following resolution was unanimously passed, on the proposal of Mark H. Judge, A.R.I.B.A., seconded by Mr. Robson J. Scott:—"That inasmuch as Ralph Waldo Emerson, lately deceased, was one of the truest exponents of the movement represented by the Sunday Society, and his connection with the society itself, as an honorary member, one of its proudest distinctions, this committee deplore the event which while severing that connection has deprived America of an illustrious citizen, and the world at large of a benign influence, and express their profoundest sympathy with the surviving relatives of the eminent thinker in the loss they have sustained." The twenty-ninth and thirtieth Sunday Art Exhibitions of the Sunday Society were opened on May 7. The first consisted of a collection of water-colour drawings by Mr. William L. Thomas, at the Graphic Gallery; the second the annual exhibition of the Society of British Artists at the Suffolk-street Gallery. Each gallery was open for two hours, and the number of visitors was:—Suffolk-street Gallery, 450; Graphic Gallery, 133.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Nothing preserves the health so well as these alterative Pills in changeable weather, or when our nervous systems are irritable. They act admirably on the stomach, liver, and kidneys, and so thoroughly purify the blood, that they are the most efficient remedy for warding off derangements of the stomach, fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, and other maladies, and giving tone and energy to enervated valetudinarians. All who have the natural and laudable desire of maintaining their own and their family's health cannot do better than trust to Holloway's Pills, which cool, regulate, and strengthen. These purifying Pills are suitable for all ages, seasons, climates, and constitutions, when all other means fail, and are the female's best friend.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday week. The questions of corporal punishment and industrial schools were discussed. As to the former a resolution was passed adding to the code of regulations for the guidance of managers and teachers a provision calculated to make teachers more particular in avoiding the exercise of corporal punishment. Mrs. Surr wished that truants who had been sent to industrial schools at the instance of the School Board, and who had remained there for six months, should be allowed to return to their homes, if they have any. The Board avoided voting on the proposition by means of "the previous question," it being generally considered that pending the report of the Royal Commission on industrial schools no opinion should be expressed. The resignation of Mr. Scrutton, late chairman of the Industrial Schools Committee, was received, and a special meeting was appointed to be held for the purpose of filling up the vacancy.—At the meeting of the Board on Thursday the question of higher elementary education was again discussed. At the end of another debate the whole question was referred back to the School Management Committee to consider and bring up a scheme suited, in their judgment, to promote higher elementary education in the Metropolis. The letter of retirement from Mr. Scrutton caused considerable discussion, resulting in the passing of resolutions expressing regret that he had found it necessary to withdraw from the Board, and fixing Thursday, 15th June next, for a special meeting to elect a member to fill the vacancy.

THE LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual meeting of this admirable Society, on Wednesday evening, was in every respect one of the most gratifying and successful that has ever occurred during the nearly half-century of its existence. The Rev. STOPFORD BROOKE, whose first appearance it was at a public meeting of this kind, ingenuously confessed that he was more accustomed to the pulpit than the platform, but it need hardly be said that he delivered a most interesting address in a style that was delightful from its very simplicity, and if he had been able to preside during the whole of the proceedings would, no doubt, have acquitted himself in the chair as efficiently as if he had been to the manner born.

Mr. BROOKE's public and explicit avowal of his adhesion to the Unitarian body, and his readiness to co-operate in every possible way with the earnest workers he saw around him, was extremely gratifying to the meeting, and will henceforth remove the doubts that have been expressed in some quarters, outside our own circle, as to his theological position. We have now a clear right to claim him as one of our own ministers, engaged in a common work with us, just as much as Dr. MARTINEAU and Professors DRUMMOND and ESTLIN CARPENTER are ministers in connection with our Free Churches, devoting their lives to the cause of a pure and unsectarian form of Christianity.

Mr. BROOKE is sufficiently well versed in the constitution and working of our Domestic Mission to know that it is essentially an undenominational institution, founded for the purpose of promoting the practical Christian life quite apart from any sectarian interests or mere dogmatic purposes.

He would have been quite as cordially received even if he had not declared his sympathy with the denomination by whom the Mission is almost entirely supported. He was invited to preside on the same ground as in former years well-known Broad Churchmen, like Dr. A. J. ROSS and Mr. S. A. BARNETT, have been invited to the meeting; as this year Mr. PICTON and his successor, Mr. FORSYTH, were invited—the ground of "common Christianity," which is paramount to all denominational distinctions.

As a matter of simple fact, however, this Domestic Mission of ours was founded and is supported by Unitarians, and by no others. The rejection of orthodox views and methods of work, and the broad lines on which its operations are carried out, make it practically a Unitarian institution, whether we will it to be so or not. We leave the door wide open to all, whether friends or strangers, who are ready to co-operate on the undogmatic basis, but, as at the Liverpool Conference, none will enter save the suspected heretics of their own communion, who are either turned out or shut out of the more or less dogmatic organisations to which they owe little more than hereditary allegiance. But they are at one with us in seeking to promote religious progress, the moral and social elevation of the poor, the influence of Christianity as a spiritual power and practical life in the world; and, in view of these great objects, what matter our minor denominational differences? And so we trust that in future meetings of this and other of our Societies we shall be favoured more and more with the presence and co-operation not only of men like Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE—who, whether inside or outside of the Established Church, has for years past been in more or less conscious sympathy with us—but of men like Mr. PICTON and Mr. FORSYTH, who still occupy a somewhat outside position, while, no doubt, owning much in common with a denomination which is aggressive chiefly against sin, and ignorance, and misery, and dogmatic only in its resolute protest against all dogmatic limitations.

Of the good work done by the Domestic Mission during the year the clear and full reports of the missionaries, and the admirable speeches we have given in another page, bear ample testimony.

We are gratified to observe that the discontinuance of the mixed schools at both the mission stations has been attended by none of the results that had for a time been feared, but has rather helped to increase the efficiency of other departments of mission work. We have insisted for years past that the work of primary education is taken out of the hands of our congregations and missions by the efficient School Board system which is now everywhere coming into operation. Sooner or later our day-schools everywhere must become extinct, or be handed over bodily to the local School Boards. It is to the credit of the managers of our Domestic Missions generally that they have recognised this logical necessity, and have thus had their resources and energies freed for other and more important work, which lies altogether outside the province of even the most efficient system of Government education. The committee's report recognises the urgent duties devolving upon us in view of the increasing wealth and growing needs of this great metropolis. They desire to carry into other neighbourhoods the same trusts and the same methods which have already proved effective in the stations so long established. If our Missions were doubled in number they would bear an inadequate proportion to the wealth of our body in the metropolis. Every mission such as these, with numerous institutions gathered around them for the benefit of both children and adults, is a refining, a civilising, and a Christianising agency in the poor neighbourhood in which it is planted. Its influence for good can hardly be over-estimated, especially when these agencies are conducted and superintended by men of the calibre of our present missionaries. If our richer congregations only follow Mr. BROOKE's example, and pledge themselves to £50 or £100 a year each; if our wealthy laymen follow Mr. NETTLEFOLD's lead, and in his spirit guarantee that pecuniary resources shall not be wanting for any well-considered plan of the kind to which the meeting of Wednesday pledged itself, the main part of the work is already done: the only thing that remains is to find earnest and self-devoted men who are ready to carry it into effective operation. Every one interested in the Mission will be glad to observe that the Committee have recognised the duties they owe to the excellent men who are so efficiently carrying on a work which can be gauged by no pecuniary standards. The first duty of the subscribers, before entering upon any new and large plans of extension, is to take care that the stipends of the missionaries are secured at the very modest amount to which they are now raised.

Other points suggested by the subsequent addresses, and by the excellent reports of Mr. POPE and Mr. SUMMERS, so different in tone yet each so admirable in its kind, must be reserved for another occasion. We read with pleasure and entire approval the wise protest in Dr. MARTINEAU's speech against the cry which is being raised for legislative action in aid of efforts to ameliorate the material condition of the poor in the metropolis. In this country, at least, there can be, and there ought to be, no legislation to bring down rents, or interfere in any department of life with natural economical laws. The question of rents, like the price of meat or of clothing, must be left to the law of supply and demand. The present evils will soon right themselves, if only a spirit of providence and self-dependence were more prevalent among the working classes, and a spirit of strict justice, combined with large-hearted interest in the well-being of the poor and neglected, among the higher classes. Even Sir RICHARD CROSS's cumbrous Act seems to have failed in carrying out the excellent intentions of the Legislature; and it is clear that this question must be left chiefly, if not solely, to private benevolence, acting in harmony, as far as possible, with sound economical principles. Model lodging houses are rapidly increasing in the poorer districts of the Metropolis, and are found to be profitable investments; and capitalists, whether great or small, could hardly contribute more effectually to promote the well-being of the poor than by investing money in schemes of this kind, contented to receive a modest four or five per cent. interest.

One main conclusion from the reports and discussions of Wednesday is that we must look chiefly to moral and spiritual forces for the permanent elevation of the condition of the working-classes, and not to legislative interposition, except in so far as it may be needful to undo or correct the mischievous laws of past unwisdom. The virtues of prudence, self-help, and manly industry are those which the poor most stand in need of, and these are the qualities urged upon the young especially, in our admirable Missions, which we are bound to support in the largest and most generous spirit.

CHURCH IDEALS.

WE have read with attention Dr. MACFADYEN's address at the recent meeting of the Congregational Union, and are constrained to say that it does not appear to us a very successful performance. The subject was "The Ideal of the Christian Church"—a great one truly, and one on which much suggestive and elevating thought might have been expected. But we miss this, and find instead a number of smart sayings, greeted with cheers and laughter, and a rambling discourse touching lightly on an almost endless variety of topics. The lecturer's aim seems to have been to say something smart and striking on each of those topics, and he appears from the report to have succeeded, so far at least as to keep his audience awake. This is faint praise for an effort which is expected to be much more than common, but we must leave those who have read the address to judge for themselves whether our criticism is deserved.

The ideal of the Christian Church, according to Dr. MACFADYEN, is a more developed, more zealous and earnest congregationalism. Congregationalism, he thinks, is on the right lines, it is animated by the right principles, it has the right form of Church government, it pursues the right methods, and aims at the right objects; but it needs to be imbued with a new spirit from on high to attain what is possible to it, and make it in reality the ideal of the Christian Church. Such, so far as we can gather it from the speaker's discursive remarks, is the substance of his address. And no doubt Congregationalists generally—perhaps we may say universally—would agree with him. Such is their ideal; but there are other branches of the great Christian Church whose ideal is different. Neither the Roman Catholic Church nor the Anglican, for instance, would admit that the true ideal is on the lines of Congregationalism. The universal establishment of the kingdom of CHRIST on earth—this is the fundamental idea cherished by each, but beyond this there is no common assent or agreement among the Churches of Christendom. On all points of detail, methods, agencies, rites, forms, and doctrines they differ as widely as possible; and there is not the remotest chance of their coming to a common agreement. Dr. MACFADYEN and his audience also believe that the disestablishment of the English Church would greatly contribute to promote the realisation of the true ideal, but the vast majority of Churchmen would take a directly opposite view. In their estimation nothing more disastrous to the interests of Christianity in England could happen—no departure be made farther, in their judgment, from the true ideal. How hopelessly the Roman Catholic Church is at variance with all others on this point need not be pointed out. The fact is, the ideals of the Christian Church are as various as the sects. Each has its own, and will not surrender in the smallest degree what constitutes its distinctive feature. Dr. MACFADYEN may say Congregationalism is the true ideal, and others equally well qualified to judge would on behalf of their Churches respectively advance just the same claim. What is the practical result, then? Is it not this—that each Church must work on its own lines, leaving others to do the same, but no one can claim to have all the truth, or the only right methods, or the only worthy ideal? For our own part, we are convinced that this variety conduces to the best practical results in the end. We are persuaded that it would not be for the interests of the Church or Christianity for all other methods of Church organisation to be abolished, and for Congregationalism alone to prevail. Episcopacy is a form that must be credited with a large amount of vigour and success. It has accomplished great things, and has shown itself well adapted to meet the wants of the case. The consideration as to the Church form of the first Christian congregations—their mode of Church government and so forth—is of very little consequence, indeed, when considering the question, What is best in these days? In no sense whatever are Christian Churches to-day under any obligation to conform to the methods of the primitive Church. This subject is an interesting historical study, and nothing more. The great interests at stake are those of truth, freedom, and righteousness, and the Church which best promotes these makes the nearest approach after all to the ideal church. We say makes the nearest approach, for not one realises the ideal perfectly. All have their short-comings—all are defective in some respects. Each, doubtless, has something to learn from the rest; but that lesson, unfortunately, all seem unwilling to learn. As no one form of political government is the best under all circumstances, so no one form of church government meets all wants in all cases. It is high time that all exclusive pretension on this ground were given up, and the obvious facts candidly admitted. Dr. MACFADYEN appears to think that the churches have a great deal to learn from one another, and he sees no reason why they should not avail themselves of this means of improvement. "If there is anything," he says, "in the thought of one section of the Church of CHRIST, why should we not try to fit it into our thought?" He contends that loyalty to the Congregationalist Ideal does not demand persistence in any usage after experience

Of course in a long address, filling over fourteen columns of the Nonconformist, there could not fail to be some noteworthy sayings. Two or three of these we now add:—

"No Church can live upon the past. No sons can live upon their fathers. If we are to justify our existence to the men of the present day we must grapple with the nineteenth century problems, as the Puritans, the Nonconformists, and the Methodists respectively grappled with the problems of their day."

"We are reminded that the influence of Nonconformity has invariably been cast on the side of freedom. So it has undoubtedly. Our Churches have a record in this volume of the world's history, for which we are thankful. The story of to day is not less bright than the record of by-gone years. But liberty is rather an essential to well being than actual well being itself."

That is, in other words—Liberty is not the end itself, but the means to an end, the end being the attainment of truth:—

"If anything is certain it is that disestablishment must come. The Utopia of yesterday is among the probabilities of to-morrow. The dream of the student has become the text of the statesman. The eagle's wings have grown—no man's hand can stay its flight."

"We speak glibly enough at times of 'saving souls' as being the work of the ministry and of the Church. Do we think enough of what the words mean? What is saving a soul? Is a soul saved because it has put forth a few languid desires for salvation? Surely not. What is a soul? It is the thinking, remembering, judging, imagining, fearing, hoping, reasoning, loving, living man. To save the soul then means that the man in every faculty of his many-sided nature is saved."

"Truth is the means of sanctification. 'Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth,' is the Saviour's prayer. The tree of knowledge is on the way to the tree of life."

"To say that our ideal has never been reached is no proof that our ideal is false; still less is it an argument in evidence that the actual ought not to be brought into conformity with the ideal. We are idealists, then. If we err in cherishing our ideal, we err in the best company. In all ages the most philosophical theorists, and the most heroic workers have done the same thing, i.e., cherished a lofty ideal. But we do not err, though we thus speak, in cherishing our ideal. The illusions of life are not necessarily delusions. Imagination is a faculty to be trained, not to be eradicated. Mere repose is not the great object to be sought in human education; rather the mind is to be fired with a noble unrest, pressing on unto perfection. What life has not some ideal, and been the better for it? Imagination is not confined to books and to art. The merchant puts imagination into his business; the architect puts imagination into his buildings; the shipwright in the ships that he sends forth to do battle with the storms and with the ice giants. Science cannot dispense with the scaffold of hypothesis. Knowledge will not advance if it confines itself to the results of experience."—"So far as methods are concerned, the Church has power to put on institutions when it wants them, and to put them off when it has done with them. When they have become manacles and fetters, cramping the life they cannot contain, the sooner they are parted with the better. We glide into routine. We degenerate into habit. The inspiration of former ages becomes the bondage of the present. The forms in which the protests of former days were made become anvils on which we forge new fetters for ourselves."

Very true, Dr. MACFADYEN, and not in regard to Church methods only, but also Church doctrines as well.

VULGARISING THEOLOGY.

THE French use the word vulgarisation in our sense of popularising, but what we mean by vulgarising is presenting a subject so as to bring it down to the lowest kind of taste and capacity, instead of endeavouring to raise the persons addressed to a higher sort of comprehension. Salvation Armies and similar organisations seem to depend for their success upon the earnestness and volubility with which the lowest and most ignorant kind of theology is poured forth in the familiar language of common life. If the same earnestness and the employment of homely language were engaged in propagating a wiser faith, the ultimate result would be far better, but not so the chances of immediate success. An ignorant class may be taught to value education, but the effort to improve them is less immediately agreeable than degrading a topic to their own level.

What trash suffices to win notoriety and reputation for preaching power is illustrated in the publications given away at the doors of Exeter Hall in this month of May. Passing that way we were presented with a copy of the Christian Herald and Signs of the Times, in which, amongst other matter of very low literary character, we found a sermon by Dr. TALMAGE, containing the following passage, intended to show how little the statements of scientific men are worth the attention of Evangelicals:—

What do these scientists agree on? Herschel writes a whole chapter on the errors of astronomy. La Place declares that the moon was not put in the right place. He says if it had been put four times further from the earth than it is now there would be more harmony in the universe; but Lionville comes up just in time to prove that the moon was put in the right place. How many colours woven into the light? Seven, says Isaac Newton. Three, says David Brewster. How high is the Aurora Borealis? Two and a half miles, says Lias. How far is the sun from the earth? Seventy-six million miles, says Lacalle. Eighty-two million miles, says Humboldt. Ninety million miles, says Henderson. One hundred and four million miles, says Mayer. Only a little difference of twenty-eight million miles! All split up among themselves—not agreeing on anything.

It would be unreasonable to expect an orator of this description to know what he was talking about when his subject was the relation of science to religion. The stock doctrine of men like Dr. TALMAGE is, that all human knowledge is worthless compared with the notions they extract from the Bible. The idea of reading the Old or New Testament in the light of historical or scientific criticism is thoroughly opposed to their system, and they gratify their own vanity and that of other ignorant people by representing the investigations of the philosopher as of no account. No reader of the Inquirer will be troubled with Dr. TALMAGE'S statements about the differences of scientific men. His allusions to astronomy, and to the nature of light, are quite sufficient to prove that his mental condition in reference to such matters is one of total darkness; but it may be well to call attention to the extreme delicacy of such an inquiry as the distance of the sun from the earth. The probable distance, as now ascertained, is under ninety-three million of miles, and a few years ago it was supposed some two millions more. Sir J. HERSCHEL, speaking of a still larger discrepancy, observed "that the superficial reader (one of a class too numerous) may think it strange and discreditable to science to have erred by nearly four millions of miles in estimating the sun's distance. But such may be reminded that the error of 0" 32' in the sun's parallax, on which the correction turns, corresponds with an apparent breadth of a human hair at 125 feet, or of a sovereign at eight miles off; and that, moreover, this error has been detected, and the correction applied, and that the detection and correction have originated with the friends, and not with the enemies of science."

The doctrine of development does not suit the vulgarisation of theology, and so it is well for Dr. TALMAGE to know nothing about it, and thus to be left with the happiness of using words he does not understand. It is thus he speaks of the "survival of the fittest":—"You just take your scientific consolation into that room where a mother has lost her child. Try in that case your splendid doctrine of the 'survival of the fittest.' Tell her that child died because it was not worth as much as the other children. That is your 'survival of the fittest.'"

Stern Calvinism with its doctrine of Election seems out of fashion, but man's eternal destiny is still represented as dependent upon what is called his conversion here. In one of Mr. MOODY'S sermons in the publication before us the hearers were informed that there are people now in hell who heard him eight years ago, but did not believe what he told them till it was too late.

The coarse familiarity with which these vulgarisers speak of GOD and CHRIST in no wise shocks the class they address, and they mean no irreverence by it. As the result of their teaching the Deity appears as a cruel and unreasonable tyrant, and CHRIST as the Saviour from his wrath if the technical terms of salvation are complied with by the repentant sinner. The love manifested by CHRIST is dwelt upon in a way that may excite some useful feelings. It is a great thing for the poor and the outcast to find pity in heaven if they meet with little upon earth, but it surely ought to be possible in modern society to address the lowest and least cultured so as to make them feel children of the Most High without adulterating the Divine message with the coarse rubbish which the vulgarisers supply.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY finds nothing like false doctrine in the teaching of the Salvation Army, and at his suggestion the Bishops in Convocation agreed to inquire into the matter. The Bishop of OXFORD did not think the Army "wanted to come under the guidance of the Church," and the Bishop of EXETER thought that establishing some relations with them might be desirable, "if they would undertake to be careful not to teach what was contrary to Church doctrines," which was obviously a very proper remark from one of the contributors to "Essays and Reviews." The Salvationists are not likely to bring their enthusiasm and their ignorance to be measured and estimated by Church standards. What is good in the movement is its heartiness and contempt for danger and difficulty; but if it rouses some dead souls to a sense of duty and thus does good there is surely mischief in filling children with notions of Hell and the Devil, and teaching them to boast of their having taken tickets for Heaven, where they will wear golden crowns, while their unconverted relations and friends are in a very different place. Some time ago we gave many extracts from the Salvationist papers, and though the Archbishop may think their doctrines Orthodox, we cannot but regret that so much zeal and so much labour should be deficient in intelligent guidance. The most recent manifestations at the Salvation Congress were so hysterical as to be perilously near insanity.

THE UNSOLVED IRISH PROBLEM.

MR. HAROLD RYLETT, whose letter we published last week, offers a curious instance of an Englishman of recent importation into Ireland becoming after a brief experience almost more Irish than the people themselves. He is not only a Land Leaguer, but a Home Ruler; and he entirely believes that if the parties thus represented in his person were allowed to have their own way all would be well, and the Irish problem that has hitherto baffled the ablest statesmen would be finally solved.

We give Mr. RYLETT due credit for his sincerity, while we more than doubt his competency to pronounce so confident a judgment. He has too readily caught the infection of the temperament and temper of his colleagues of the Land League to be trusted in a matter that calls for the cool judgment of the statesman, and not the rhetoric of the partisan. He half admits, indeed, that his own speeches during the Land League meetings were not what they ought to have been. His admission would have been more acceptable every way if it had been accompanied by an acknowledgment that the silence of his colleagues while outrage after outrage and murder after murder was being perpetrated, neither landlord nor tenant being spared, was censurable in the strongest degree. It was only the last and most brutal of these atrocities, the butchery of Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH and Mr. BURKE, that broke the guilty silence, and evoked the reprobation of Messrs. PARNELL, DAVITT, and DILLON. Mr. RYLETT tells us of the horror this excited in Ireland; but where was the horror when Lord MOUNTMORRES fell, and Mr. BOYD, and Mrs. SMYTH, and a score of others? There was indeed horror and shame widely felt, but not by the Land League people. Could anything have been more cold-blooded under the circumstances than Mr. PARNELL'S allusion to the murder of Mr. BOYD near New Ross, when a week or two after that sad event, addressing a crowded meeting in the town, he said that "murder was unnecessary." Was that the way to speak at such a time of the dread command, "Thou shalt do no murder?"

One melancholy thing in the state of Ireland lies in the fact that it has no real statesmen to guide the people; that its representatives' highest idea of the functions of legislators is to obstruct the business of a great empire. When we think of such men as BIGGAR, and HEALY, and REDMOND, absorbing the time of the House of Commons in speeches that possess neither wit nor wisdom, speeches often loaded with spiteful vulgarity, we despair of the people who select such men to be the mouthpieces of their sentiments. With all his faults O'CONNELL within the walls of the House of Commons could be the gentleman as well as the orator.

But to revert to Mr. RYLETT'S two-fold panacea, which we take to be the abolition of Landlordism, and the adoption of Home Rule. If he means first, that all the landlords of Ireland are to be legally dispossessed of their rights as proprietors, we presume that he and the League are prepared with a scheme of compensation; for assuredly the people of Great Britain would not listen for an hour to a proposal to transfer these rights to the present race of tenants, unless adequate compensation by the State or by the tenants were made to the landlords. The tenants are too poor to do this, and the British taxpayers would not, we imagine, consent to bear the heavy burden of the annual millions that would otherwise have to be provided out of the national exchequer. But there is a great fallacy underneath the word "Landlordism." Whoever owns land is virtually a landlord with a landlord's rights, not only of occupation but of sale. You cannot by any Act of Parliament bind the owner not to let or sell the whole or part of the land he occupies. The upshot would be that in Ireland a new race of impoverished landlords would be created, without the mental culture or the capital of the dispossessed race

The assumption of Mr. RYLETT is that all Irish landlords are bad, and therefore to be, as such, abolished. But this has been disproved again and again. Good resident landlords in Ireland as in England are just the class most needed to improve its agriculture and promote the prosperity of the people. Heartless absentees who drain the country and do nothing either way are after all not the most numerous class, and it might be possible to reach them by special legislation, so as to compel them to do their duty as proprietors. Think what an immense amount of good was effected by the celebrated COKE of Norfolk, first Earl of Leicester, by his passion for scientific farming. To have "abolished" such a man in order to cover his estates with a mass of poor unskilled proprietors would have been as foolish a stroke of statesmanship as ever was perpetrated. The misery of it is that such a man in Ireland would be anything but popular. COKE would accept no tenants who had not sufficient capital, or who did not give proof of farming skill. The treatment of Mr. BENGE JONES in Ireland—no doubt a hard, dry sort of man, but severely just and a most able farmer—is a proof that strictness and sound judgment are not at present popular qualities in the sister country. To those who fancy that a peasant proprietary is the one thing needful we commend the careful perusal of a paper by Lady VERNEY in last month's Contemporary Review, called "Jottings in France." If her statements be correct, the lot of this class is by no means an enviable one. Mr. TUKE in the same number inferentially shows that in the west of Ireland at all events such a proprietary is an impossibility; his remedy is emigration on such a scale as would greatly reduce the terrible competition for land, where farms now exist as low as two and a half acres! Mr. RYLETT'S Home Rule remedy is, perhaps, less feasible than his abolition of landlordism. Why Ireland should have a separate legislature and not Scotland or Wales has not been yet shown. She has nearly double the number of representatives in the British House of Commons that the former country possesses. Were these but as united and as practical as the Scotch members they might secure the passing of any really serviceable Act of Parliament. But would they be a bit more united in Dublin than they are in London? Would Ulster submit to the rule of the other three provinces? Still, apart from this, a great kingdom cannot permit a separate imperial rule to grow up at its own doors, to become a fulcrum or a lever for any hostile European Power which might wish to use it against Great Britain. Twice at least France has made the attempt and failed, when steam power was unknown, and the winds and the waves were against her. It was this danger amongst others that led English statesmen to bring about the Union by means that were not at all creditable to them or the members of the Irish Parliament that accepted their bribes. The Union was a wise policy, accomplished by bad means, and hence, in great part, its failure. It has, however, been for many years, a fait accompli, and no British statesman or Legislature will now for a moment attempt to disturb its settlement. As to mere Home Rule, it would never satisfy the aspirations of that portion of the Irish people who desire the restoration of the Lords and Commons of Ireland. Home Rule has never been defined, and may mean a sort of National Board of Works or the possession of co-equal Legislative functions. The late Mr. BUTT, with all his astuteness, shrunk from the required definition, and contented himself with merely moving from time to time for a Committee of Inquiry into the working of the Act of Union.

One main factor in the seemingly insoluble Irish problem is constantly left out of the account in the calculation of Irishorators, viz., the character of three fourths of the people. Feeling and imagination take with them the place of thought and reflection. They are destitute of the training that commerce and practical science directly and indirectly give to the minds and habits of a people. Half the poverty of Ireland arises from the absence of trade, and the great towns it creates, which provide so wide a market for surplus labour. Were it not for these, France with its peasant proprietary would long ere this have fallen into the same wretched social condition as Mayo, for example. The trade resources of Ireland, save in Ulster with its linen manufacture, have never been developed, and forced idleness and inertia have accordingly widely affected the character of the people. Trade cannot exist, nor grow, without capital and skill to employ it; capital will not come where there is disorder and violence; hence the need in Ireland of healthy repose. Its true friends are not its agitators with their frothy rhetoric, exciting and irritating the popular passions till they overflow in deeds that have turned the country into a modern Aeldama. C. L. DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXX.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

172. JOHN TOWGOOD, Esq. (1838-78).—Barrister-at-law; son of No. 115 supra, and a nephew of Samuel Rogers, the poet (No. 119). He died January 5, 1878.

173. PETTY VAUGHAN, Esq. (1838-51).—[The writer would be glad to receive from any reader of the Inquirer some particulars respecting this Trustee.]

174. REV. EDWIN CHAPMAN (1838-41).—Minister at Billingshurst, whence he removed in 1823 to Chatham, and thence to Deptford. Minister of Stamford-street Chapel, London (1831-34), and of Newington-green Chapel (1831-38). He removed to Godalming in 1841, and retired about 1845. He died at Clifton in April, 1875, aged seventy-seven years.

175. JACOB HANS BUSK, Esq. (1838-44).—Elected a Trustee in the place of his brother, Edward Busk, Esq. He died at Theobalds, June 5, 1844, in his seventy-seventh year.

176. REV. PHILIP LE BRETON, M.A. (1841-60).—Youngest son of the Very Rev. Francis Le Breton, Dean of Jersey, and rector of St. Saviour's in that island. Born at the Vicarage March 7, 1779. Sent to England at an early age for education, was a pupil of Dr. Lempriere, author of the "Classical Dictionary" which bears his name; gained a scholarship at Pembroke College, Oxford, but migrated to Exeter College. Shortly after his ordination he was chosen to succeed his father in the rectory of St. Saviour's. There he exercised his ministry for some years, preaching in English and French with equal fluency. In 1814, from his own reading, he began to entertain serious doubts on the subject of the leading doctrines of the Church of England, which doubts ended in his rejecting the doctrine of the Trinity, and some other dogmas. Whilst in this state of mind he was offered the Deanery of Jersey, which would have placed him in the highest social position in the island; but instead of accepting this additional preferment, he resolved to resign his benefice. Having done so, he removed in 1815 to France with a family of five young children, hoping to find some remunerative employment there; but the return of Napoleon from Elba compelled him to leave that country. He now came to London, where, however, he had no relatives and few connections. He introduced himself to the Rev. Thomas Belsham, with whom he had recently had some correspondence on theological subjects, and to the Rev. Robert Aspland, from whom he received judicious advice. He opened a school at Westminster, which soon became a great success, and from which he did not retire until after many years of arduous labour. In person he was tall and graceful, with regular features and pleasing expression, of refined manners and winning address, courteous to all, alike to the poor and humble as to the high and wealthy. As a Trustee of Dr. Williams's Library, as a member of the Council of University Hall, of the Committee of the Unitarian Association, and in promoting the establishment of the Ladies' Bedford College, his services were invaluable. He never entered a pulpit after having quitted his own, but for forty-five years he was a constant attendant at Essex-street Chapel, founded by another clergyman who had made similar sacrifices for conscience sake. The noble congregation assembling there during the ministry of Mr. Belsham and Mr. Madge could not have had a brighter ornament than Philip Le Breton. He died on the 5th of November, 1860, in his eighty-second year. A handsome portrait of him was contributed by his son, Philip Hemery Le Breton, Esq., barrister-at-law, to the collection often referred to.

177. REV. THOMAS RUSSELL (1842-47).—Probably an Independent minister of liberal opinions, whose son, Arthur Tozer, was a Divinity student at York College in the years 1822-24. He died in or shortly before January, 1847.

178. JOHN WOOD, Esq. (1846-57).—A native of Liverpool. Educated at the University of Glasgow, intending to enter the ministry amongst the Unitarians, but abandoning that design he went into business; after some years he exchanged Commerce for the Law, practised at the Bar, and became Recorder of York. In 1826 he was elected M.P. for Preston, and soon after the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832 he was appointed Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, which office he held for nearly a quarter of a century.

179. EBENEZER JOHNSTON, Esq. (1846-50).—A prominent member of the Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney. A nephew of the Rev. Wm. Johnston (No. 123 supra). He died at his residence at Stamford-hill in October, 1850, in his sixty-second year.

180. HENRY CRABB ROBINSON, Esq., F.S.A. (1846-66).—Born May 13, 1775, at Bury St. Edmunds. At the age of twenty-four he left England for the Continent. Studied at the University of Jena. There he acquired a complete mastery of the German language; formed the friendship of Goethe, and moved in the first intellectual society. After five years he returned to England, and then became foreign correspondent of the Times in Spain. In that capacity he was present at Corunna at the time of the retreat of the British troops and the death of Sir John Moore. He was called to the Bar in 1813, being then in his thirty-ninth year, and eventually became leader of the Norfolk Circuit, but retired from the profession many years before his death. His delight was in the society of literary men. He was one of the first members of the Athenæum Club, a member of the Council of University College, London, and one of the Vice-Presidents of the Senate. He died February, 5, 1867, in his ninety-second year. See his "Diary, Reminiscences and Correspondence," selected and edited by Dr. Sadler, 1869. On his tomb at Highgate is the following inscription: "Friend and Associate of Goethe and Wordsworth, Wieland and Coleridge, Flaxman and Blake, Clarkson and Charles Lamb; he honoured and loved the great and noble in their thoughts and characters; his warmth of heart and genial sympathy embraced all whom he could serve, all in whom he found response to his own healthy tastes and generous sentiments. His religion corresponded to his life; seated in the heart it found expression in the truest Christian Benevolence." There is a bust of him at the Library, presented by Talfourd Ely, Esq., M.A.

181. JAMES MANNING, Esq., Q.A.S. (1846-66).—A very learned case lawyer, author of Digest of Nisi Prius Reports, 1813; and the Practice of the Court of Exchequer, 1827; but better known by the series of King's Bench Reports, Manning and Ryland's (1827-37); and the Common Pleas Reports, Manning and Granger's (1841-46). Called to the Bar in 1817, admitted Serjeant-at-Law in 1840, and Queen's Ancient Serjeant in 1846. Recorder of Oxford, Banbury, and Sudbury. For many years

County Court Judge of one of the metropolitan districts. He died Aug. 29, 1866, in his eighty-fifth year. His father was the Rev. James Manning, of Exeter, whose name is held in great honour amongst Unitarians.

EMERSON AS AN AGITATOR.

There is one side of Emerson's character which it may be worth while to ponder at this time, and that is shown by the attitude which he assumed on the great Abolition question. The excellent biographical notice which appeared in the London Times makes clear to us on which side his sympathies lay, and shows us that he was not afraid to let his sentiments be known. A great revolution was in progress. It was a fetter-breaking age; and the agitation for the abolition of slavery was making great strides at the time when Emerson was a Unitarian minister at Boston. The present generation knows little about that black institution of slavery—the negation of God, property in human beings. That institution of slavery, let it be remembered, was defended by numberless quotations from Scripture. Christian ministers defended the rights of property in their pulpits, and the outcry against those who sought to abolish private property in human beings was only greater and more virulent than that which is now raised against those who attack private property in land and nations. The Unitarians, for the most part eminently respectable, thought it most shocking that any one should agitate. Emerson was only a young man at the time, only twenty-eight in 1831, but he opened his church for the speeches of the Abolitionists, and he was the first scholar to sympathise publicly with the movement. What a dreadful man he must have been! How his "strong language" must have shocked everybody. What intrigues must have been formed against him! The apostles of Abolition, the "paid agents" of their day, were met by rage, slander, malice, opprobrium of all sorts and kinds, they were denied admittance to society, they were boycotted unmercifully, roughs were hired to hurl them down—and worse—and Emerson stood by their side. More, when John Brown was in his Virginian prison for his armed attack on slavery—armed attack let it be remembered—What did Emerson do? "He sent his shining arrows among 'the fools who can only cry mad-man when a hero passes,' and declared that if Brown should be executed he would make his gallows glorious like a cross." What happened then? That wonderful song,

"John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave, But his soul goes marching on,"

became the war-song of the Republic. And when the civil war began Emerson left his quiet home and the books he loved, and often appeared on the anti-slavery platform in Boston. On one occasion he said, "The war is a conflagration which will not be stayed until it has consumed all that is wood or stubble. The iron alone will remain." When the war was over he spoke these words:—"America means opportunity, freedom, power. The genius of this country has marked out her true policy—opportunity; doors wide open—every port open. If I could, I would have free trade with all the world without toll or custom-house. Let us invite every nation, every race, every skin—white man, black man, red man, yellow man. Let us offer hospitality and a fair field and equal laws to all. The land is wide enough, the soil has food enough for all. Let us educate every soul." Thus Emerson was not to be put down, although no other Unitarian minister dared touch the question for many years afterwards. Dr. Channing himself was amongst those who, while he favoured abolition, held aloof, because he took exception to the methods employed by the Abolitionists; they ought not to "agitate." Emerson apparently did not take that view. If a cause was just to him he felt it to be his duty to advance it without reference to the conduct of others who worked in a different way for the same ends. It appeared to him that a great crime was being enacted before his very eyes, and he could not refuse to aid those who were "agitating" against it, simply because another man condemned that crime in a manner of which he disapproved. Besides, he knew human nature well enough to know that those who held aloof from the agitation for the abolition of slavery excused themselves from taking part, not so much on account of the "strong language" of those who did take part as on account of a strong desire to preserve their own respectability. Over Emerson, however, Mrs. Grundy had no influence. Said he

"Life is too short to waste
In critic peep or cynic bark, Quarrel or reprimand;
'Twill soon be dark;
Up, mind thine own aim, and God speed the mark!"

R.

BURY DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The first meeting of the session of this Union was held at the Bank-street schools, Bury, on the 6th inst. The chair was occupied by the president (Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy). The printed report of the past session was distributed at the meeting, and from it we learn that the Union has been in existence from 1864, and that since that time seventy-four meetings, at which papers have been read, have been held, in addition to thirty picnics, one musical entertainment, and four conversaciones. Each year a service attended by the scholars and teachers of the four schools of the Union is held in Bank-street Chapel, on Whit-Sunday, and is looked forward to with great interest. The preacher last year was the Rev. W. Bennett, and next Whit Sunday the service will be conducted by the Rev. R. Wilkinson, of Ainsworth. During the past year the work of the Union has been carried on with much vigour and interest, there having been a far larger attendance at the meetings than in previous years. At the first meeting of the session it was resolved to annually elect a president, who shall preside at the meetings of the Union, and Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, F.L.S., F.C.S., was elected the first president. Mr. Hardman, of Heywood, the retiring secretary, received a cordial vote of thanks for his services, and Mr. Kay H. Whitehead was elected his successor. During the session papers were read by Mr. C. Hardman, of Heywood, on "Doctrinal teaching in our Sunday-schools;" by Mr. J. D. Darbyshire, of Stand, on "Suggestions for the increased usefulness of ministers, teachers, and congregations;" by Mr. J. Taylor, of Ainsworth, on "The social aspect of the Sunday-school;" and by Mr. E. Collinson, of Bury, on "The ideal and actual of Sunday-school life; their hindrances and helps;" and the session was brought to a close by a conversazione, at which the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. (representing the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union), delivered a helpful address. There is only one shadow in the report of the past session, the death of the Rev. W. Bennett, by which not only the Heywood congregation and school but their fellow-workers in the district have sustained a sad loss. The minutes and financial statement having been passed, a vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. K. H. Whitehead for his services as secretary, and he was re-appointed; Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy being unanimously re-elected president. It was resolved that the next ordinary meeting be held at Ainsworth in July, and that a picnic be held at an early date at Ashworth Chapel. The meeting passed a resolution requesting the committee to consider the question of forming a total abstinence society in connection with the union. So much time was occupied with the business that it was suggested that it would be well to postpone the reading of the paper until the July meeting, and the Rev. R. Wilkinson, who was the essayist, being in favour of this, the suggestion was adopted. The rest of the evening was occupied with a discussion on the temperance question, in which the president, the Rev. R. Wilkinson, and Messrs. Thos. Lord, Thos. Holt, Allen, D. Healey, W. Brierley, J. Holt, and J. W. Elliott took part. A hymn and prayer closed the meeting.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Occasional Notes.

THE closing meeting of the Congregational Union held yesterday week resolved itself into a conference to consider the question of non-attendance at public worship. The Rev. W. Hewgill, M.A., read a paper on the inability of the Churches to hold those who had been trained in the Sunday-schools or in Christian families. He said that to every Church member who had once been a Sunday-scholar it was calculated that there were eight such who were outside the Church, and some of these were outside religious influence altogether. The explanation might be looked for both in the homes and in the Churches. The school and the Church were regarded as separate institutions. They were working independently of each other, and the school was no longer the nursery of the Church. Then in the Church if the deacons seemed to think that to the age of twenty-five their young people had a right to cut themselves loose from all religious influences—if by adherence to the dreadful system of pew rent they made it impossible for rich and poor to sit together—if ministers would preach sermons that smelled too much of the paraffin lamp, they could hardly wonder if they lost their men and women, because they did not interest them when they were young. The gist of his paper then would be the need of bringing Church and Sunday-school into closer relation. The Rev. Professor Cave followed in an address on the intellectual causes operating to prevent church attendance. The two ideas of the age were culture and science, i.e., the training of all the faculties and the attainment of truth through the inductive method. In both these particulars he thought that Christianity had everything to offer. True culture is Christianity. The old cynic said, "I am seeking a man." A few years after Justin said, "In Christ I have found a man." Socrates said, "Philosophy is the true end of man." Augustine said afterwards, "In Christ is the true philosophy." And that was the end that a complete and matured culture would ultimately reach. The Church should simply hold with persistence and patience to their work, and the restless culture of the age would come round to them, instead of there being any necessity for their coming round to the age. Then the world had a cry for science; it demanded facts, and rigid logical inferences from facts. Nor had they themselves no facts to offer. The Bible was a fact, the Church was a fact, and conversion was a fact. These things should be laid before the world as the basis of their faith. Above all things they needed an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and he believed that they were on the eve of some great revelation from Almighty God. Let them join in prayer that that power would be sent down from on high, and a wonderful change would operate on the face of the world. The Rev. Edward White spoke of the moral causes of the same state of things. The Rev. Mr. Craig said that until their scholars passed naturally into Churches there would be little improvement in homes with which they were connected. The Rev. Dr. Fairbairn deprecated all official apologies, but he did say that the people were perfectly willing to listen to manly defence of their faith, instancing the great and unexpected success of a series of lectures on aspects of sceptical thought recently delivered at Airedale College. After some characteristic remarks from Dr. Parker, who discountenanced scientific theories of the universe, on the ground that it had all been settled in the first chapter of Genesis, the Rev. S. Hebditch advocated the formation of Christian unions to keep the young people of the Church together. The discussion was continued by the Rev. P. Colborne, Mr. Alfred Barnes, the Rev. Bryan Dale, Mr. Basil H. Cooper, and the Rev. G. M. Murphy, the various suggestions thrown out being all in the direction of more attractive services, greater oversight over Sunday scholars, and sermons more suited to the wants of the age.

A "SOCIETY FOR PHYSICAL RESEARCH" has been started under the presidency of Mr. Henry Sedgwick. Several men of note who have leanings in the direction of spiritualism, but who have hitherto avoided declaring themselves so openly, are connected with it: Mr. A. J. Bal four, M.P., Professor Balfour Stewart, Mr. R. H. Hutton, Hon. Roden Noel, Mr. F. Myers, Dr. Lockhart Robinson, and others. A "Committee on Apparitions, Haunted Houses," &c., presided over by Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, is gravely announced. The age of folly among even learned men is not yet over. It is a pity, says the Athenæum, that the Cock-lane Ghost is extinct. There is a committee on "Thought Reading," headed by Professor Barrett. By the way, we may mention that Mr. Stuart Cumberland gave a singularly successful exposure of "thought reading" before a distinguished audience the other evening. He easily discovered an object hid by Monsignor Capel in Mr. Cumberland's absence from the room. In a like manner, but with even greater facility, a pin stuck in the vest of a spiritualist doctor by the Secretary of the "Society for Physical Research" was found by Mr. Cumberland. Professor Croom Robertson and Professor Ray Lankester stated that where Mr. Bishop had failed Mr. Cumberland had succeeded, and that he was by far the greatest exponent of the profession that had yet come forward—the special merit of his experiments lying in the fact that he made no pretensions, simply claiming to succeed by natural perception.

THE Rev. Charles Voysey in the course of an admirable In Memoriam sermon on Darwin, preached on the 14th inst., writes:—

I had not the privilege of knowing him except by correspondence, but this had begun about sixteen years ago and was chiefly concerned with purely scientific subjects. Had his precious life been prolonged for a few weeks more, an opportunity would have been given him for testing, by an experiment which I was conducting, a very strong opinion of his own on an alleged case of reversion. Should the result be as he anticipated, I shall of course take care that the experiment and its results be duly recorded. But although science as a rule was the one topic of our correspondence, there were times when what I may call the religious side of his nature was amply unfolded. In 1862, when proceedings were instituted against me for heresy, he kindly and readily joined my Defence Committee, his honoured name standing side by side with those of Dr. Jowett, Sir Charles Lyell, John Ruskin, Viscount Amberley, and the lamented Arthur Stanley, Dean of Westminster, among others of only less distinction. In 1871, when this society was first formed, under the name of the "Voysey Establishment Fund," Darwin again joined my cause and became a member of the General Committee, an act the more significant from a religious point of view when I mention that Lord Amberley declined to join us on the express ground that we were too religious for him. Though my testimony may be only negative, I still think it is worth something when I can say that in all these years Darwin never gave me the slightest reason to doubt that he was a genuine believer in God, and that his sublime researches into nature had never made him regard the objects of his study in any other light than as the wonderful works of God.

A MAGNIFICENT stained glass window has been presented to St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, by American citizens, as a memorial to Sir Walter Raleigh, whose headless body lies interred near the altar. Underneath the window are the following four lines, written by Mr. J. R. Lowell, the American Minister:—

"The New World's sons from England's breast we drew

Such milk as bids remember whence we came;
Proud of her Past, wherefrom our Present grew,

This window we inscribe with Raleigh's name."

The stained glass fills the large west window of the church, and was unveiled last Sunday at the morning service, when a sermon was preached by the rector, the Rev. Canon Farrar, D.D.

A PRIVATE meeting has recently been held, at which it was resolved to invite all the London ministers and a number of leading laymen to attend a Conference, with the view of discussing the best means of organising occasional devotional services at some of the London chapels, in which the members of the various congregations might meet for united worship. The success of the scheme will depend on the heartiness with which the proposal is responded to; and it is hoped that it will be so taken up as to make it a true support of the religious life of our congregations, and an additional bond of fellowship between them.

UPPER BROOK-STREET, MANCHESTER. — On Wednesday, the 10th instant, in the new school which has been erected by the side of the church, a bazaar was opened at two o'clock by Mr. Charles E. Schwann. There was a crowded attendance. The stock of articles for sale included a large number of specimens of tasteful and costly needlework, a bower-full of bright flowers in pots and bouquets, a gallery of paintings, and tables loaded with rich fancy-fair spoil. Mr. J. Kendall, B.A., warden, in terms of appreciation of Mr. Schwann's generosity on behalf of the congregation, requested Mr. Schwann to open the proceedings. Not a stone of that handsome building in which they were assembled was laid ten months ago, and he was glad to say that everything had gone well with them. The Rev. Silas Farrington seconded the request, and expressed his warmest thanks to all who had helped them and especially to Mrs. Seaton, and to the late Mr. Seaton's brother, who though not of their communion had given them valuable assistance. They had placed on a marble slab sunk into the wall on the staircase a record of Mrs. Seaton's kindness to them, and of the generous gift of her late husband. Mr. Schwann in a few well-chosen words justified the holding of bazaars, and stated that in addition to the late Mr. Seaton's legacy of £1,000 they had raised another £1,000, and now they wanted £800 more, which he hoped they would get during the week. Those who were not enrolled in the ranks of active Sunday-school teachers could scarcely realise what an amount of sacrifice and devotion such teaching entailed. Nothing but a noble enthusiasm could support them in such labour. There was quite a brisk sale during the day, and at the close on Wednesday evening £255 had been taken.—The new schools have been built on land adjoining the church, which was erected over forty years since from the plans of Sir Charles Barry. The ground floor is divided into four class-rooms, varying in size from 13ft. by 12ft. to 19ft. by 18ft., committee room, kitchen and store pantry with lift to the upper floor. The upper floor is reached by a stone staircase, octagonal in plan, and is used as a school-room, having about 155 square yards of floor space, with one class-room off it, 12ft. by 10½ft. The schoolroom has the roof timbers partly exposed, and is ceiled at a height of 16ft. 3in. from the floor; it is lighted by five three-light windows, which are filled with coloured-lead lights, having appropriate texts painted on them; a glazed tiled dado 4ft. high runs round the room, and the walls above are plastered; there is a connecting passage between the room, and a class-room over the vestries of the church. The entrance hall and staircase are faced with white and tinted glazed bricks. The elevations are faced with stones worked to correspond with the elevations of the church. The whole of the work has been carefully carried out by Mr. James Herd, builder, of Manchester, from the plans, and under the superintendence of Mr. J. W. Beaumont, architect, 21, Cannon-street, Manchester. We are glad to hear that the total amount realised at the Bazaar is £700.

CHELMSFORD.—The Annual Flower service was held on Sunday, 14th. The chapel was prettily decorated with both wild and cultivated blossoms collected by the scholars and friends, which were sent off next day to Rev. W. A. Pope for distribution at Spicer-street Mission. An appropriate sermon was preached in the morning by Mr. Fyson, and Mr. Madocks officiated in the evening, the subject of discourse being "In Memoriam, H. W. Longfellow." A class for improvement in reading and elocution has been recently commenced. The committee is preparing a balance sheet of the late improvements, a copy of which will be sent to each subscriber. The Rev. H. Williamson of Dundee is expected to preach on June 4.

PLYMOUTH.—On Tuesday the members of the "Three Towns Radical Association" held their closing meeting for the season at Wood's Coffee House, Stonehouse. The Rev. W. Sharman, president, was in the chair. The most interesting feature in the proceedings was the presentation to Mr. Sharman of a gold watch of the value of twenty-five guineas, bearing this inscription:—"Presented from the Radicals to the Rev. Wm. Sharman as a token of their appreciation of his work in the cause of liberty. Plymouth, 16-5-'82." The presentation was acknowledged by Mr. Sharman in a very appropriate speech, vindicating his action in support of Mr. Bradlaugh's claims on the ground of constitutional right and the principles of civil and religious liberty.

Reviews.

The Expositor. May, 1882. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

This theological periodical is not only remarkable for the ability with which it is conducted, but for the generally liberal tone of its theology, made up as it is of contributions from diaries of different Churches both in England and Scotland. In the first paper this month, for instance, on "The Sin against the Holy Ghost," the Editor, the Rev. Dr. Cox, of Nottingham, quite repudiates the old Orthodox interpretation. He tells us that he has again and again met with men and women of tender conscience and devout spirit, who by long brooding over these terrible words had convinced themselves that they had fallen into this fatal and mysterious sin, and whose reason has been disbalanced and unhinged by a fearful anticipation of the doom they held themselves to have preached. "The religious monomaniac is to be found in wellnigh every madhouse in the kingdom; and in the large majority of cases he has been driven mad by the fear that he has committed the unpardonable sin; although the man who honestly fears that he may have committed this sin is just the one man who has the witness in himself that he cannot possibly have committed it." Dr. Cox's interpretation—which is very clearly and ably advocated—is that this sin against the Holy Ghost, for which at least in the present æon there is no provision for forgiveness, is "that wilful and invincible ignorance which refuses to be taught, that love of darkness which refuses to admit the light even when the sun is shining in the sky." For all practical purposes we may say that to sin against conscience is to sin against the Holy Ghost, for conscience is the organ and voice of God within the soul.

In the next article Dr. G. Matheson continues his instructive "Studies in the Minor Prophets," taking "Amos" as his subject, and regarding him as foremost among the group of early Jewish reformers. The Rev. Prebendary Huxtable concludes his learned disquisition on "The Sense in which St. Paul calls himself an Ectroma"; and the Rev. T. Sterling Berry has a brief "Critical Note on John xiv. 2."

The two remaining articles deserve special attention. One of them is entitled "The Fear of Father Isaac," by Almoni Peloni, a Syrian theologian, we suppose. It is an exposition of Genesis xxi. 53, and he interprets the passage as meaning that "the Fear," "the Dreadful One," "the Terror," was Isaac's name for the God who was "the Friend" or "the Strength and Shield" of his father Abraham, and whom his son Jacob worshipped as "the Shepherd" or "the Rock" of Israel. Each of the patriarchs had his own name for the Divine Ruler of the universe, and Isaac's name for him was "the Fear," quite in accordance with the idiosyncrasy of the man. Mr. Peloni's practical comment is that if things were but called by their proper names the God and Father of Christendom would be known as the Fear of Christendom, and he doubts whether under all the gracious names we lavish on Him our deepest emotion towards Him is not one of awe, of terror, of fear only faintly touched with hope. It is not only, he adds, in Catholic Europe where God the Father, where even Christ the Saviour is deemed so awful and implacable to men that Mother Mary must intercede with Him for the sinful and needy; nor only in Calvinistic America, where "the plan of salvation" includes only an elect minority of the race, that this awful "fear" of God lingers on. "But here in England, and even among those who faintly trust the larger hope, the germ of this frightful misconception still lives and thrives, inasmuch that while we think of God as love, our most habitual feeling towards Him is, in many cases, a nameless fear of His power, or of His anger." We have not learned the great lesson, the writer adds, which Christ came to teach that the very Power of God is our refuge and defence; that in His very purity lies our only hope of redemption from impurity and guilt; that by His goodness we are to be made good. And so the Christian idea is God the Father of Love, not "the Fear of Isaac."

In the only other paper remaining, the Rev. Agar Beet discusses some difficult and important passages in "The Revised Version." In the first place, he criticises the revisers for translating Romans viii. 16-26, "the Spirit himself," for "the Spirit itself," and contends that they ought at least to have put in the margin the rendering they reject. This is one of the very few passages which undoubtedly show theological bias. Mr. Agar Beet's explanation of the neuter pronoun here has at least the merit of singularity, although it borders very close upon Tritheism. "It reminds us," he says, "how constantly the third Person of the Divine Trinity, although a distinct person sharing with the Father and the Son all Divine attributes and working out by his own Divine power all the operations of God, nevertheless withdraws for the most part his personality from public view, that all eyes may be fixed on one object, viz., the Eternal Son." Charles Kingsley has a shockingly anthropomorphic sermon on "The Childhood of God." Mr. Agar Beet might well supplement it with one on "The Modesty of God," or at least of one of the Three Gods who withdraws Himself from public view; and another on "The Childishness of Theologians," a subject which would afford ample materials for an extensive course. Among other passages Mr. Beet comments upon Philippians ii. 6, but like most other writers leaves this obscure text pretty much as he found it. He rejects the Revisers' version of Titus ii. 13, on the ground which is creditable to his candour, that the alternative rendering is at least allowable, as both Winer and Bishop Elliott state, and that Christ is never called God in the Epistles of St. Paul. His explanation of this is again very singular. "This I venture to explain by suggesting that in St. Paul's day the theological education of the Church was not sufficiently advanced to make it safe, in view of surrounding polytheism, to use the word God as a common designation of Christ; but that the development of Christian thought justified the use of it by the last surviving Apostle [John], and that in the age following it became universal in the Church." But where is Christ directly called God even in the Fourth Gospel, save by Thomas, and where in the Epistles of John? The Evangelists and Apostles, as we understand their character, were not in the habit of considering what was safe when teaching the Church; and if they had regarded Christ as God, it seems obvious that they would have made their faith as widely known as possible in the midst of the surrounding polytheism, in order to show that their new God was greater than all the false gods of the ancient temple worship. When we thus read of the retiring modesty of one of Mr. Beet's gods who "withdraws from public view," and the cowardly reticence of the followers of another of his gods who are afraid to proclaim his divinity before the polytheists; and when we find Mr. Almoni Peloni comparing the Christian's conception of his third God with "The Fear and Terror of Isaac," we really begin to doubt whether there is much to choose between ancient and modern polytheism.

The first two articles we have noticed show how much reason for hope there is in observing the newer tendencies of religious thought, and the last shows how much need there is for the theological revolution which we religious Liberals are striving to bring about.

History of Rome. English Edition, Revised and Translated by Wilhelm Ihne. Vols. IV. and V. Longmans. 1882.

These two volumes, completing Dr. Ihne's great work, cover what is in many respects the most interesting period of Roman history, when laws were founded, constitutional principles laid down, and social usages developed, including that remarkable series of foreign conquests which made Rome for nearly a thousand years the great centre of life and power to the ancient world. Rome had now become the ruler of numerous islands and continents, and the commanding centre round which all the nations of the ancient world were henceforth to be grouped. The great merits of Dr. Ihne's work have been referred to in former notices. In the fourth volume the story of the Gracchi is again told, suggesting many obvious parallels with recent events and personages. Among others there are two striking chapters on "Religion" and "Culture, Art, Science." We observe that Dr. Ihne gives the old derivations of Religion from religare to bind anew, signifying a bond or compact, like the corresponding term obligatio of the civil law. This is at least doubtful. It is not a little significant, in view of the remarks we often hear respecting a "book-revelation," to notice the observation that "although the conservatism with which the Romans clung to what was old often preserved usages the meaning of which had been forgotten, more especially in matters of religion, yet the old system was fast decaying, as it was not based upon sacred books, upon confessions of faith carefully drawn up, and upon dogmas solemnly recognised."

The fifth and concluding volume brings the history from the death of the Gracchi down to the last years of Sulla, who seems to be the hero of the author, "the last of the great statesmen of Rome who honestly and sincerely served the Republic and endeavoured to uphold republican institutions." The history of the Empire properly begins with the dictatorship of Sulla, and here for the present the writer stops, throwing out a hint of the possibility of a distinct work from his pen on the subsequent history of Rome.

The history as a whole is remarkably clear, discriminating and unprejudiced. The historian is not blind to the defects in the Roman character, or to the merits of the Carthaginians and Greeks. He has applied sound principles of historical criticism to the early annalists and historians, and has pointed out their failings and corrected their errors. If not a great history this is a very readable and instructive work, and thanks to the author's long residence in this country, it is written in a style of clear and vigorous English.

The Mechanism of the Human Voice. By Emil Behnke, Lecturer on Vocal Physiology at the Tonic Sol-fa College. Second Edition, Enlarged and Revised. (London: J. Curwen and Sons, 8, Warwick-lane, E.C. 1882.)—Herr Behnke tells us in the introduction to his interesting little book that "we are living in an age which is singularly poor in fine voices, both male and female, and with regard to the tenors of the present time there is this additional misfortune, that, as a rule, their voices do not last, but are often worn out in a very few years; in many instances while their owners are still under training, and before they have had an opportunity of making their appearance in public. If we remember that there was a time when most beautiful and highly cultivated voices were so plentiful that even in comparatively small towns there were to be found opera companies consisting of excellent singers, we may well ask ourselves how this remarkable change for the worse has come about." People have attempted to account for it in various ways. Some maintain that it is owing to the disappearance of the class of male soprano and contralto of the seventeenth century to whom the education of female voices was entrusted. Some complain of the way in which modern composers write vocal music, others point to the gradual rise of pitch during the last 150 years as the source of the evil. Under these sad circumstances men have set themselves to try and ascertain the actual process by which vocal sounds are produced, and thus to form a scientific basis on which to found a way of training voices. Herr Behnke, in a singularly clear and lucid manner, brings the whole subject before the reader, and to make it readily understood by non-scientific people, gives a translation of the Greek terms used by physiologists side by side with the originals. In the chapter entitled "The Vocal Organ as a Musical Instrument," the author, in the course of an excellent description of the organ, lays much stress upon the superiority of midriff and rib breathing over collar-bone breathing, and, in our opinion, completely proves his case. We cannot too strongly insist upon the necessity, of which we have already spoken, of forming a scientific basis for teaching singing, and, indeed, for training the voice for public speaking, &c. When a knowledge of physiological facts is more widely diffused, we trust that we shall no longer hear of clergymen's sore throats, of fine voices ruined during study, or of young ladies being instructed by their singing masters to put their noses in hot water to get rid of the nasal tone. We congratulate Herr Behnke upon the patience and perseverance with which he has pursued his investigations with the Laryngoscope, and we look forward confidently to a brighter time coming, when we shall no longer be condemned to listen in so many drawing-rooms to after-dinner tremolos and shrieks from ladies and frantic shouts from gentlemen.

Literary Notes.

MR. WILLIAM PATERSON, of Edinburgh, will have ready in about a month the first and second volumes of his forthcoming library edition of Wordsworth's poetical works. The work will be completed in eight demy octavo volumes, and will be illustrated with a portrait and etchings.

We regret to hear of the death of Mr. John Blackwood, son of the late Mr. John Blackwood, of the well-known Edinburgh publishing firm. The deceased gentleman, who was only twenty-five years of age, was during the present year to have joined the firm of W. Blackwood and Sons.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH and FARRAN have in preparation a new series of school reading-books, to be entitled "The Standard Authors Readers," by the editor of "Poetry for the Young," planned throughout to meet the requirements of the New Code. The distinctive features of the series will be (states the Academy) that, in the infant books, very careful graduation in the introduction of sounds and words will be combined with an interesting narrative form, and that the passages selected in the higher books (both prose and poetry) will be taken from the works of standard authors.

THE members of the French Academy have had printed for themselves on china paper forty copies of the seventh and last edition of their Dictionary.

MISS ARNOLD FORSTER, the daughter of Mr. W. E. Forster, M.P., has in the press a volume on missionary work, entitled "Heralds of the Cross; or, the Fulfilling of the Command." It will be published by Messrs. Hatchard, who also promise a volume of travels by Mr. Howard Vyse, called "A winter in Tangier, and Home through Spain."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have made arrangements to publish immediately an English edition of the American novel "Democracy," which has excited so much attention here as well as in the United States.

DR. ABEL, whose linguistic essays are advertised to appear in an English translation, has been appointed to deliver the next course of Ilchester Lectures at Oxford, on Slavonic literature, during Midsummer Term.

It has been authoritatively announced that, after November, Mr. John Morley will cease to conduct the Fortnightly Review. It is understood that he purposes devoting himself, in the time he can spare from the laborious task of editing the Pall Mall Gazette, to the preparation of works of a purely literary kind.

BRET HARTE will publish in the June part of Good Words a short article giving personal recollections of the poet Longfellow.

MESSRS. LONGMANS announce as in preparation a book upon the Irish massacres of 1641, their causes and results. It will consist of a selection from the depositions preserved in MS. in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, with an introduction by Mary Hickson, and a preface by J. A. Froude. The same publishers have also in the press a volume of private notes of Francis Bacon, believed to have been written about 1594, and hitherto unpublished. They have been edited, with illustrative passages from Shakespeare, by Mrs. H. Pott, and Dr. Abbott has written a preface.

"A MEMOIR (in Memoriam) of the late Ralph Waldo Emerson" is about to appear. The author of the memoir is Mr. Alexander Ireland, of Manchester, who adds to it personal recollections of Mr. Emerson's visits to England in 1833, 1847-8, and 1872-3; extracts from hitherto unpublished letters; records from various sources, of his home life and public appearances; and a complete list of his printed works. Mr. Ireland, we believe, first became acquainted with Emerson in Edinburgh in 1833. Along with other friends, he strongly urged, and ultimately succeeded in persuading him to visit this country in 1847-8, and to give lectures in London, Edinburgh, and the large provincial towns—undertaking the necessary business arrangements, so as to relieve him from all correspondence connected therewith. For some months Mr. Emerson took up his residence in Manchester, finding it the most convenient centre from which to proceed to fulfil his numerous engagements.

DR. C. W. SIEMENS is the president elect of the Southampton meeting of the British Association on August 23.

Our Contemporaries.

THE REFORMED CHURCH IN PARIS.

The following remarkable article appeared in the Times of Monday:—

Our Paris correspondent gives an account of the election yesterday of the Presbyterian Councils of the Reformed Church in the French Capital. The day will have been a memorable epoch for the Church, not merely of Paris, but of all France. Before 1860 the Paris Calvinists were divided into eight congregations. Each possessed its separate council, and nominated its own pastor or pastors. On a vacancy among the pastors the council of the parish or congregation had to name three, of whom the Consistory appointed one. As, however, the parochial council was free to select three of the same views, it could save itself from having its pulpit filled by a minister of doctrines unlike those of the majority of its members. French Calvinists, and especially Paris Calvinists, are broken up into two main bodies. There are the rigidly orthodox, who hold that the Protestant system is unalterably fixed; and there are the Liberals, who believe in freedom of opinion. Although the Liberals vary from shades of moderate eclecticism to a laxity which tolerates M. Renan, they agree in presenting a solid array against the pretension of the orthodox to a definite and Positive uniformity. While Paris kept its eight Calvinist parishes the Liberals were fairly satisfied. They were outnumbered in the outlying districts. In central Paris, and particularly in the leading congregation of the Oratoire in the St. Honoré quarter, they preserved a clear majority. In 1860 the Imperial Council of State took occasion from the removal of the fiscal and administrative barriers in municipal Paris to discard the congregational barriers of the Reformed Church. The Reformed Church is in some measure a State Church on account of the subvention it receives. The Emperor's Government, in obedience to the same instinct which led it to subject the Gallican Church to the despotism of the Vatican, availed itself thus of its financial suzerainty to accomplish a Protestant Church centralisation all in favour of a dogmatic monotony. M. Guizot was the lay chief of the orthodox section, and more ecclesiastical than the most inflexible ecclesiastic. Hostile as he was to the Imperial rule, he did not refuse to use the weapon it gave for the subjugation of heterodoxy. Liberal candidates for vacant Paris pulpits were thenceforth inexorably rejected, and the Paris Council was filled exclusively with orthodox members. Not content to administer the majority, he insisted on disfranchising its adversaries. All who would not subscribe to a confession of orthodox faith were struck off the electoral roll. For eight years the orthodox autocracy endured. Two years since it received its first warning in a declaration by the Council of State of the illegality of the electoral test. A final return to the old arrangement was made last autumn, by the draft of a plan, when M. Paul Bert was Minister of Education and Public Worship, for the redistribution of the Paris Reformed Church into the previous eight parishes. This plan came into operation yesterday. From yesterday the initiative in the supply of ministerial vacancies will be restored to the several localities in which the pulpits have to be served. Each parochial council, elected, as prior to 1872, by the members of the congregation without the necessity of a dogmatic subscription, will return a list of three candidates to the Consistory, which will choose one. The result seems to show that orthodoxy is numerically supreme in Paris at large, though at the Oratoire the Liberals have prevailed after a close contest. Liberalism will be almost as little represented in the Paris Reformed pulpits as during the past twenty years. But the bitter sense of oppressive and tyrannical ostracism will have been assuaged. Liberal Protestants will know with whom and where they have to struggle for equality, if not ascendancy.

The propensity of the French Reformed Church to accept a dogmatic uniformity, which, though most flagrant in Paris, is equally pronounced in the provincial centres of French Calvinism, is nothing very strange or novel. Calvinism has never been very liberal in its doctrines. It began in a religious revolt by the professors of a formal and austere faith against the representatives of a different creed as unbending. Historical, political, and social traditions have added to the strictness of theological tenets. A community like the Huguenots, persecuted and trampled upon, was inclined, like any narrow
